Concerning his time at UMass, Kellogg has nothing but fond memories. "It was great," he said in a previous interview with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. "Not to sound boring or drab, I really felt like it was a sort of parent. You really get out of it what you put in."

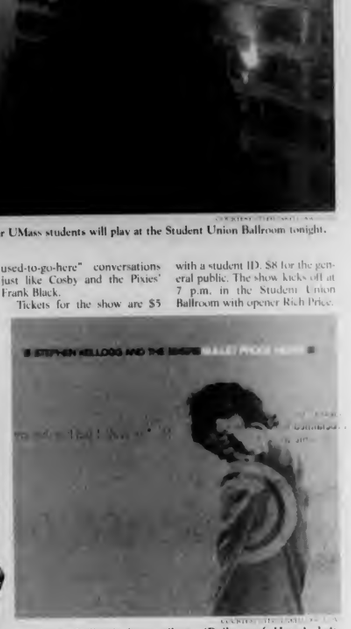
Kellogg's sound is a little harder to describe. He is a young guy armed with an acoustic guitar so the temptation to label him a singer-songwriter is strong. Yet there is an edge to his music, a more rock-inspired sound that makes that typical label seem too acute for him. Even Kellogg himself has a difficult time giving what he does a title.

"I would describe [my music] as acoustic-rock centered around lyrics," he said in a previous interview. "It's very song based, but it's not really folk. It's definitely more rock."

The rock edge has become more apparent since Kellogg teamed up with fellow UMass alum Brian Factor and good friend Kit Karlson. Although the trio has performed together frequently, the formation of The Sixers last year created a new musical environment for their sound to grow. "This last record we just started playing more like a band," Kellogg told Massachusetts Daily Collegian. "It just became about being a band."

No longer a solo artist, Kellogg released his latest album, "Bulletproof Heart," in February and since then The Sixers have hit the road in support of their new disc and their new allegiance.

Tonight's performance at the Student Union Ballroom marks the first of three alumni performance on campus. Next month Bill Cosby will grace the Mullins Center stage for his "Cosby Comes Home" show and in the following month UMass' most famous dropouts. The Pixies, will play Mullins as part of a reunion tour.



Although Kellogg may not have achieved the same caliber of mainstream fame as the others just yet, if his steadily rising star is any indication, it won't be long before the name "Stephen Kellogg" is tossed around in "you-know-who-used-to-go-here" conversations just like Cosby and the Pixies' Frank Black.

Tickets for the show are $5 with a student ID, $8 for the general public. The show kicks off at 7 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom with opener Rich Price.

Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers, a Northampton based band of former UMass students will play at the Student Union Ballroom tonight.

Above, Kellogg's latest album, 'Bulletproof Heart'. Left, Kellogg, Factor, and Karlson have a lot to be smiling about.

Talib Kweli: the beautiful concert

Rawkus recording artist delivers without 'struggle'

By Monique Jemmott

Northampton's Pearl Street nightclub may not strike you as a place to have a hip-hop concert. It looks more like an old theater with its dark atmosphere and high ceilings. But last Thursday night, it was undoubtedly a haven for B-boys and Hip Hop heads alike, as Talib Kweli, MC extraordinaire, performed to a full house in the clubroom of Pearl Street.

Kweli released his sophomore solo album, 'The Beautiful Struggle' yesterday. The album includes features from Mary J. Blige and Common.

The night began a little slow as people trickled in. There were little reminders of the fact that Pearl Street is not a 'hip-hop' club — the house DJ played techno and progressive house to keep the waiting crowd entertained.

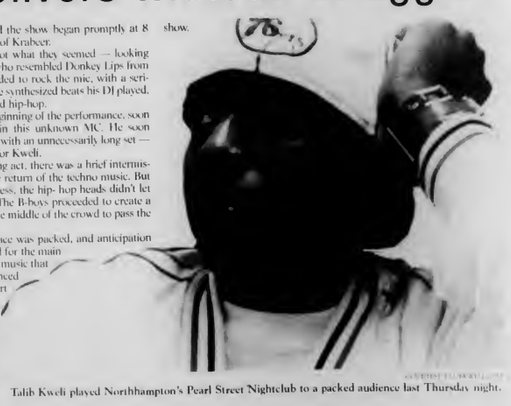
Fortunately the wait wasn't long, and the show began promptly at 8 p.m. with an opening artist by the name of Krabeer.

Once again, on this night things were not what they seemed — looking more like a stagehand, the young man (who resembled Donkey Lips from that old Nickelodeon TV show), proceeded to rock the mic, with a seriously precise flow, riding every note of the synthesized beats his DJ played, which were a balanced mix of techno and hip-hop.

The crowd, though engaged at the beginning of the performance, soon became uninterested in this unknown MC. He soon wore out his welcome with an unnecessarily long set — the crowd was ready for Kweli.



Following the opening act, there was a brief intermission, which meant the return of the techno music. But with skill and tactfulness, the hip- hop heads didn't let that ruin their night. The B-boys proceeded to create a little breaking pit in the middle of the crowd to pass the time.

By 9:15 p.m. the place was packed, and anticipation loomed in the air as concertgoers waited for the main event to start. Seemingly annoyed by the music that was there, one man next to me announced rather loudly, "I wish this shit would start already" — and I agreed with him.

About a half hour later, the show began and Mr. Kweli himself entered the stage, looking cool as a cucumber in a pink Polo shirt and Yankees cap. He opened the show with "What You Wanna Do" from the "Quality" album. The crowd seemed very pleased with the selection, as they cheered and pumped their fists.

From there, he moved on to a tailored verse of Kanye West's "Get 'Em High" from "The College Dropout" featuring Kweli. He finished off with a freestyle personalized to the state of Massachusetts, and the crowd seemed extremely pleased.

The entire show was very entertaining, because it wasn't your typical hip-hop concert — it wasn't the 'get your hands up, put your hands down, do the Hokey Pokey' deal — it was engaging, but not repetitive. Kweli had fun with the audience, and his energy level remained high throughout the entire show — there was no entourage on the stage, and no hype man — just the audience and the DJ to help move the show along. Kweli did his job, delivering his verses sharper than ginsu knives throughout the entire show.

Talib Kweli played Northhampton's Pearl Street Nightclub to a packed audience last Thursday night.

Midway through the show, the crowd was taken back into time when the DJ put on Michael Jackson's "Don't Stop" and Kweli called for the soul clap. Most of the audience wasn't familiar with the soul clap, but they did their best. Following this was Parliament Funkadelic's "Me Myself and I." Everyone seemed to be having fun, but only the true funk and soul heads were really enthralled.

Finally came the time in the show for the DJ to get his spotlight, and DJ Jeff did just that as he scratched and mixed to his heart's content. He blended a Tribe Called Quest's "World Tour" with Kweli's "What You

The Killers release new album

Las Vegas band makes known what the fuss is all about

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

The Killers
'Hot Fuss'
Island Records

The Killers entrench themselves into the indie-rock scene with 'Hot Fuss' by combining a Duran Duran synthesizer with the dance hall groove of Franz Ferdinand. 'Hot Fuss' serves as a life preserver for those drowning in the ever-spreading indie-dance hall music ocean, providing not only tracks to dance to, but also tracks where one can let loose, play air guitar and start drumming on tables.

The Las Vegas based pop-rock quartet formed in late 2002, after lead singer Brandon Flowers' previous band, 'Blush Response,' dropped him. Flowers responded to an ad placed by Oasis aficionado Dave Keuing, who was looking to form a band. Eventually, Flowers and Keuing discovered drummer Ronnie Vannucci and bassist Mark Stoermer, and the group began playing together in a garage, which became their rehearsal space.

The group soon came into their own, grabbing the attention of U.K.- based record label Lizard King and began to play gigs in and around London, eventually signing with Island Records for a debut album. 'Hot Fuss' was mixed and pieced together by Alan Moulder of U2 and 'Smashing Pumpkins' fame. Recent acclaim for The Killers include being named the 'Hot Band of 2004' by Rolling Stone and a nomination for the Shortlist Music Prize.

Island recording artists The Killers pose for their debut album "Hot Fuss." The band was previously named the "Hot Band of 2004" by Rolling Stone Magazine.

The album opens with 'Jenny Was a Friend of Mine' with a feel somewhat reminiscent of Oasis' song 'Morning Glory,' with helicopter sound clips and echoing guitars. 'Mr. Brightside' offers a sarcastic look on relationships, and 'Smile Like You Mean It' provides a true 80's feel, with U2-style guitar sound and rising synthesizers.

The lyrical demise of The Killers begins with 'Somebody Told Me.' Flowers sings, 'Well somebody told me/ You had a boyfriend/ That looked like a girlfriend.' It is backed by a 70's disco beat on drums that sounds more cliché than inventive.

'All These Things That I've Done' opens similarly, to U2's 'Where the Streets Have No Name,' but becomes an original artistic rock piece. With organs rising in the beginning of the tune with Flowers' voice, and Vannucci's drums thundering in to accompany Keuing's strumming, one cannot help but tap their foot and sing along. Flowers belts out, 'Yeah, you know got to help me out/ don't you put me on the backburn,' backed at one point by a gospel choir, adding a soulful feel to an already rocking song. 'Andy, You're a Star' is a somewhat disappointing follow-up to the previous track, praising sarcastically someone who might have stolen a girl from Flowers at some point in his life.

Overall, this track seems to be a strange musical number in some kind of futuristic Broadway play. 'On Top' features a Duran Duran synthesizer/electronic horn feel. 'Change Your Mind' deals a driving bass line, and while it sounds much more like a rip-off of the Strokes' '12:51' than an original song, it is still fun to listen to. That's not to say the entire album isn't original, but rather that the album borrows from ideas created by other artists and merges them in an attempt at originality, which sometimes succeeds.

'Believe Me Natalie' continues the cliche lyrics, but adds a tribal rock element, with heavy drums, plenty of tom fills and crescendo-ing synthesizers.

Perhaps the best track on the album is 'Midnight Show.' The song begs the listener to 'drive faster,' and that's just the kind of song it is — one you should blast in your car while speeding down the freeway. 'Everything Will Be Alright' kills the acoustic drum set sound for an electric beat. Flowers sings with a voice-altering microphone, as he does for most of the album, but somehow in this song it feels more appropriate with the other electronic sounds. Who knows for certain what this song is truly about, but one can only hope The Killers will push for more rocking moments in future endeavors.

On the whole, 'Hot Fuss' is worth a listen or two, with some songs that grow on you and others you'll slowly begin to care less for. Fans of the Strokes, Franz Ferdinand, or U2's the Edge will take a liking to this album quickly. 'Hot Fuss' is definitely a cool album for the indie-rock scene, combining past elements of great music with the atmosphere of the dance hall to create a memorable experience.

Wanna Do?"

The show continued to gain momentum as Kweli invited the B-Boys and girls to the stage to showcase their skills. And while he got just that, he also got a bunch of starry-eyed females, who seemed to be waiting on their cue to come onto stage and showcase their goodies. Not impressed with the crowd's failure to follow direction, Talib politely asked the non B-boys and girls to leave the stage. "All that freaky shit is for later on tonight," he joked.

Kweli also performed songs from his new album, "The Beautiful Struggle," including the new single, "Why Try," produced by Kanye West and featuring Mary J. Blige. After a few more classics, including "Respiration," from the Blackstar debut, and "Good To You," which Kweli proclaimed his favorite song, the show came to a close.

Kweli delivered on his promise to young ladies to be able to show off their dancing skills, and the DJ began to play all of the ladies' songs, including "Goodies," by newcomer Ciara, and the ladies got their chance to show what they were working with.

Offstage, Talib Kweli had a bit more relaxed approach to things. Winding down from the killer performance, he took the time to answer some questions for the Daily Collegian:

MDC: What is 'The Beautiful Struggle' about? What was your thought process when writing and recording for this album?

TK: This album is honest; I always try to make the most honest music possible.

MDC: Do you feel a need to keep up with the trends of rappers today such as Kanye West or 50 Cent?

TK: Not at all, I feel like they are trying to keep up with me.

MDC: Why did you choose the first single 'Why Try'?

TK: I felt that this song would work best with radio and video, and also I love Mary J. Blige's sound.

MDC: Is there another Black Star album in the works? And when will it be done?

TK: Yes, it'll be done when it's done.

MDC: What is your perspective on the upcoming presidential elections?

TK: I think the upcoming elections are important. I feel it will determine the way people view America. I've voted before, but I feel more important than the presidential election, we need community politics. When the 2000 elections were stolen, members of the Black caucus spoke out and were shut down. Nothing really changes for blacks through politics.

Harrington refutes Goose's comments

Joey Harrington reacts after being hit during third period action of their game at Green Bay on Sunday, September 14, 2003.

Siragusa. "He's the kind of guy that's on the other side of the club than I am. He's over there with the champagne and caviar and also the strawberries and chocolate."

Stockton: "We get the idea."

The broadcasters' comments had Detroit's sports talk radio buzzing Monday, but Harrington said he was not aware of them until he heard part of coach Steve Mariucci's weekly news conference and was asked about the comments later by reporters.

Harrington, 25, showed no sign of anger, but he seemed annoyed by the comments, which apparently stemmed from the time he spent with the Fox broadcasters during a production meeting Friday.

"If he's got a problem with the way I play, then go ahead and say it," Harrington said. "But if he looks at how I play, I don't think he'd be making those comments.

"If he looks at how I work, I don't think he'd be making those comments. If he came to the parking lot and checked to see whose car was the last one out of here each day, he wouldn't be making those comments."

Harrington did take one shot at Siragusa, though.

"It's nice playing in front of the best linebacker in the history of the game, isn't it?" he said, a reference to Siragusa's NFL career, which was relatively undistinguished until he landed on the defensive line of the 2000 Baltimore Ravens, with All-Pro linebacker Ray Lewis making plays behind him on the way to a Super Bowl title.

Since he retired as a player, Siragusa has tried to make a career as the fat, lovable, guys' guy. He's more outspoken than informative and sometimes dresses in Hawaiian shirts on the sidelines. He also appeared as strong, silent bodyguard Frankie Cortese in HBO's "The Sopranos."

Harrington indicated that the production meeting with Stockton, Johnston and Siragusa was routine, and there was no indication Siragusa was critical of his play or his personality.

"I don't know where the comments came from, I don't care where the comments came from," Harrington said. "He didn't ask anything. He just sat on the other side of the table and sat there."

Harrington, the Lions' first pick in the 2002 draft and the third player taken overall, has been criticized by some fans and media for being too optimistic, regardless of how poorly the team played in his first two seasons.

He said he probably came into the production meeting in a good mood, but he wasn't sure how it could be interpreted as over-confident.

"I'm a guy who enjoys what I do, and I'm sure I came off the practice field smiling," he said. "And I'm sure I came into the production meeting in a great mood. I do remember a question; he asked me if I was — how did he phrase it? – if I was worried about any of the corners in this league.

"I told him I'm not going to be worried about anybody in this league. I'm not going to back away from throwing at anybody. That's the kind of attitude I've got to have. If he thinks I'm over-confident by that, then so be it.

Maybe I'm an over-confident guy, but you've got to be confident in this league. If you're not, you're going to get waxed off the table, and you're not going to be here next year."

A Fox spokesman said that the network had no response to Harrington's comments.

Harrington was defended by Mariucci.

"I think with winning all that kind of goes away," Mariucci said. "Keep in mind, Joey's a hell of a guy. If you were his dad, you'd be very proud of him. He wants to win as badly as anybody. He gives a full day's work. He's in here like crazy; you've got to shoo him out of the building on his days off, at nights and the whole thing. He's just a worker.

"As he starts to have more and more success, the respect from the Siragusas of the world will come. That's just how it is when he lives in the world of being a starting quarterback in the National Football League. He's developed thick skin. He can handle it."

Mariucci said he was with the Packers during Brett Favre's early years and remembers that Favre took verbal abuse, too.

The 11-year veteran caught a 1-yard TD pass from McNabb — four of Bartrum's six career catches are TDs — and celebrated by snapping the ball nearly 20 yards between his and tight end T.J. Smith's legs. The innovative move cost the Eagles 15 yards they could afford against the overmatched Lions, and assured Bartrum a spot on highlight shows.

And, of course, there's wide receiver Freddie Mitchell, who gestures and prances after every catch he makes, including 8-yard receptions on third-and-10.

Even stoic coach Andy Reid has joined in, occasionally mixing a self-deprecating fat joke into his bland news conferences.

The Eagles are enjoying themselves for good reason. They're not just winning, they're dominating opponents, outscoring teams by an average of two touchdowns.

First, the Eagles steamrolled the New York Giants 31-17, with Owens catching three TDs in his Philadelphia debut. Then came a 27-16 Monday night victory over Daunte Culpepper, Randy Moss and the Minnesota Vikings that wasn't as close as the final indicates. The previously unbeaten Lions were the easiest victim, falling behind 21-0 in the second quarter.

Five other teams remain undefeated. None has won each of its games by double digits.

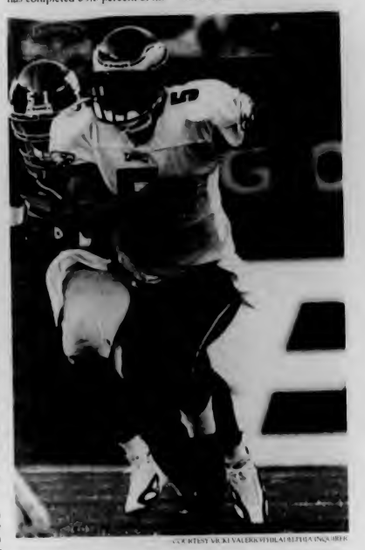
"The guys can really challenge themselves this year," McNabb said. "Everything that happened last year has made us hungry."

A third consecutive loss in the NFC title game — underdog Carolina won 13-3 at the Linc last season — didn't sit well with fans, players, coaches or management. The Eagles needed a drastic change to help them get to the Super Bowl.

On the first day of the NFL's free agency period, they signed Kearse to a $66 million, eight-year deal. A three-time Pro Bowl defensive end with Tennessee, Kearse has returned to his old form, becoming a disruptive force.

Though he doesn't have an oversized ego like Owens, Kearse brings tenacity and intensity to a defense that hasn't had a player cause this many problems for quarterbacks since Reggie White wore silver and green.

"This is a beautiful thing," said Kearse, who had all three of his sacks against Detroit. "I'm lining up wherever they want me to and I'm having fun doing it. They just put me in the open and let me line up with someone that is not really that good at blocking."



Meanwhile, Owens is thriving on offense. He has 18 catches for 254 yards and five TDs. His presence has made other players better, too, helping McNabb to the best start of his six-year career.

Now that James Thrash is no longer his first option on pass plays, McNabb has excelled. He has completed 69.8 percent of his passes (74 of 106) for 931 yards, eight TDs, no interceptions, and has run for two scores.

This time last year, McNabb was playing poorly, hearing boos and dealing with the racially charged critique of then-ESPN commentator Rush Limbaugh, who said the Pro Bowl quarterback was overrated because the media wants to see a black quarterback succeed.

Wonder what Limbaugh thinks now.

McNabb's only problem is figuring out whether to throw to Owens, Mitchell, Smith, Chad Lewis, Todd Pinkston or Brian Westbrook.

Singh dominating

what made Woods' 2000 the Mona Lisa of golf. And that's why trying to match Singh in 2004 against Woods in 2000 is like putting the Americans against Europe in the Ryder Cup.

It's no contest.

Majors: Singh won his only major, the PGA Championship at Whistling Straits, when Justin Leonard bogeyed the last two holes in regulation and Singh won the three-hole playoff by making his only birdie of the day.

Woods won the U.S. Open at Pebble Beach by a record 15 shots. He completed the career Grand Slam at St. Andrews by winning the British Open by eight shots. He won the PGA Championship in a playoff over Bob May after both shot a bogey-free 31 on the back nine at Valhalla.

Victories: Woods doesn't play as often as Singh, but he usually plays only the tournaments that attract the strongest fields. All but one of his victories in 2000 included at least seven of the top 10 players on the PGA Tour money list that season, the exception coming at the Canadian Open. He won nine of the 20 tournaments he played.

Unless he changes his schedule, Singh will have played 29 times in 2004. He beat Woods head-to-head in Boston to replace him at No. 1 in the world, and he also held off Woods at the Buick Open.

But three of Singh's victories — 84 Lumber, Houston Open, New Orleans — included only one other player from the top five in the world ranking.

Margin of victory: Singh's most dominant victory this year came at Pebble Beach, where he started the final round tied with Arron Oberholser and won by three shots. Woods won five tournaments in 2000 by at least four shots, two of those by double digits (15 shots at the U.S. Open, 11 shots at the NEC Invitational).

Both players won twice in a playoff.

Woods won his nine tournaments by a combined 46 shots. Singh has won eight times by a combined 11 shots.

Money: Although the seasons are only four years apart, the money is substantially higher in 2004 than it was when Woods set the record of $9.1 million in 2000.

Singh has played in 18 tournaments with at least a $5 million purse; Woods played in only six of those in 2000. Singh has played 26 tournaments with a total purse of $139.6 million; Woods played 20 tournaments with a total purse of $77.3 million. Comparatively, Woods won 11.8 percent of the purse he played for in 2000; Singh has won 6.8 percent of the purse he has played for this year.

In other words, if prize money in 2000 were equal to 2004, Woods would have earned $13,336,932.

Scoring: Singh leads the PGA Tour with a 68.92 adjusted scoring average, giving him a .02 lead over Phil Mickelson. Woods set the record in 2000 at 67.79, which was nearly 1 1/2 strokes better than Mickelson.

Woods was under par in every tournament and played his final 47 rounds (including three majors) at par or better.

Harrington responds to Goose

By Curt Sylvester
Knight Ridder Newspapers

DETROIT (KRT) — Mild-mannered, speak-no-evil Joey Harrington fired back Monday at the Fox broadcasters — most notably former lineman Tony Siragusa — who referred to him as a "champagne and caviar" and "strawberries with chocolate" type of player.

Siragusa, a Fox sideline reporter, made his comments Sunday during the Lions' 30-13 loss to Philadelphia.

"Am I supposed to care what he says?" Harrington asked.

"I'm not his kind of guy? Why, because I was cordial in the production meeting? Because I tried to be articulate? Because I smile when I play? Because I enjoy myself out there? Because I'm not a Billy Bad-Ass?

"I was raised a certain way. I was raised to be polite, I was raised to look someone in the eye and when they ask you a question, you answer it."

Siragusa belittled Harrington, the Lions' quarterback, during an exchange with announcers Dick Stockton and Daryl Johnston.

"He seemed a little different than what I expected," Siragusa said. "I thought he was a little bit too over-confident in the meeting, just a different kind of guy.

"Not a meat-and-potato guy. Very sophisticated man. That's as much as I can go into right now."

Johnston: "More champagne and caviar than meat and potatoes?"

Siragusa: "Yeah, I wouldn't see him going out and ordering a beer any time soon."

Stockton: "In other words, he may not be your kind of guy, Goose?"

one but two freshmen. Thorunn Ionsdottir and Debbie Nelson, making significant impact on her squad.

Ionsdottir is tied for the team lead in goals with three, and has one assist. Nelson, a 5-8 forward, has two goals and two assist. She is third on the team in points with six.

St. Bonaventure has also been pleasantly surprised with the play of forward Jacquee Permiter. Parmiter has played the role of playmaker as she has set up seven goals so far this season.

She also has a knack for putting the ball in the net herself, as she is third on the team in goals with three.

There is also Carrie Holland from the University of Richmond. Though she has only tallied one goal so far, it might have been the biggest goal of the season. Her first score was the game winner against No. 7 Tennessee.

UMass has also been the beneficiary of two last adjusting freshmen. Forward Britt Canfield and Midfielder Jenny Roehrig have provided the majority of the offense for the Minutewomen each drilling home three goals each.

Other freshmen have been making an impact on the defensive end. Dayton's Courtney Simrans was named to the Soccer America team of the week for her play against Virginia Tech and LSU on Sept. 10 and 12.

Simrans had the game-tying goal against the Huskies and then in the following game helped anchor the Flyer defense to shut out Louisiana State. St. Joseph's goalkeeper Jennifer Kuhn has also preformed well so far in her first season. Kuhn has posted a 1.36 goals against average to go along with 33 saves and two shutouts.

UMass looks for two in a row

By Paula Aden
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team (2-7) continues its 10-game home stand tonight against Providence. The non-conference action, originally scheduled as an away game, will begin at 7 p.m. under the lights at Garber Field.

The Friars (4-7) and Minutewomen have been facing each other every year since 1982, with an all-time series record of 18-5 in favor of UMass.

The Maroon and White have not defeated Providence since a 1-0 victory in 2000, when the game came down to penalty strokes after four overtimes. Last year, Providence defeated UMass in overtime, 2-1.

With 15 returning letter winners for the Friars and 16 for the Minutewomen, both teams can remember last year's tight match. Massachusetts goalie Christine Tocco made eight saves in the game, keeping the game scoreless until the last five minutes of regulation, when Melissa McGow scored to tie the game.

McGow's goal forced play into overtime, where the Friars secured a victory off of Stefanie Suenholtz's game winner, assisted by Katharine Lary.

Providence lost Suenholtz to graduation, but McGow and Lary will be returning with the Friars in an attempt to repeat last year's success. McGow currently leads the team in assists (10) and points (16). Lary has had five goals this season, including one game winner, and boasts a shots on goal percentage of .722. Amy Phillips is the Friar's leader in goals (7), shots (41), and shots on goal (21). Of Phillips's seven goals, three have been game winners.

For the Minutewomen, Caitlin Beresin leads in points (14) and goals (12), while Jaime Bawden has taken the most shots (17). Marije Tigchelaar, Katelyn Woolfrey, and Kiwlan Jaggassar have each tallied one assist.

Last year, UMass dominated the first half of the game, but grew tired in the second half and allowed Providence to take control. The Minutewomen's loss of intensity in the second half gave the Friars the opportunity to score, and eventually take the victory.

UMass was reminded of these lessons in Sunday's game against Vermont. The Minutewomen came out slow after halftime, and nearly allowed the Catamounts to do what the Friars did last year. This reminder could not have come at a better time, as the Maroon and White can now focus on the important skills for tonight's game.

"They have to study, they have to understand how difficult it is to bear down and concentrate when they're tired," Massachusetts head coach Patty Shea said.

After last year's loss to the Friars, Shea lamented the team's lack of doing the simple. In preparation for this season's match, Shea echoed her sentiments from last season.

"The simpler you keep the game, the easier the game is. The simpler the decision, the more correct the decision is. If you don't do the simple, it's going the other way," Shea said.

This season, the Friars have been out shot by their opponents 205-129 and outscored 39-22, while the Minutewomen have been out shot 195-62 and outscored 26-5.

Junior midfielder Patricia Borneo takes control of the ball during the 2003 campaign. Borneo and the Minutewomen will play Providence today at Garber Field at 7 p.m.

A-10 takes on nation's best

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Staff

Several of the Atlantic 10 teams have decided to take advantage of their non-conference scheduling by slating games against some of the top teams in the nation.

Atlantic A-10 Notebook

Unfortunately, A-10 teams have not fared well into the win column, only managing one victory in eight games. The lone victory came from Richmond who defeated No. 7 Tennessee 1-0 on Sept. 16.

The majority of the losses have been close contests. Richmond lost a tough 1-0 contest to No. 10 Clemson, Dayton dropped a 3-2 decision to No. 6 Florida, and St. Joe's was defeated 2-0 by the Villanova Wildcats who have floated in and out of the Top 25.

Other A-10 schools haven't been able to keep things so close. Ohio State walloped the Musketeers of Xavier by the score of 8-1 and URI was trounced 6-0 and 4-0 by No. 13 Santa Clara and No. 21 Arizona State respectively. However, the Rams were able keep within striking distance of USC, but eventually lost a 3-2 contest to the Trojans earlier this season.

The Atlantic 10 had one last chance to improve its record against Top 25 teams as Richmond Spiders faced No. 3 Virginia in late action last night.

Fearless Freshmen

While most athletes spend their freshman season wading in to college level play, there have been a few rookies around the A-10 that have made a big splash early on this season. No one would know this better than URI Coach Lisa Cole who has not

Citgo sign to be restored after season

BOSTON — The Citgo sign familiar to Red Sox fans is undergoing a makeover, but the work won't leave the Fenway faithful in the dark.

Citgo Petroleum Corp. says renovation work on the Kenmore Square landmark, visible beyond Fenway Park's "Green Monster" left field wall, began Monday on the side facing away from the ballpark. The entire 60-by-60 foot panel will be removed and restored, meaning that part of the sign will be turned off for about two-and-a-half weeks.

The Fenway Park side of the sign will remain lit until the Red Sox season ends. That panel will then be removed and restored, officials of the Texas-based oil company said.

A malfunction caused the Citgo sign to go dark during the American League playoffs last year, leading some superstitious Red Sox fans to blame it for the team's loss to the Yankees.

"After all these years, we know how passionate Bostonians are about our sign, which is commonly referred to as a Boston landmark," Citgo president and CEO Luis Marin said in a statement Friday.

"That's why we designed our refurbishment plan to accommodate not only the baseball schedule, but also to ensure the sign is illuminated as quickly as possible once work begins."

Mayor Thomas M. Menino said the postponed renovation is one ingredient to helping the Red Sox win a World Series, something they haven't done since 1918.

Eagles flying through initial weeks

By Robb Maaddi
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — The Philadelphia Eagles had talent. Now they have swagger and personality, too.

No, these aren't the same old Eagles, who lost the last three NFC championship games. And it isn't just because they added Terrell Owens and Jevon Kearse and brought back Hugh Douglas and Jeremiah Trotter. Sure, Owens and Kearse have proved to be the missing pieces on offense and defense, helping the Eagles start 3-0 for the first time since they won four in a row to open the 1995 season.

But they've also helped provide another missing ingredient: attitude.

These Eagles are cocky and confident. They strut their stuff on the field, in the end zone and in the locker room.

When they're not connecting on long passes, Owens and quarterback Donovan McNabb are sharing laughs on the sidelines, or critiquing each other's dance moves. McNabb prefers old-school Michael Jackson routines, seemingly oblivious to the fact that the Moonwalk went out in the '80s.

Owens likes the hip-hop style, though he has stuck to flexing and posing after scoring touchdowns this season. He hammed it up at a Monday night game by giving the national TV audience a close look at his golden mouthpiece, grinning into the camera.

McNabb and Owens are also rubbing off on teammates. In Philadelphia's latest rout, a 30-13 victory at Detroit on Sunday, Mike Bartrum — yes, a third-string tight end who usually gets in just to snap on punts and kicks — became the first Eagles player penalized for excessive celebration this season.

Singh's season is one for the books

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

Vijay Singh has one month to put the final touches on what already is a masterpiece.

He won for the eighth time this year at the 84 Lumber Classic, setting the single-season earnings record with more than $9.4 million. Singh has at least three tournaments left, so the 10-10 mark — 10 victories, $10 million — is in range. And as a sign that the 41-year-old Fijian is only getting stronger, he has won five of his last six starts.

Clearly, comparisons with Tiger Woods are inevitable.

As long as the year is 1999 — not 2000.

Five years ago, Woods launched a spectacular finish to the season by winning the PGA Championship at Medinah. He became No. 1 in the world, shattered the single-season money record and wound up with eight tour victories, winning five of his last six starts.

Singh is every bit as good as that.

But no one stacks up against Woods in 2000, the modern standard of greatness.

"Tiger won three majors in 2000," Singh said. "You can't beat three majors. It's so much more difficult to win major events than normal tournaments. I'm just going to try to enjoy my own good season."

Indeed. Singh should take a bow.

He joins Woods (1999, 2000), Johnny Miller (1974) and Arnold Palmer (1960, 1962) as the only players since 1960 to have won at least eight PGA Tour events in one year. If he were to run the table and finish with 11 victories, that would tie for third all-time behind Byron Nelson (18 in 1945) and Ben Hogan (13 in 1946). Sam Snead also won 11 in 1950.

Still, Singh's phenomenal season only illustrates how dominant Woods was in 2000, when he won nine times, captured the final three majors and set or tied 27 records.

"To me, that's still the best year anybody ever had," Stewart Cink said. "Unfortunately for Vijay, he doesn't have any more major tournaments this year."

Everyone remembers the majors, but that was only a part of

Forum stirs tension within student body as fingers point toward Vice Chancellor

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Nine students whose questionable behavior was revealed in photos taken last March were dubbed by a panel as the "The KKK Nine," in a forum entitled "How to Live and Learn in a Diverse Community."

The panel included distinguished faculty members, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano and Student Government President Eduardo Bustamante. About 250 students attended to discuss the most recent situation and to ask questions.

All agreed that the culture of the University of Massachusetts campus must change, although many people including faculty members strongly opposed Gargano's inconclusive decisions regarding the potential punishments of the nine students involved in the controversial pictures.

Student representatives including Speaker of the SGA Patrick Higgins were photographed last March drinking alcohol and mocking a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard.

Gargano received a great deal of criticism regarding his intentions. African Latino Asian Native American staff member Gladys Franco specifically asked Gargano why the students have not yet resigned.

"I have urged these students to resign," Gargano emphasized, "if the Student Government Association doesn't move on it, I will. Are we clear? Resign!"

He also has not ruled out expulsion, however, he said that educating these people is extremely important.

"Sanctions can range from warning to dismissal, but in this world everyone has the right to free speech. We may not like that but that's the law," Gargano said over a booing crowd.

Gargano insisted that now is the time for students to get involved in SGA and the upcoming elections that were postponed until next week.

"This has never been a better time to support SGA," he said. "Please run for office, please vote. The SGA is very important to UMass and so I ask you to support President Bustamante. I am currently suspending certain rules so that the SGA can move forward, therefore I encourage participation."

President of SGA Eduardo Bustamante told the crowd that no formal resignation has been submitted to him despite his assumption that it would have been done Monday morning.

"No one that I know of has submitted a resignation," Bustamante said, "the only person who is still running for Senate is the Student Coordinator for SCERA (Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy) but his position can be removed."

Brian Roberts, the Student Coordinator for SCERA and the person who allegedly snapped many of the photos and posted them on his own website has not made any public statement to the SGA, the student body or the administration.

Bustamante stressed that this is not an isolated incident but rather the latest of a series of recent events on this campus.

"What I want to stress is that it's not about this specific incident it's about the environment we created," Bustamante said. "We have allowed our student government to be in the dark for a long time. It's up to us. It is our right, our responsibility to become intricately involved in our own government."

Bustamante noted that ALANA has been struggling for a long time and this incident might "be a wake-up call to the administration."

As for the elections, Bustamante said that this is the time for students to research the candidates and to understand where the candidates stand on the issues.

"Come out next week. We are going to take ownership and make it what we want and we will be listened to."

Hundreds of students gather in the Campus Center Auditorium at a forum entitled "How to Live and Learn in a Diverse Community" last night. Members of the SGA and administration attended.

Students say election delay a good thing

By Jeremy Dirac
Collegian Staff

Although the Student Government Association senate elections have been postponed until next Wednesday, many University of Massachusetts students seemed to agree that the Chancellor of Elections' decision to delay the elections was a good one.

One reason given was that students judgment will be blurred after photographs showing members of the SGA and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) group drinking in a University office and making references to the Ku Klux Klan.

"I think it's a very good idea to postpone (the elections), because when you've got something controversial like this and something so important like an election people could be swayed by it," said sophomore business major Ben McDonald.

Others felt that not enough information is available to students in order to make the right voting decisions, but hope that the controversy will fuel an interest in voting.

"I think it's a good idea. I noticed a lot of people haven't been campaigning a lot. It gives people more of an opportunity to take it more seriously, especially after recent events," said Kim Johnson, sophomore exercise and neuroscience major.

16 students interviewed by The Massachusetts Daily Collegian agreed that the behavior shown in the photos was inappropriate. People differed on their agreement to what degree the behavior was inappropriate. Some were more concerned with the underage drinking by student leaders, others with the representation of SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins in a outfit that is meant to depict the garb of members of the Ku Klux Klan.

"It's sort of a shock, very irresponsible. It's exactly what people would expect from UMass kids. It's unfortunate to fulfill the stereotype," said senior journalism major Adrienne Bossi, who said she was bothered to see drinking within the SCERA office.

Junior psychology major Amber Sargent said she was also bothered by the drinking.

"I definitely don't think they should be in office if they were underage drinking. But I don't know about expulsion."

Senior economics major Mas Theodat II was bothered mainly by the caricature of SGA Speaker Patrick Higgins in a Ku Klux Klan outfit, and hoped that the postponing of the elections would give people time to understand the scandal and vote against those involved based on that information.

"It'll give people time to actually digest and realize who they are. A lot of truth comes out when you're drunk ... I know that those people were racist, but finally the truth comes out."

"Those images shouldn't be trotted out in any context and the fact that [Higgins] was comfortable with putting up those images in that place is disturbing," said a member of the African Latino Asian Native American (ALANA) community.

W.E.B. DuBois Library construction battles severe flooding; students and staff complain of disturbing workers' racket

By Brian Duffy
Collegian Correspondent

Construction work on the exterior deck of the W.E.B. DuBois Library has caused severe leakage in the library basement, causing rows of bookcases to be hidden behind heavy tarps for protection. Workers from Gardner Engineering, the project's contractor, worked throughout the night on Tuesday battling leaks from several spots in the ceiling.

"You always run into certain things you can't anticipate," said Gardner Superintendent Ian Judson.

The exterior deck was supposed to be completed by last summer. "This project has been a long time coming," said Henry Merriman Jr., the Capital Project Manager for the Facilities Planning Division.

"We're not excited about the construction, but we're excited about the possibilities for when the construction is finished," said Library Director Ian Schafer.

Both Merriman and Schafer admit the project has been problematic. This summer, there were two separate incidents of concrete falling through the ceilings.

Some library personnel who usually work on the main floor have been relocated to higher floors to avoid the construction and Schafer said he has given each employee this option.

"It's not turned out the way we had planned," said Emily Silverman, Communications Specialist and Reference Librarian.

The library was also closed over the summer in the morning and on weekends due to demolition work.

"We're trying to get the job done as soon as possible," said Judson.

In the meantime, Merriman has suggested that the library close study areas near the staircases on the main floor because of a potential for leakage issues. He says that study areas on the opposite side of the main floor are safer for students, as the southern and western end of the deck above this safe zone was successfully waterproofed this past weekend.

According to Project Superintendent Ian Judson, the fenced-in walkway is next in line to be torn apart for waterproofing. The walkway is located directly above the rows of computers on the basement level, which could be a potential problem if severe leaking were to occur.

Judson says there will be "minimal if any" leaking above the computers. "We will put somewhat closer attention to this area," he said.

For many members of the library staff and students, the noise from the construction has been a major inconvenience. Reference librarian Liz Fitzpatrick said there were several complaints by students on Saturday about the noise caused by the construction.

"It's been very noisy, it's been a lot more inconvenient than we thought. It's been a tough project for the staff and the students," said Fitzpatrick.

Mandy Rudi, a sophomore who works at the library's information desk, said that students have been complaining to her about the noise on the main floor and have sought out alternative places to study.

Ryan McSheehy, a sophomore transfer student who also works at the information desk, said she has faced difficulties in locating information for students. She said that the construction has caused a confusing reorganization.

"It's distracting," said senior political science major Josh Risen. Risen routinely studies at the library for several hours daily and said he has been forced to leave on several occasions due to the noise.

Merriman said the exterior construction would most likely be completed by the beginning of the 2005-2006 school year.

Book shelves in the library basement remain covered in plastic tarps to shield the volumes from the leaking ceiling on Tuesday.

Construction will soon begin above the room where the public computers sit, which could cause problems if more leaking occurs.

Lecture highlights first-ever Audubon Day at UMass

By Charles Caldi
Collegian Correspondent

Columbus Day Weekend is usually the peak week for fall foliage in the Pioneer Valley area that is looked forward to by University of Massachusetts community and other residents of the rural Pioneer Valley.

However, keeping natural environments such as the Five College Area away from urbanization has become the center for concern for many local non-profits and environmentalists.

Many organizations such as Mass Audubon work hard to maintain the area green and raise awareness about the importance of our natural surroundings.

Today, several environmentalists and naturalists will inaugurate the first Massachusetts Audubon Day at the University of Massachusetts. Events will consist of lectures on different fields of environmental. The event will take place from 5 p.m. to 8:30 p.m. in Memorial Hall.

The host of Audubon Day, University Store General Book Manager Wally Swist feels that it is important to raise awareness about the growing urbanization of the Pioneer Valley and the possible negative effects of it.

"I'm a self-proclaimed naturalist, nature is really important to me and there is less and less green space in the Valley," Swist

'Hijacking Catastrophe' film attracts large local audience

Collegian Correspondent

The showing of 'Hijacking Catastrophe', a film created by University of Massachusetts Communications Professor Sut Jhally and communication Ph.D. candidate Jeremy Earp, was shown twice Tuesday evening due to an unexpectedly large audience.

"We didn't really expect this many people," said Jhally.

Jhally and Earp produced the film in conjunction with the Media Education Foundation.

The film presents the notion that the Bush administration had intentions of invading Iraq prior to the events that unfolded on Sept. 11, 2001. It also suggests that a small group of right wing Republicans had formulated this plan long before George W. Bush was elected President.

subject matter, laughter from the audience was consistent throughout the movie. Many times the crowd laughed at comments made by President Bush, a former high school cheerleader, and other members of his staff.

"I'm a war president with war on my mind," President Bush said grinning. Referring to Saddam Hussein, he said, "He is a homicidal dictator who's addicted to weapons of mass destruction." The packed crowd roared in unified laughter after both of these comments.

"He's a coward, he lied to us, he bushwhacked us," said Scott Ritter, retired Marine Corps major and former U.N. weapons inspector. Ritter, along with others interviewed for the film, were not paid. Both Jhally and Earp said they received remarkable cooperation from individuals like Ritter while making the film.

The film stated that the United States is spending roughly $400 billion annually on the military budget. It also estimates the country will be in debt in an amount of $7 trillion by the end of this year.

"[The film] was very powerful," said Emily West, a professor of communications at UMass.

After the film, Jhally and Earp fielded questions from the audience. When asked how people can spread the film's message to individuals who disagree, Jhally said that there are those who are basically unreachable and unwilling to hear the opposing side. However, he said he is optimistic that there are many people who are open to new ideas.

Jhally also explained that he and members of the Media Education Foundation are working diligently to expose this film to as many people, in as many places as possible.

Jhally said that he is grateful to Michael Moore, the creator of the documentary "Fahrenheit 9-11," for opening the door for wider interest in political documentaries. He said it is essential that all Americans question their leaders.

"These people [President Bush and his staff] are not Americans, not in the American tradition. The founding fathers would call them traitors," Jhally said.

The film is available on VHS and DVD at Hijacking-Catastrophe.org.

Jhally will show the film at UMass before the November election.

To Swist, this is not just an event on Green Politics; it's also a way of introducing the audience to authors and researches who aren't very well known.

"There are books I want people to know about. I'm honoring Mass Audubon, the writers, and UMass Press," he said.

There will be six lecturers at this event, including Boston University Professor Thomas Conuel, author of "Quabbin: the Accidental Wilderness." The book tells the story of how four towns and six villages in the Swift River Valley of Massachusetts were flooded to make way for the Quabbin water reservoir.

Harvard faculty member Jane Brox, will be citing from her most recent book "Clearing Land: Legacies of the American Farm." Her first book "Here and Nowhere Else" won the L.L. Winship/PEN New England Award.

Principal ecologist for the Friends of the Mohawk Trail State Forest, Robert Leverett will be reading from "The Sierra Club Guide to the Ancient Forests of the Northeast," which he co-authored with Bruce Kershner.

Distinguished UMass Professor in the Department of Geosciences Lynn Margulis who received the National Medal of Science from President Bill Clinton in 1999, will be reading from the book she co-edited with Clifford Matthews and Aaron Haselton, "Environmental Evolution: Effects of the Origin of Evolution and Life on Planet Earth."

that the elections should have gone forward, however.

"I think it's an abuse of power and Eddie took two previous elections as a mandate that he hasn't rightly earned ... I think the fact that this came out this week and not three weeks ago or three weeks from now implies someone knew what they were doing," said senior political science major Sasha Horwitz.

Senior economics major Jessica Jorgensen had similar feelings. She said that "[Bustamante] definitely had something to do with releasing the pictures.

"I think that they should let people run and let the students decide. People get caught doing stupid things. Since I know them [those in the pictures,] I know that they were joking. I think you have to look at the context. People were calling Higgins a racist ... it wasn't like a hate crime, it was just them being stupid," Jorgensen said.

Fred Phillips, a sophomore communications major, is not worried that the scandal will reflect negatively on UMass and doesn't care about the SGA.

"I don't think it's all that bad really. Is the school going to cease to function? No. It doesn't affect anybody's life."

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 2004 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Encouraging the first steps

Mike Anmuth

The trouble with writing an opinion column is that you have to have an opinion on something. Recently, most of my opinions have been focused on trying to get acclimated here at UMass as an older transfer student.

When I say older, I'm only talking 21 years old and when I say a transfer, I mean I'm coming in as a junior. Still, I'm no longer a wide-eyed freshman of 18, seeing the world anew as parental control and bedtimes disappear in favor of wandering around at 3 a.m. and experiencing those from places which I had never heard of before. No, transferring in at 21 creates its own challenges and advantages that I had never considered before setting foot here in early September.

I considered a lot of things when I first arrived here. Perhaps I shouldn't have taken an entire academic year off to travel, or I should have listened to my parents who insisted that continuous schooling was the way to get a degree and then ultimately get a job. Maybe I should have stayed at the school I went to before, which shall go unnamed, but I don't recall a fondness for it or else I would still be there. No, this challenge was something that I wanted and needed to make not just a good story to tell at bars, but also a transition that would make me into a better person.

As a transfer, I found a lot in common with the freshmen who have just arrived here. I didn't know many people. I had to make friends in order to survive, and I looked perplexedly at the campus map, which contained strange sounding buildings like the Chenoweth Lab Addition and Dickinson (not to be confused, I learned on my first day, with Dickinson Hall.)

Since I was active in high school, in college I wanted to join a whole bunch of student organizations and get involved on campus to make it feel smaller and more at home. I won't tell you this has been an easy process, or that I'm now the most popular guy on campus. Chances are, you've never heard of me, and chances are, you may never.

The reason every person comes to UMass is different, but every person should feel like they're an important part of the university.

As transfer students get acclimated to new surroundings, we face the same challenges that we did as freshmen except we're older now, some of us wiser, and most of us still looking for an identity in college.

I felt this was important to write about because I know that I'm not the only person in my situation. In fact, according to UMass's website, 1,153 transfer students enrolled in the 2003 transfer class. While I'm part of the 2004 transfer class, I can imagine the statistics are similar this year, which means there are probably over 1,000 other people in my shoes. I want to reach out to this community and say sometimes it's easy to adjust, sometimes it's hard to adjust, and sometimes adjustment comes when we least expect it.

My advice to transfer students is to get involved, get a place that feels comfortable and make it your own. What other university has so much opportunity in student organizations? What campus has events like the movie on the top of the Campus Center every weekend, or the ability to watch athletics like our beloved Minutemen and Minutewomen? The reason every person comes to UMass is different, but every person should feel like they're an important part of the university.

While I've only been here a short time, and oddly enough I get to write my opinion after only a couple of weeks, I've tried to make the most of my experience, and it's become an enjoyable process. I will fully admit that I'm not adjusted yet to UMass life, nor is it adjusted to me, but I like to consider everything in life a learning experience and this is one great example.

I can only conclude by saying that the possibilities here are endless. A Chinese proverb by Lao-Tzu says, "A journey of a thousand miles begins with a single step." Each step we transfers take in this new adventure at the University of Massachusetts brings us closer to our journey of feeling like a part of the school, a part of the community and ultimately gaining a second home here in Amherst.

The dos and don'ts of the game

Ben Feder

First off, men are idiots and women are crazy. You can even switch the adjectives and the idea is still the same. Truth is, no one knows any more about the opposite sex than they did when they first passed the "will you go out with me? Circle yes or no" note to their 7th-grade biology lab partner. Over the years I've learned things about men and women that may prove useful to those new to the college dating pool. So grab your floaties and let's dive in.

First, some guidelines:

For the men, don't cheat. You're bad at lying and you will always get caught. Even though you'll try to hide your little affair, you will soon brag about it or even slip to your friends about how you've doubled your pleasure and doubled your fun. And when you are caught, you have to deal with that whole loss of trust thing.

Don't lie. You're simple-minded creatures that can only hold so much capacity for rational thought beyond hungry, sleepy, and horny, so try and keep the amount of brain activity to a minimum. It's much easier and fruitful to avoid lying and it saves a lot of energy on your part. This is energy you'd much rather utilize for that horny priority.

Whether it's your significant other or a drunken fling, that bond is still made. The more times you hook up, the stronger the bond gets, and eventually the more you start to like and enjoy the other person.

Be honest. Whoever you're trying to impress will appreciate it in the long run. Furthermore, you won't send out any mix messages or signals. Plus you can worry about more important matters, like how to remedy that horny priority that has been on your brain since you woke up this morning and ate breakfast.

Another thing, don't be a jackass. The world is full of stupid people and stupid people imitating stupid people. You were taught manners so demonstrate them and leave the trucker hat at home.

Now for the women, don't cheat. You are much better at hiding things than men are but women are also excellent gatherers of information. You're secret will soon be leaked from person to person until it is revealed to the one individual you were hiding it from.

Say what you mean. You are complex, with many undertones and layers that make up who you are and that's great. But understand that many people might not be that complex, and what you think is an obvious signal, sign or waving red flag, might be perceived by others as nothing at all.

Also, say what you want. Many times you don't voice your opinions or preferences and that is very annoying, especially for birthdays! What you have to say matters so speak up about it so all those inner desires can finally be fulfilled.

Now, some ground rules.

There is no such thing as hook-up friends. When you hook-up with someone, your brain is making an emotional connection with him or her. Whether it's your significant other or a drunken fling, that bond is still made. The more times you hook up, the stronger the bond gets, and eventually the more you start to like and enjoy the other person. Now you want something more, unfortunately, the other person does not. The bond is broken and feelings are hurt. Heartache sucks.

Don't ask, "what are you thinking about?" This is the most annoying question because it completely wipes the mind of any thought. So the only cognitive answer is "I don't know," or "nothing," and that just angers the person asking the question. I'm sure your partner is deep so why not throw him or her off guard and ask them something more specific?

Don't say things you don't mean to win arguments. Fighting with someone is hard enough already, especially when one person tries to defeat the other with some outrageous and hurtful comment in the interest of winning the fight. For example, you didn't "sleep with a hundred people" after you and your ex broke up. You still care about the person and you probably haven't moved on yet since you are still fighting in the first place. So relax and be rational.

Don't divulge too much information about past relationships to your new interest. He or she doesn't want to hear about your past ex and how cheap, shallow, stupid, crazy, bipolar, sexy, hot, or well-endowed and gifted they were. All they want to hear is how much better they are compared to the flings of the past.

I guess my advice to everyone is to not overreact. Dating can be very simple once you eliminate the mind games, suspicion and craziness and just stick to simplicity. In retrospect, men and women are not totally different in seeking their final goal: a warm body to sleep beside and someone they can brag to all their friends about. We're still young and have the rest of our lives ahead of us so let's not get too carried away.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:
A CONTROVERSY'S CONSEQUENCES

NOT SO DISHEARTENING AFTER ALL

What I see in "the photos," as they have come to be known, is a group of friends drinking socially and having some fun. If that is a crime then I believe the majority of this University would have to plead guilty. Maybe we just shouldn't have fun anymore, because it seems like whenever we try to have a little fun, someone gets screwed. Sure they shouldn't have been drinking in the SCERA office, and sure they shouldn't have drawn the caricature on the board, but c'mon people, since when have we not been able to take a joke, because that's all it was, a joke.

Some people get caught up in the moment and forget this is the Student Government we're talking about, "student" being the key word. We're not dealing with our nation's government here. This is small scale, small beans type of stuff. This is no "blue dress" scandal.

Gargano was quoted in the Collegian saying, "I have the authority to remove these people from office," and "I could give them 500 hours of community service ... " I believe Gargano should not trip over his ego, calm down with the harsh allegations, and not let ALANA force him into doing something he shouldn't. Just like ALANA has done in the past, they will start calling people racists, just to get things done their way. The following is a quote from The Republican: "Higgins, a senior history major from Milton, told The Republican Sunday night that the party came as a way of letting off steam after a "semester's worth of absurdity" of being called racist in a heated contest for student government president with Eduardo E. Bustamante of Amherst." I agree with senior Jen Clark who was quoted in the Collegian saying "I am deeply saddened to see individuals within the ALANA office throwing the racism word at anyone who opposes or questions their actions."

I am in no way pointing fingers at ALANA but it would be the first place I'd turn to try and find who publicized the photos. The fact that the photos were brought to the public only days before the SGA senate elections is quite suspicious, and there's a rumor saying ALANA wants to gain a majority on the senate board so they can have more things go their way. It has been said that the photos were taken off the Internet over the summer, so an anonymous someone must have been holding on to them waiting for the right time to publicize them. Why is someone trying to ruin the lives of these SGA and SCERA members over a trifle of an incident? There are more reasons for why ALANA has disheartening feelings towards the SGA. Previously, ALANA had a certain number of seats on their board set aside for minorities, last year the SGA took these appointed seats away, seats ALANA enjoyed having.

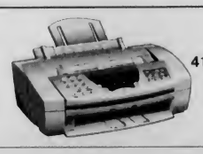
Why has no one mentioned all the good things these SGA and SCERA members have done. One little mishap and now they're being asked to resign from their positions. I want everyone who reads this who is bothered by what happened to take a chill pill, take a breather, take a break, and just let it go. I still believe we have a great SGA that does great things. So go ahead and kick them all out of office and get inexperienced and unmotivated students in there and let's just see what happens. It'll make for a comical semester.

Kenneth M. Anderson
UMass Student

ELECTION INSTABILITY TROUBLING

The Student Government Association's backroom decision to postpone elections 12 hours before the first ballots were to be cast was irresponsible. The SGA's arbitrary decision once again reflects that it is unable to run clean elections — after all, they knew months before that the polling stations would be understaffed. After appointing a Chancellor of Elections and hiring a professional staff to assist with the elections, the SGA was still somehow unable get itself together on Election Day.

While it is important for students to have enough time to make an informed decision, SGA's recent display of gross incompetence and corrupt behavior has made it clear that the organization has crossed the border into illegitimacy. It is bad enough that those self-incriminating idiots who lead the Student Senate have made a disgrace of the SGA, but the SGA's postponing and overturning elections have made the electoral process here look like an ugly stepchild of Iraqi democracy.



If the SGA is unable to hold its own elections, how can we trust them to properly appropriate funds for students and advocate for students? We cannot trust them. Reform must come from outside the SGA, and in order to do so we must have clean elections.

New England's Big Event

The Big E brings food, music and more to western Massachusetts

By Meghan Healy
Collegian Staff

The streets are lined with stands selling freshly harvested pumpkins. The trees have exploded into reds, oranges and yellows. The Big E is in full swing. In New England, these are sure signs that fall has arrived.

For West Springfield, the Big E signals not only the arrival of autumn, but also the beginning of the Northeast's biggest county fair. When the trailers and trucks roll into this relatively unassuming western Massachusetts town in mid-September, they find New England in the last days of summer. By the time the exhibitioners and vendors pack-up and drive off, they leave us in the throws of fall.

In that transitional time however, New Englanders are granted three weeks of food, games, music, expositions and performances. The Big E bills itself as "the largest fair in the northeast with participants and guests that come from along the eastern seaboard as well as throughout the country."

Started in 1916, the Big E was originally a chance for New Englanders to stock up on wares for the coming winter. Attendees were given the chance to put display their livestock and compete in agricultural competitions. From its humble beginnings a regional tradition was born, a tradition that still strives to keep the spirit of the Big E alive today. Hundreds of livestock exhibitions, a horse show and the Avenue of Agriculture keep the farm-inspired beginnings of the Big E current.

For the scores of suburban families and local teens, however, it isn't the sheep shearing demonstrations and tractor exhibits that lure thm in. The Big E also offers a wide variety of shopping, carnival rides and entertainment. Performances by Clay Aiken, of "American Idol" fame, pop-opera group Amici Forever and '80s sensation Heart, have already played the Comcast Stage.

Fellow "Idol" alum Kimberly Locke will play the stage this Saturday and the fair will go out with a bang as pop star Jessica Simpson will peform at 7 p.m. Simpson, who has gained noterity starring on the MTV reality show, "Newlyweds" with husband Nick Lachey, will be the finale to the three weeks of entertainment. Both Locke and Simpson's shows are free with the price of admission to the fair.

In additon to goods from across the Atlantic, the Big E offers up a wide selection of food. The now-famous Big-Eclair is availible for fair-goers to both watch being made, as well as sampling the goods. For those looking for a classier dining experience the Storrowton Tavern offers up both regional favorites and pub style food as well.

Fans of artery-clogging cuisine need not worry; all the old favorites are still avaliable. The Big E offers the usual carnival fare — cotton candy, fried dough and hotdogs. At every step of the way there is another cart or kiosk, ablaze in colored and flashing lights, selling deep fried oreos or various meats on a stick.

For those on a tight budget, the Avenue of the States, a row of six houses, each dedicated to a different New England state, and the exposition centers are the loophole. Free samples of fudge, dips, soups and assorted other foods are in large supply and could be enough to fill you up. Make sure to check out the cider in Vermont House, even though it's not free, it's worth the $2.

The Big E will close its gates this Sunday at 9 p.m. Although the Big E marks the end of summer, it is a fitting way to welcome autumn to the Pioneer Valley.

Admission is $15 for adults. Check out www.thebige.com for more information.

Eve's trip down Rt.9

Original Sin

Eve

There are some things in life that really are better left unsaid.

But this story, this occurrence, is simply too amusing to let go. He lives in the only house on Route 9. Many of you have probably been to his infamous house parties before, but I happened to go to the very first opening party this summer, and that was my first mistake.

My second was spending the night with him, my best friend. I prefer not to cross those boundaries unless I must. And that one night has definitely changed our relationship for a while. I met him last summer on the Vineyard. We played a game of pool against each other, and he won. Later, I find out he also attends UMass. What a coincidence.

We grew overwhelmingly close in just a short period of time, so close that we were already too platonic to be physical, but that was on the Vineyard. By late summer, we both parted and vowed to reunite once school began. I went home to Boston and he moved into the Route 9 house early. So naturally, I decided to visit the following weekend.

What can I say? I missed the guy. There we were, happily reunited as friends, once again. Until he says, "I don't want this to ruin our friendship, but why don't you stay over?" He smiled devilishly and pulled me close to his body. He felt so good, so comfortable and I couldn't refuse.

One too many drinks later, and with one remaining guest at the party, I decided to crawl into his bed. He followed shortly after, jumping on the bed and kissing me passionately. He is exceptionally big compared to me. In length, muscular width and weight. One of his hands can easily cover my stomach, and the other can easily pick me up and toss me quite far, but two hands can cause a scene, and that is what he did. He flipped me around on his bed forcefully and all of a sudden we hear, crack! We looked at each other fearfully and we fall directly onto the hardwood floor. He broke the bed and we laughed because that is all we could do. We stood up and surveyed the damage.

"I made that bed by hand," he said half-smiling. I rolled my eyes at his craftsmanship and put on one of his button down shirts to cover up. I had to go to the bathroom, and the nearest one was on the other side of the beer pong area. His shirt was an oversized dress on me, but that was better than nothing.

I turned the knob to his bedroom door and pulled. His door was definitely not opening. I tugged, I pulled, and I even put one foot up for extra power and nothing. We were locked in. The doorknob was somehow stuck.

"Did you make this too?" I asked giggling.

"Yup." He answered proudly. "I made the door and the handle part." He stopped and realized what had happened.

"Wow, the only way we can fix this is through the other side."

I looked at him, then the window, then at him again.

"Fine. I'll jump out of the window." I opened the window and realized that the jump was a mere 12 feet. No big deal. I jumped out and landed on my butt. I ran around the side of the house, neglecting to realize I was on Route 9 in a shirt-dress with no shoes. I approached the front door and then let myself in.

We worked on his door for an hour, and finally decided to take it off completely. He grabbed his mighty screwdriver and knocked the hinges off the sides. He leaned it up against the wall and looked at me, "come, we need to go to bed."

I nodded my head, over exhausted and aching with bruises.

We ended up falling asleep on an old futon filled with sawdust, and covered ourselves with one small blanket. That was all we could do.

His roommate woke up later that day and stood in his doorway stunned. "What happened?" were the first words I woke up to. I sat up slowly and looked around in disbelief at the demolished area.

I smiled and replied. "Long story, you'll read about it later," and went back to sleep.

Puppets bring new twist to old classic

El Chonchon's Romeo and Juliet
Tonight
Rand Theater
UMass
$5, $8

While you may think you've seen every style of William Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet," from the stage to the screen, El Chonchon's Puppet Theater is here tonight to prove you wrong. The Argentinean troupe of puppeteers will challenge any viewer's typical perspective of what traditional Shakespearean theater consists of.

El Chonchon uses hand puppets for players. Each puppet is dressed up in miniature costumes. They even have quirky set design to match. Their rendition of "Romeo and Juliet" aims at being original, and breaking all the rules of traditional Shakespearean theater as they set out to convey the story of the famous star-crossed lovers.

El Chonchon, the Spanish-speaking troupe from Argentina was originally founded by Miguel Oyarzun from Valparaiso, Chile in 1979 at the age of 11. Beginning in 1989, Oyarzun formed his ensemble and the puppet theater company began touring Argenti-na, Chile, Brazil, Uruguay, Spain, and the United States. Along with Shakes-peare, other works by playwrights Javier Villafane, Ro-berto Espina, Oro Freytas, and Federico Garcia Lorca have been staged using El Chonchon's Puppet Theater.

According to a press release for the event, El Chonchon's Puppet Theater "is equally concerned with exploring the universe of hand-puppet animation, the relationship between object and character and what distinguishes puppets from other forms of expression."

Puppetry, an age-old art, has existed in our society and in diverse cultures for many centuries. It has been widely used to aid in both education and entertainment. Still, while puppet shows have notoriously been categorized as a juvenile dimension of theater, El Chonchon feels that the subject matter opens itself to audiences 12 years of age and older in revealing the deepest meaning of "Romeo and Juliet."

"They are informal, unhurried and unpredictable. They improvise on the fly. They put themselves right into the audience, and may spontaneously leave the stage to interact with the kids in the audience." — "El Adelantado de Segovia" (Spain)

The performance will be in Spanish tonight at the Rand Theater beginning at 7:30 p.m.

Butoh, or "stomping dance," is a Japanese form of modern dance that appeared after World War II. Based on the highly ornate and showy Japanese dance-theater form called Kabuki, it features splashy costumes and hairstyles, but most importantly, emotionally charged dancing. Butoh involves no learned steps or styles; Butoh is said to be easiest for untrained dancers, because they have nothing to unlearn. The best-known Butoh performances involve dancers, their skin painted white and their hair tangled and ragged or shaved completely, contorted in agonizingly slow gestures that interpret nature.

This Friday, students will have the opportunity to see a very different kind of Butoh: Akira Kasai will perform "Pollen Revolution" right here in UMass Amherst. Kasai's dancing is energetic and choppy, full of jumps and twitches and frenzied motions. His music combines traditional Japanese, electronic, hip-hop, and classic rock forms. Groundbreaking dance within a groundbreaking dance form? Absolutely.

When he first performed "Pollen Revolution" in April 2001 at 59, Kasai rocked the modern dance world with his use of hip-hop in his routine and dance techniques. In an interview Kasai explained that "Hip-hop came from the bottom of the social pyramid; Butoh came from the underground of Japanese society," he said. "In hip-hop the movements come from a very deep, soulful source, but they are at the same time sculpted from the outside — it's not just making a beautiful form, but deforming it and breaking it down. That is also an essential element of Butoh."

This is hardly strange from Kasai, who has been introducing unexpected sources and traditions into Butoh since he started practicing it in the 1960's. This show, however, has lead him to be compared to Russian ballet icon Nijinsky, who also steered away from traditional forms of dance and scandalized the art world with his experimenting.

"Pollen Revolution" is Kasai's attempt to "create infinite life." He dances three movements that seem to carry him through time: at first, he is a demure Kabuki heoine in traditional robes, but electronic noises break into the soundtrack. Soon he and the set have changed; now he wears black and dances on a harsh, bare stage. In the final movement he wears a white suit and seems to be in the future; hip-hop moves and music have taken over the piece. In his encore he dances energetically to Elvis Presley's "Heartbreak Hotel" while throwing red carnations to the audience.

Akira Kasai will perform "Pollen Revolution" in the Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. tomorrow. Tickets are $20 or $15 for adults and $10 or $7 for students. A reception will be held in the Curry Hicks Lobby from five to six (please RSVP to save a space). Call 577-2486 for more information.

Akira Kasai will perform 'Pollen Revolution' tonight at 8 p.m.

CIA's Directorate of Intelligence will be interviewing candidates for Analyst Positions.
Representatives from CIA's analytical arm, the Directorate of Intelligence, will be interviewing for analyst positions in Boston during the week of November 15th. Analysts work on the forefront of protecting national security, quickly assessing how rapidly changing international developments will impact US interests at home and abroad. They use information from classified and unclassified sources from around the world to develop and provide the reliable intelligence that is essential for US policymakers to make informed decisions. The DI is hiring for the following positions:
• Analytic Methodologist
• Collection Analyst
• Counterintelligence Threat Analyst
• Counterterrorism Analyst
• Economic, Political, Leadership and Military Analysts
• Science, Technology and Weapons Analyst
• Medical Analyst
• Psychological/Psychiatric Analyst
• Crime and Counternarcotics Analyst
Candidates must have at least a bachelor's degree with a minimum GPA of 3.0. Language skills, previous foreign area residence or travel, and relevant work experience are pluses. Candidates must successfully complete a medical examination, polygraph interview, and an extensive background investigation. All positions require US citizenship and relocation to the Washington, DC area.
The CIA is America's premier intelligence agency, and we are committed to building and maintaining a work force as diverse as the nation we serve.
For additional information, and to apply online, please visit www.cia.gov. Successful applicants who have submitted their resume by October 15th will be contacted to attend an information session and arrange a local area interview.
An equal opportunity employer and a drug-free work force.

UMass falls to BU

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team played perfect defense for 90 minutes against Boston University on Tuesday night.

It was three minutes into overtime, however, that the Minutemen (3-5-0, 0-0-0 A-10) had their one and most costly mistake.

UMass lost to the Terriers 1-0 in their first game of a five-game road stint. The Minutemen travel to Philadelphia tomorrow to take on St. Joseph's, for their first Atlantic 10 matchup.

The goal came after BU (3-4-0) did a quick throw-in from 30-yards out, which was then relayed off of Brian Conway's foot to Sedric Chin, who was sprinting to space. Chin found a seam in the UMass defense and blasted the golden goal past sophomore Nick Billman.

"I was pleased by the way we played in the back, but I was not happy with the goal," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We could have stopped it if we were more aware of the quick restart, obviously there are still things that we have to work on."

The Minutemen were playing without the services of defensive midfielder Tim Kitchell, who was sidelined for the red card he received against Harvard on Sept. 19. Koch changed his defensive strategy accordingly and played Ralph Pace and Todd Skelton in the center backfield.

Pace was the most active player on offense for UMass with four shots on the game, two of which were on goal. The Minutemen had several opportunities, including a shot for Oral Bullen from 10 feet out that was snubbed by BU keeper Chad Conroe.

Koch credited the Terrier defense, but also mentioned that the sloppy field conditions were not exactly conducive to running a smooth offense.

"BU's defense is solid. They were playing five in the back, which was difficult," Koch said. "We were playing on a wet field, which didn't really help."

A bigger game than most for Hasselbeck

go and let it control my mind.

"Despite how I feel, I have to play each play like it doesn't matter who I'm playing against."

Nonetheless, it will be difficult for Hasselbeck to stay out of the spotlight this weekend. Both of his parents will be in attendance — albeit wearing UMass colors — and the desire to prove himself to a BC coaching staff that never believed in his offensive abilities will surely be there.

"I know I can play wide receiver," Hasselbeck said. "Things kind of unraveled [at BC] after three years of playing defense and doing some special teams things, and I wanted to get out and play offense.

"My dad and brothers always told me that I had too good hands to be playing defense, and now it's up to me to show I can play."

While some may question why Hasselbeck would give up a family legacy and the many perks of playing Division I-A college football on the eve of his first meeting with his former school, he maintains that the decision was the right one.

"You know what, keep all the material stuff [that comes with playing in Division I-A], I'll take the smiles I'll have [at UMass] for the next two years instead," Hasselbeck said. "The coaches here are great and so are the players, and I'm just having a blast."

Massachusetts' coach Don Brown concurs, and knows that in the end, Hasselbeck's decision — as well as Saturday's game — doesn't involve family, tradition or anything. It's just about football.

"If you look across the country at the kids who transfer from I-A to I-AA, it has nothing to do with things like allegiances," he said. "It's more about the fact that he's just looking for the best opportunity to play the game he loves to play, wherever that may be."

Rosario and Ross meet on opposite sides

season, he missed the last seven games of the season due to injury. He has only carried the ball nine times for 28 yards this season.

"It doesn't affect me much. The better man plays, and I'm just waiting my turn," Rosario said.

Brown has integrated Rosario into special teams play to get him on the field as much as possible.

"Obviously, for us that has been a plus because his effort level is always high," Brown said. "We've been happy with his special teams play."

When Ross first came to Boston College, O'Brien moved him to defensive back to sure up that side of the ball.

"He played line [at cornerback]," O'Brien said. "A lot of times we take kids who are two-position players and try to start them on defense because our team has been missing a championship caliber defense in the past.

"We try to put our best guys on defense, but we needed him more at tailback so we moved him back to tailback," O'Brien said.

Due to the emergence of L.V. Whitworth and Andre Callender at running back, Ross' role at tailback has declined since he was named the starter in Boston College's first game against Ball State. He has only carried the ball 18 times for 59 yards this year.

"(Ross dropping down the depth chart) has to do with Whitworth and Callender playing so well," O'Brien said. "It has nothing to do with what Jeff has done."

Ross doesn't plan on staying off the field for long, however.

"I'm in the process of working my way back up (the depth chart). I just approach every game the same: work hard and hope the coach can see that," Ross said.

If he can use the same work ethic that Rosario taught him, he should be fine in that category, but there was one thing that Rosario said he couldn't teach Ross.

"His first couple years, he really wasn't much of a ladies' man, but I would imagine that has changed since he started playing and tore it up," Rosario joked.

Maybe that just depends on whom you ask.

"I never had a problem getting girls," Ross replied.

Okay, but who was the better player? Rosario holds Lowell High's season rushing record with 1,752 yards in 1998, but Ross is second with 1,745 in 2001.

Ross holds the single-game record with 347 yards against rival Chelmsford, which broke Rosario's record of 336 yards.

Over the course of his career, Rosario holds the school's scoring record with 314 points, well ahead of Ross, who scored 208 points.

"Who's better? I'm going to have to go with me on that one," Rosario claimed.

"He always says that," Ross explained. "We're different types of players."

Even though it has been five years since the two first met, their roles haven't changed much.

"It's going to be crazy (playing against Rosario)," Ross said. "I'm just going to watch him go to work, and just try to learn from."

UMass to face Boston College for the first time in 22 years

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

For 22 years the respective football programs of Boston College and the University of Massachusetts have gone their separate ways.

The Eagles have evolved into a successful Division I-A stalwart, making bowl games an annual occurrence and becoming a factory for producing professional offensive lineman. They've had Doug Flutie and the Hail Mary, David Gordon and The Kick, and most recently a monumental move to the Atlantic Coast Conference.

The Minutemen, meanwhile, have been enjoying their own success at the Division I-AA level. They've produced NFL players such as Marcel Shipp, and coaches like Mark Whipple, and have evolved into one of the best programs at their level, culminating with a National Championship in 1998.

So for the students, alumni, friends and supporters of two of the state of Massachusetts' foremost athletic institutions, Saturday will be a day more than two decades in the making. For the first time since Nov. 6, 1982, UMass and BC will meet on the gridiron with kickoff scheduled for 1 p.m. at Alumni Stadium in Chestnut Hill.

"It's obviously a natural rivalry, and one that will attract attention from both schools with all the legacy going back," UMass 12-2 0-2 Atlantic 10 coach Don Brown said. "It's a great game for us and one we're looking forward to, and it's also great for our fans and alumni.

"We're excited about it. I know a lot of our guys know a lot of the guys on their team, and it's a chance for us to get after it against a quality opponent in a big time environment."

Clearly for the Minutemen, the opportunity to pull off a monumental upset exists. However after watching A-10 schools New Hampshire and Maine knock off BCS Big East rival Rutgers and Mississippi State, respectively, the Eagles will surely be prepared for and wary of an upstart UM group.

"It's hard to equate what the other Atlantic 10 schools did to what we're trying to do on Saturday," Brown said. "Maine and UNH beat a pair of teams that are in major transition stages, and coach O'Brien and his staff have been at BC for a long time. They've had a lot of recruiting classes to get the guys they want, and I'm sure we'll have their full attention."

On the field, UMass will certainly face a tall order in more ways than one. A week after having their lack of size along the defensive front exploited by Delaware, the Minutemen will be up against one of the biggest offensive lines in the nation. It's a matchup that worries Brown, and will likely cause problems as BC (3-1 0-0 Big East) tries to establish it's running game.

"Absolutely, it's a cause for concern," Brown said. "They've got tremendous size, and their philosophy is very similar to mine. They want to pound it in the running game and set up play action and everything comes off of those things. It's going to be up to us to fly around on defense and try to disrupt that.

In addition, UMass must attempt to contain mobile quarterback Paul Peterson, whom many compare to Flutie. However Brown believes that his defensive backfield is up to the task.

"I think our defensive backfield doesn't take a backseat to any wide receivers in America," Brown said. "There are going to be times where we have to match them up one-on-one, and I have confidence that we'll be able to do that."

On the offensive side of the ball, the Minutemen will look to get untracked after scoring just seven points in their last seven quarters. However, that will be easier said than done against a tough Eagle defense led by cornerback Will Blackmon, who leads the team with 23 tackles and two interceptions, as well as defensive end Mathi Kiwanuka, who paces the squad with three sacks.

"They have a lot of playmakers on defense," Brown said. "We need to get a going consistently on offense and try to play out of their hands. We just want to play within ourselves and try to move the ball when and where we can."

Past meets present for UM's Hasselbeck

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

For Don Hasselbeck's three sons, the question of where to play collegiate football has never been a difficult one.

A resident of Norfolk who spent nine seasons playing tight end in the National Football League, the patriarch of one of Massachusetts' most highly regarded football families, he has been watching his boys play for Boston College for the past 10 seasons, and with much success.

The eldest, Matt, threw for 4,348 yards in two seasons as a starter at the Heights before moving on to become a Pro Bowl quarterback with the NFL's Seattle Seahawks and handing the reigns to younger brother Tim.

The middle Hasselbeck brother was no slouch either. After leading BC to a pair of bowl games, Tim moved on to the NFL as well, spending time with four teams before landing in Washington.

For Nathaniel, the youngest, the path to success has never been as clear. After joining the Eagles as an undersized wide receiver, head coach Tom O'Brien moved him to the defensive backfield, where he wallowed on the sidelines for two seasons and saw the field only during spot duty as a punt and kick returner.

It was a frustrating experience for him. He knew he had the talent to play offense. So after sitting down with his parents and discussing it with his brothers, he came to the biggest and boldest decision of his young football career: he was going to leave Boston College and transfer to the University of Massachusetts, where he could step in and play wide receiver immediately.

Thus, when the Minutemen meet the Eagles at Alumni Stadium on Saturday, there will be much more involved than just football for the Hasselbecks. Because for the first time ever, a member of Boston College's first family will be playing for the enemy.

"It's going to be a little weird, but it's something I knew would happen eventually," Hasselbeck said before practice Wednesday. "It's going to be emotional going in there and playing in that stadium and being in the visiting locker room, but at the same time I can't

Foes for the first time

Former teammates renew acquaintances

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Sometimes it's just funny how things work. It's funny how we meet different people, and it's funny how small the world really can become.

About five years ago, two young men with nothing more in common than the sport they played would be introduced at Cawley Stadium, the home of the Lowell High School football team. Raunny Rosario, a three-year veteran of the Red Raiders and a growing legend on the Lowell gridiron, was told he had a rookie to keep a watchful eye on.

"Coach [Scott Boyle] told me to take him under my wing and keep him out of trouble," Rosario said.

That rookie was Jeff Ross. Ross decided he wanted to pick up a new sport at Lowell High: football.

Originally, it appeared that it would be a bigger challenge than most around the Lowell football fields would have thought. After all, Ross showed up to his first practice with his shoulder pads on backwards and his elbow pads in his pants.

"I had never played football before," Ross said while laughing. "I was a soccer player. I knew that I was small so I got the biggest pads possible. I got offensive line shoulder pads, and I didn't even know (the elbow pads) weren't kneepads. It was pretty embarrassing."

Rosario didn't hold that against him, though.

"He was new to football and didn't know much," Rosario said. "He was a natural athlete, and he picked up the sport pretty quickly."

Those were high praises at the time from Rosario, who finished his career second on the school's all-time rushing list with 3,337 yards, but he also had a similar experience to Ross.

Boyle, who has a 48-27-2 record as the head coach at Lowell High, recalls Rosario's first game as a sophomore.

"It was a cold night. He had two orange traffic gloves on. We started him at nose guard at first because he was so quick," Boyle said.

Boyle let it slide, but he made Rosario take his gloves off when he was finally moved to running back, the position he holds now for the Massachusetts football team.

MATTHEW RHEW/COLLEGIAN

Raunny Rosario ran for 758 yards as a freshman at UMass.

COURTESY OF BOSTON COLLEGE MEDIA RELATIONS

Jeff Ross has rushed for 49 yards on 18 carries this season.

Ross is now a running back at Boston College, and the two former Lowell High standouts will play on the same field, albeit on different sidelines, for the first time since Rosario graduated from LHS in 2000 when UMass travels to Alumni Stadium to play BC on Saturday. Boyle plans on being in attendance to see two of his favorite former players reunite on the field.

"They are not just great football players," Boyle said. "They are great kids. They both stand out, but they are very humble guys. They were team-oriented players. It was never about them."

Boyle isn't the only coach who praises them like this. UMass coach Don Brown shares the same feelings about Rosario.

"He has been a great teammate. He is a competitor, and he plays the game with a little bit of pop," Brown said.

Boston College coach Tom O'Brien is plenty happy with Ross, too.

"He has a great rapport with the rest of the players," O'Brien said. "He is always working hard in the weight room. He sets a great example, especially with the younger kids."

That is just one of the things he learned how to do from Rosario, who would stop at nothing to help his younger teammate out. Ross came to Lowell from New York, where Rosario is also from, but Ross' journey was much more complicated than that.

Originally from Liberia, Ross left his homeland to escape a horrific civil war. It would make his way to America at the age of 14. When he finally found Lowell, he didn't know anyone that he could turn to until the coaches introduced him to Rosario.

"We had a really good relationship," Ross said. "He was like my big brother. I used to have to walk home after practice which would take about an hour and a half, but Raunny would drive me home when he had a car so I wouldn't have to walk."

Boyle saw first hand just how much Ross respected his football mentor.

"Jeff was young when Raunny was a senior," Boyle said. "He looked up to Raunny and really respected how hard he worked."

"We were good friends," Rosario agreed. "We hung around a lot my senior year."

Unfortunately, for these two high school studs, they haven't seen the ball as much in their collegiate careers.

In 2002, his first year on the field for the Minutemen, Rosario rushed for 758 yards and three touchdowns on 154 carries. Last

Presidential candidates debate

Bush, Kerry clash over the War in Iraq; trade barbs on foreign policy

By TERENCE HUNT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CORAL GABLES, Fla. (AP) — Sen. John Kerry accused President Bush Thursday night of a "colossal error in judgment" in ordering the invasion of Iraq. "The world is better off without Saddam Hussein," the president shot back in campaign debate, adding his rival once said so himself.

"I agree with him," Bush jabbed sarcastically at a rival he depicts as prone to flip-flops.

In a 90-minute debate dominated by a war that has claimed more than 1,000 American lives, Kerry called the conflict a diversion in the broader struggle against terror and the hunt for Osama bin Laden.

The four-term Massachusetts senator said he could do a better job than Bush of protecting the nation against another Sept. 11-style attack, and pledged to be strong and resolute in fighting terrorism.

"But we also have to be smart ... and smart means not diverting our attention from the war on terror and taking it off to Iraq," Kerry said.

"This president, I don't know if he really sees what's happening over there," Kerry said of Bush, standing 10 feet away on a University of Miami debate stage.

Bush swiftly returned to his theme of Kerry as a man who changes his mind too often to be president.

"He voted to authorize the use of force and now says it's the wrong war at the wrong time. ... I don't think you can lead if you say 'wrong war, wrong time, wrong place.' What message does that send to our troops?" said the Republican incumbent.

With less than four weeks until the election, the polls show Bush with a small lead in the race for the White House, and several battleground states exceedingly close. Even some Democrats said the debate, with a national television audience in the tens of millions, represented Kerry's best chance to gain late-campaign momentum.

Several students watch the projection screen set up in the Campus Center as President Bush and Senator John Kerry debate foreign policy issues.

Both men used well-rehearsed lines during their face-to-face encounter, but this was the first time each had to listen to the criticism at close quarters.

Bush appeared perturbed when Kerry leveled some of his charges, scowling at times and looking away in apparent disgust at others. Kerry often took notes when the president spoke. Some networks offered a split screen to viewers so they could see both men at the same time and watch their reactions.

Bush and Kerry differed over North Korea, Iran and Russia as well as Iraq in a debate limited to foreign policy and terrorism.

Kerry charged that North Korea and Iran both have advanced their nuclear weapons programs during the Bush administration. "As president I'll never take my eye off that ball," the senator said.

Bush said he believed that a diplomatic initiative currently under way could solve the crisis with North Korea.

"On Iran, I hope we can do the same," the president said.

Bush said that with North Korea, he would continue to pursue a strategy that involves the United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea in talks with North Korea to defuse the crisis. Kerry advocated bilateral talks between the United States and North Korea to find a solution.

Kerry voiced concerns about conditions in Russia, saying that crackdowns initiated by Vladimir Putin go beyond what's necessary to combat terror.

Bush said he had a good personal relationship with Putin that "enables me to better comment to him and the better to discuss with him some of the decisions he makes." Bush said Russia was a country in transition and that would remind Putin "of the great benefits of democracy."

Bush supporters few and far between; Kerry soars

By DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Joining millions of people across the nation who watched last night's presidential debate between President George W. Bush and Massachusetts Senator John Kerry, approximately 50 students gathered in the Campus Center's Blue Wall Cafe.

True to the roots of the overtly Democratic state of Massachusetts, there appeared to be little support for the Republican President among students in the crowd.

The Daily Collegian was unable to find a Bush supporter among the people watching the event at the cafe, which featured the first debate between the two candidates on a large projection screen.

"I think Kerry smoked Bush," said Stephanie Costa, a sophomore Communications major. "Bush definitely seemed really intimidated; it seemed obvious with his gestures."

"Kerry was very poised. He seemed like he was really paying attention to what's going on," she said.

The students in attendance apparently were sharing the opinion of the majority of Americans who watched the debate, according to a CBS News poll. The network showed the result of the poll minutes after the debate ended, indicating that 51 percent of those polled said they felt Kerry had a strong plan of action for the war in Iraq, while only 33 percent felt the same about Bush. It should be noted, though, that early polls are unscientific and their reliability is often lessened due to their time constraints.

Jenny Herbert, a senior Sociology major, said that she would rather see Kerry's plan for Iraq go into action than continue Bush's current plan.

"I'm completely opposed to the war. The results of the war so far have sickened me," she said.

The University Democrats, an on-campus student group, organized the debate viewing. The UMass Republican Club did not appear to be in attendance at the event, though no survey was taken. University Democrats director Pat MacLeod put together the event.

"I extended an invite to the Republican Club three times and no one showed," MacLeod said.

MacLeod stood by his Democratic stance on the election while commenting about the debates.

"I think President Bush had only international issues on his mind. His issues are based on promoting unquestioned American power abroad," he said. "I don't think he cares about domestic issues."

In response to questions about his thoughts on Kerry, MacLeod reiterated his support for the Bay State's junior senator.

"[Kerry] made sure to relate to the core concerns of the general public. He's not afraid to uncover Bush's irrationality and lack of responsibility," he said.

In the midst of the recent on-campus controversy regarding the University's Student Government Association, MacLeod took the opportunity of the debate to mention that the University Democrats would like to help appoint more student Democrats to the SGA.

In response to the question of whether the University Democrats would take advantage of newly appointed SGA seats as a result of the recent controversy, MacLeod explained that his group is very dedicated to helping student Democrats become elected to senate seats.

"We are willing to back all Democratic Senators who are running and we'll put any and all resources behind [their] campaigns," he said.

According to MacLeod, four Senators have been in contact and two general meetings have been held so far.

Higgins announces resignation

By JULIE O'DONNELL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Student Government Association Speaker Patrick Higgins submitted his letter of resignation yesterday afternoon, one week after requests from SGA members, university groups and students asked him to step down because of the controversial photos that included Higgins and other SGA members.

In his letter, Higgins apologized and emphasized that he wants the University of Massachusetts campus to "move forward."

"It is with great sadness and remorse that I write this letter. It has been my greatest honor to represent the students of this University over the past few years. I love this University and never wanted to tarnish its good name. I have always attempted to improve the lives of all students. Yet today I realize that to do this I must resign as the Speaker of the Undergraduate Senate," Higgins wrote.

Although his resignation came one day later than expected, Secretary of Press Relations for SGA Jeff Napolitano expressed his approval of Higgins' decision.

"I wish it had come earlier [when] it was expected," Napolitano said. "I was not in favor of expelling."

According to Gargano at a forum Wednesday night, Higgins' expulsion has not been ruled out.

"Sanctions can range from warning to dismissal," Gargano said during Wednesday's forum.

Higgins also wrote that he has been grateful to serve the UMass community even though he has made poor decisions.

"The photographs from last March represent an irresponsibility and insensitivity that is unbecoming of a student representative. While I in no way support bigotry and prejudice I know my actions have caused many in our community great pain. I hope that through time and as a community our school can move forward," Higgins wrote.

Associate Speaker Seamus Brennan will take Higgins' position immediately if he chooses not to resign himself. Brennan was also one of the nine students photographed drinking alcohol and mocking a caricature of the Ku Klux Klan last March.

"No one else has resigned," Napolitano said. "Eddie [Bustamante, SGA President] has asked Chuck DeMare to hire Brian Roberts as Student Coordinator for SCERA [the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy], but if Seamus doesn't resign, hopefully when we have a full Senate, they will impeach him."

Chuck DiMare is the Director of Student Legal Services and serves as a Student Attorney, however he is also representing Roberts.

According to Napolitano, the Chancellor of Elections Viktoryia Bonshteyn sent out an email to all of the students running for Senate regarding the postponement of this week's Senate elections requesting that those who may choose not run, have an additional week to make their decision.

Senate elections were slated to be earlier this week, but were postponed Tuesday night due to the lack of professional staff; Higgins had initially promised a full staff to man the polling stations.

35 Iraqi children dead after surprise attack

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A string of bombs killed 35 children and wounded scores of others as U.S. troops handed out candy Thursday at a government-sponsored celebration to inaugurate a sewage plant. It was the largest death toll of children in any insurgent attack since the start of the Iraq conflict.

Grief-stricken mothers wailed over their children's bloodied corpses, as relatives collected body parts from the street for burial and a boy picked up the damaged bicycle of his dead brother.

The wounded were rushed to Yarmouk Hospital, where angry relatives screamed for attention from the overwhelmed doctors, many of whom wore uniforms covered in blood. One woman tore at her hair before pulling back the sheet covering her dead brother and kissing his body.

The bombings in Baghdad's western al-Amel neighborhood - at least two of which were in cars - came amid a series of savage attacks that killed at least 51 people and wounded 230 nationwide.

At least one U.S. soldier was among the dead and 15 were wounded.

Jordanian terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's Tawhid and Jihad group claimed responsibility for bloody attacks in Baghdad on Thursday, according to a statement posted on a militant Web site.

The authenticity of the statement could not be verified, and it was unclear whether the three "heroic operations" it cites - attacks on a government complex and "a convoy of invading forces" - included the bombs that killed the children.

Early reports said a U.S. convoy was passing by the celebration when the attack occurred. The U.S. military said later that American soldiers were taking part in the celebration but that no convoy was passing through the area.

Deputy Interior Minister Gen. Hussein Ali Kamal said intense military pressure on insurgents holed up in Fallujah, west of Baghdad, was forcing them to turn their bombs on the capital. He said the day's attacks were "definitely coordinated."

Banning of gay marriages fails

House votes and rejects proposal

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House rejected a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage Thursday, the latest in a string of conservative pet causes advanced by Republican leaders in the run-up to Election Day.

The vote was 227-186, 49 votes shy of the two-thirds needed for approval of an amendment that President Bush backed but the Senate had previously scuttled.

"God created Adam and Eve. He didn't create Adam and Steve," said Rep. Roscoe Bartlett, Md., on behalf of a measure that supporters said was designed to protect an old institution.

Democrats countered that Republicans were motivated by election-year politics as much as anything, particularly since a Senate vote this year ended any immediate chance the amendment could be sent to the states for ratification.

Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic whip, accused GOP leaders of "raw political cynicism" and said they hoped to "create the fodder for a demagogic political ad."

The measure drew the support of 191 Republicans and 36 Democrats. Voting against it were 158 Democrats, 27 Republicans and one independent.

The debate on the gay marriage amendment came a day after the House voted 250-171 to overturn a 28-year municipal ban on handgun ownership in the District of Columbia. And last week, Republicans forced a vote on legislation to protect the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance from court challenge. It passed, 247-175.

While both of those measures face uncertain prospects in the Senate, they - along with the gay marriage proposal - appeal to voting groups whose support Republicans are counting on in the Nov. 2 elections. Recent surveys in battleground states in the presidential race indicate roughly one-quarter of Bush's supporters say moral or family values are uppermost in their minds.

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 1, 2004 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

To the Parents of Vice Chancellor Gargano

Matt Brochu

I am writing to express my concern about your son. Don't get me wrong, I like the little guy, and I understand that he's still the new kid in school. It's just that, like most new kids, he's trying way too hard to fit in. You know the type (overeager, does anything to impress cute girls, laughs obnoxiously at everyone's jokes in the cafeteria, etc. ...). But with all due respect, he's not too bright. Allow me to explain.

Earlier this summer, your son sent a letter to my house. This wouldn't have been surprising, as it has happened a few times before, except for one thing — it was addressed to "The Parents of Matthew Brochu." Well I was curious, so I opened it anyway because they weren't home from work yet (I hope you won't tell anyone, because I'm pretty sure that's a felony), and found a pamphlet urging the parents of Matthew Brochu (Jan and Dan) to educate their child (me) about the dangers of alcohol. This too, wouldn't have been surprising, except for one thing: I'm not a freshman who gets hammered and runs around the Kennedy hallways like a kid without his Ritalin, stealing dry-erase markers and tearing down my RA's bulletin boards.

Come to think of it, I'm a 22 year-old graduate student, an employee at UMass Medical Center and a very experienced drinker. As a matter of fact, alcohol and I are celebrating our Wooden Anniversary in December (that's 5 years), and unlike the people who should be receiving these letters, I don't need my friend's older brother's roommate's dental hygienist's expired New Jersey ID with the bent corners to get into a bar uptown.

When students are that comfortable, how could you possibly expect them to stand up and get a prophylactic? By putting beds in each room, your son actually encourages unprotected sex.

Anyway, the address on the envelope prompted the following exchange between my parents and I:

Dad: You skipped study hall again, didn't you? Don't make me go up to Amherst for another parent-teacher conference.

Me: No, it was gym class. We were doing swimming and I forgot to get a fake note from my doctor saying I was on my period.

Mom: I still think they're asking for money somewhere in there.

But don't worry, Mr. and Mrs. Gargano, I'm here to help. I could go on and on about how "To the Parents Of" letters should officially stop when I can legally date the woman who receives it. I could talk about the fact that "To the Parents of" letters should include phrases like "annual lice check," "win a pizza party," or "non-perishable canned food drive," and that, although beer may be canned, it clearly isn't a nonperishable good. I could suggest that he might as well take this a step further and make D.A.R.E. a General Education Requirement. That way, no one could actually take classes within their respective majors until senior year.

The problem is, your son is fighting the wrong battle here. Alcohol is our friend, while couches (and surfaces with cushions of any kind) are clearly the enemy. The following demonstrates how couches account for the three major problems on campus:

1) Low GPA — Students flopping down on couches after class drains motivation like Evanescence's "My Immortal" drains my will to live. A mysterious old man could run into me on campus and hand me a pill that would cure Cancer, destroy Stephen A. Smith's vocal cords and guarantee Keira Knightley's hand in marriage upon ingestion. But if I felt like laying down on my futon "for a little bit" when I got home, I probably wouldn't get around to taking that pill until at least 9 or 10:30.

2) Rioting — Other than toilet paper and Yankees fans, what's the most common thing set on fire during riots? Lounge furniture. I don't mean to infer that couches start riots. That's stupid. Couches can't shoot pepper balls, use excessive amounts of force or yell obscenities at students. That's what cops are for.

3) Unprotected Sex — Sure, bathrooms, handicapped elevators and Cluster Office counter tops see their fair share of action, but couches and beds get most of it. When students are that comfortable, how could you possibly expect them to stand up and get a prophylactic? By putting beds in each room, your son actually encourages unprotected sex.

So tell your son to leave my buddy alcohol alone and to quit it with the unnecessary letters. Instead, maybe you could suggest that he give the excess paper to the library so we can print out our class notes in the computer labs without getting bitched at by the work-study kids anymore. Ever since my roommate's printer broke last week, I've been filling up my ink cartridge more often than my gas tank.

Anyway, I hope to see you two at the Open House next month. Little Michael's drawing of a pink penguin riding a tractor is proudly tacked to the bulletin board at the back of the room. And if you'd like to respond, I only ask that you send it to me and not to my parents. If they find out I quoted them without their permission, they might take away my phone privileges for the week.

Sincerely,

The Son of the Parents of Matthew Brochu

Too old for child's play

Johnny Donaldson

I turned 21 in August, just over a month ago. I am now truly, officially an adult. I can smoke. Play the lottery. Buy porn. Go into a bar and order a drink and not have to worry about being arrested. I am an adult. A mature — well, supposedly mature — human being who is capable of making decisions on my own, whether those decisions are for the good or the bad. Hell, I was an adult when I came into college. I was 18, not a legal drinker yet, but still old enough to do most grown-up things.

So, if I'm legally an adult, then why is it that I feel like I'm a child at this place?

I have a class here at UMass — I won't mention what it is or who the teacher is — a class I can't stand to be in. It fulfills a junior year writing requirement (though I am a senior and placed out of all English classes) and as such it requires a lot of writing. Fine, so be it. This is college. Papers are necessary; I can suck it up and write. It isn't that that bothers me. It's the way said teacher treats us like little kids when we write. She's a perfectionist when it comes to papers — every little piece of grammar has to be right, despite the fact that no one ever speaks in grammatical perfection. When we type things incorrectly, she lectures us for a good part of the class on how we need to learn the proper way to write. And she does so in a way that's so uptight and condescending that it makes me feel like a 5 year-old who has done something wrong.

But, wait a minute, I'm 21. Who cares if I use the passive voice or speak just a bit more poetically than is necessary in my writings? That's me, my voice, my style. Why do I have to shoehorn myself into some conventional, classical structure? And why do I have to be talked down to if I refuse?

Who cares if I use the passive voice or speak just a bit more poetically than is necessary in my writings? That's me, my voice, my style. Why do I have to shoehorn myself into some conventional, classical structure?

But that's how it goes at this college. We're supposed to be learning to deal with the real world, yet I often feel as though I'm treated like I'm still in junior high. The aforementioned teacher, with her wearying, patronizing attitude is bad enough.

But I don't need the whole you-get-three-unexcuseds-before-you-need-a-note routine. Why do I need a note? I'm an adult. I pay for my way here, so it's my responsibility to keep up with my learning.

Instead of docking students for not going to class, professors and TAs should just shrug them off; if the student doesn't show then it's his or her responsibility to get notes from a friend. If they miss out on a class, too bad, move forward, and let them flounder for info if they don't have the intelligence to attend their classes. I don't need to slink to the doctors and ask for a note, or ask my parents for a little letter if I need to go to a family function: "Mommy, Daddy, I need a note for Mrs. Doe's class saying I have to go to a funeral."

It's this "you're not adults, you're kids" attitude that disgusts me. Yes, some of us do act childish and immature, but then, as adults we have to be held accountable for our childish actions. That does not mean we must be treated like little kids.

I don't need to be told to show up for class or else; it's my responsibility and if I don't then I'm just screwing myself over. I don't need to be told what classes I have to take to "enrich" my learning – if I'm paying for this place, I should be able to take the classes I think will better me, not the ones the administration requires of me. (At least, as a senior, I thankfully have my godforsaken Gen Eds out of the way.) And I certainly don't need to be talked down to by some "adult" who thinks she's better than I am just because she's even older than I am. This is my money I'm funneling into this place; if I'm paying, I don't want to come just to be disrespected.

A new declaration of independence

Stephen Post

Wouldn't it be nice if putting a new president in office really changed things? Wouldn't it be nice if things were so simple? Think of it: you step into a voting booth, mark a piece of paper and — VOILA! — you've got yourself some change.

Well sure, that's a nice thought now isn't it? But anyone who thinks anything happens that easily is probably trying to lose weight on a pop-a-pill, eat-what-you-like-and-don't-exercise diet. Things just aren't that simple.

It says something that lots of us think it is this simple. Clearly, we're a nation of people who indulge in quick fixes and wishful thinking.

How did it come to this? Why do we think we can do next-to-nothing and achieve a result worth having? Why do we think that sticking a new body in the White House will change anything? Furthermore, why do we assume that electing someone who thinks he can win votes by adopting the incumbent's asinine policies will get us anywhere? Why?

It's called stupidity.

We must face the issues that transcend which fool is president. We have to care less about crappy versus crappier and more about the underlying structure of power in this country and how it obstructs change. One of the biggest obstacles is the military-industrial complex. In 1789, George Washington told us to "avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty." Did we listen?

In a piece published this past January, historian Chalmers Johnson indicated the extent of what he calls "America's Empire of Bases." According to official documents, "the Pentagon currently owns or rents 702 overseas bases in about 130 countries and has another 6,000 bases in the United States and its territories." These bases are peopled by "some 253,288 uniformed personnel, plus an equal number of dependents and Department of Defense civilian officials, and [employ] an additional 44,446 locally hired foreigners. The Pentagon claims that these bases contain 44,870 barracks, hangars, hospitals, and other buildings, which it owns, and that it leases 4,844 more." And that does not include outposts in Kosovo, Israel, Iraq, Afghanistan, and some key former Soviet republics, such as Uzbekistan (whose strategic value, like other states in the area, has to do with oil). And, of course, we're only talking about what's reported.

Whether we like it or not, we paid for every death in Iraq — military and civilian — in cold, hard cash.

According to the Department of Defense, the projected "official" budget for fiscal year 2005 is roughly $450 billion, up considerably from the $276 billion of fiscal 1999. To put this in perspective, let's look at what some other countries are spending. China, for example, spent roughly $56 billion in fiscal 2002, and its total expenditures for 2003 were $300 billion. With nearly 1.3 billion people, China is still the world's most populous country.

In short, in terms of gross expenditures, the U.S. outspends EVERYBODY when it comes to defense. On a per-capita basis, only Israel and Singapore spend more — Israel spends about $1500 a person, while Singapore and the U.S. about $950. The U.S. ranks second only to China in the number of people it employs in arms production (some 2.3 million, as of 2001).

These are our tax dollars. Our tax dollars supported the invasion of Iraq. Our tax dollars filled the suitcases that CIA operatives handed to "Northern Alliance" warlords in Afghanistan to win them over to "our side." Our tax dollars subsidized Ahmed Chalabi's lobbying campaign for a war in Iraq (in other words, at some level, we paid to be convinced to go to war). Our parent's tax dollars outfitted Afghanistan's Mujaha-deen in the 1980s, and helped train one of the CIA's finest recruits, Osama bin Laden. Our parent's tax dollars sent Donald Rumsfeld on a diplomatic mission to Iraq to tell Saddam Hussein that we were on his side. Our taxes pay for the Pentagon's "black projects," top-secret research and development programs resulting in ever more lethal weapons to use in the wars we finance. And, whether we like it or not, we paid for every death in Iraq — military and civilian — in cold, hard cash.

If voting won't change this, then voting, I am sorry to say, does not matter. Sure, there are differences between Bush and Kerry. Contrary to what Kerry says sometimes, I still believe they are distinctly different people. But the question we have to ask ourselves is this: Are these differences, whatever they are, enough to radically change the status quo in America? Is the difference between Kerry and Bush — to the extent that there is one — going to make any difference when it comes to entrenched structures like the military-industrial complex? Kerry, after all, is a military man. Bush, on the other hand, may or may not be. But the discussion is still happening within the dominant framework. Nobody is challenging the status quo.

Can there be change now? I don't know. We need to ask ourselves what our country is and what we would like it to be. If the house is falling down then we have to rebuild it from the ground up. We must declare our independence again. We can't afford anything less.

Northampton Welcomes A New Wilco

By Mike Busack
Collegian Staff

What happened to Wilco?

Just when you think the band has found their niche, Wilco has gone and done it again. Their new album, "A Ghost is Born," is yet another sound transmutation from previous albums.

Change seems to have become the mantra for the obscure, yet magnetic alt-country band. Despite lead singer Jeff Tweedy taking a trip to rehab earlier this year after a brief addiction to the painkillers he had been taking for migraines, Wilco was able to release a new album. The content of which could present some of the uncanniest sounds the band has produced yet.

It was not long ago that Wilco was kicked off of the Reprise Records label because the oddities that comprised their previous release, " Yankee Hotel Foxtrot," just weren't conventional enough. Most likely this decision proved to be to the chagrin of the label, because Nonesuch Records released the album instead, and soon it became one of the years largest successes, both critically and commercially.

Wilco's newest release, "A Ghost is Born," is a shot of the Beatles, a drop of Willy Porter, and a dash of Neil Young. For most of the album, there is an isolated and deliberate meter to the tunes. There is an echo of the pain and heartache, but the listener gets the sense that the artist knows the worst is over.

Another peculiarity of "A Ghost is Born" is that, though many of the songs are a bit bleak, some might say a downright bummer, this album will not force your to run to the Prozac, but rather, you may just end up making a dash to your local record store to buy copies for all of your equally alt-country friends (because burning the CD would be a sin, wink-wink.)

Tweedy's voice is remarkably grainy on this collection. In each of his albums this remains the constant, though, you may find more interest in his abrasive guitar solos or perhaps even the amazing wail of feedback that throws some unexpected energy in to the band's tunes.

"Less Than You Think," a tune off of the new album, reeks of innovation. A 12-minute ode to the roots of rock, "Less Than You Think" opens with a hushed and pensive hum, and soon breaks into a one-chord tune that is an ultimate display of Tweedy and company's raw vision.

The ultimate force behind "A Ghost is Born" must be the absolute conscious effort in the creation. It seems Tweedy's lyrics are more deliberate than ever, and the music seconds this theory. Wilco is a product of progression and growth. Each album has seen this development that is unlike most of their musical peers.

Luckily for alt-country connoisseurs in Hampden County, Wilco will be making a trip to the Calvin this Sunday, Oct. 3. The band is touring in support of their new album and will be playing with opening act The Fiery Furnaces.

The show starts at 8 p.m. Tickets are $27.50 at the box office..

'ESPN 2K5' and 'Madden 2005' fight it out on the tube

Press Start to Play
Reid Davenport

Not since Hulk Hogan faced Andre the Giant has the small competitor been a threat to a much bigger opponent. Against all odds, ESPN's football franchise is giving Electronic Arts' Madden NFL series a run for its money.

The only way to tell which the better of the two is to break them down section by section. Each game has its own ups and downs, but the one who can reach the endzone the most in this battle will obviously come out on top.

The Offensive Game

Both Madden NFL 2005 and ESPN NFL 2K5 provide players with different controls to mount a large offensive attack against their foes. Gamers that are looking for new ways to make their best friends beg for mercy as they run up the score will appreciate the offensive options supplied by both games.

ESPN went with a charging option for the running game. You can tap the button to sprint or hold it down to charge up. Once your runner is charged up, you can perform a dive, spin, or try to bash off a would-be tackler. It's not an easy option to use, but with a little practice you can break some nice runs down the sidelines while knowing it happened because you made it happen.

Madden fights back with a new on-the-spot playmaker option. You can tell receivers to take different directional routes or move people around while keeping the same play on. But there isn't much else to learn for gamers who have followed the Madden series.

Edge: Madden — While ESPN's charge option is nice, the playmaker option comes in handy in tough situations.

The Defensive Game

Defense is what this year's Madden brags about. The new hit stick control allows you to cause more fumbles and dropped passes. You can also tell cornerbacks, safeties, and strong safeties to blitz or cover a certain receiver. This time around it is also a bit easier to grab control of a linebacker, read the quarterback, and pick off a pass.

ESPN's defensive game, however, should be calling for a flag on the play since it too has the individual coverage option for your defensive backs, but it came out a month before Madden. Like the offensive charge, you have a defensive charge that lets you lay a heavy hit on the offense. This option, while a little lacking for offense, works nicely for good defensive hits.

Edge: ESPN – Using the charge alone with the coverage option works better than the hit-stick, as the hit stick can cause your guy to completely miss the tackle.

Online Gaming

While it's nothing new to PS2 users, X-Box Live users are getting their first taste of Madden online. The people at EA have even added a fair play rule that prevents players from going for it on fourth down when it's more than a yard from the first-down line. While it is meant to prevent newcomers from being destroyed, it doesn't help the cause as your opponents can still go for two points after a touchdown. You will also find that a lot of players like throwing Hail Mary after Hail Mary if your defense isn't very good on coverage.

Madden's online feature also comes with the EA Sports Premium Pass presented by Dodge as a free service this year to all Madden NFL 2005 users on PS2 online and Xbox Live. The VIP pass allows users access to enhanced gameplay features, customization, and content that regular users won't have access to. The sketchy part is you're required to enter a credit card number for ID verification, but there will be no charge at all, so there's no worry.

ESPN, on the other hand, has no visual masterpiece displaying scores or giving gamers all of the same fancy options. But, just like Madden, it allows players to play ranked games or make tournaments, leagues, and so on. It also gives gamers a better chance of competing in games because most gamers are used to Madden's controls, thus you won't see someone faking with Michael Vick, then running 70 yards for the touchdown. The playing field is vaster and lets newbies have a bit more fun playing.

Edge: Madden – The sponsorship of something that would normally cost players more to use is a big boost in most gamers' eyes. Despite the fact that for the first 10 games you play, unless you're an experienced player, you will be tossed around like a rag doll by the competition. Fortunately you can seek out other new players to give you a hand in gaining experience.

Extra Features

ESPN has added a nice touch with "The Crib." You basically get a big house to fill with all of those pieces of football memorabilia that you could never afford, unless you got drafted into the NFL. You'll get a few calls from B-list celebrities like Jamie Kennedy, Steve-O, and Carmen Electra for gaming challenges to earn more points to buy more stuff for your "crib."

ESPN also has a feature that lets you edit the game's music playlist, only on X-Box, which you have saved on your hard drive. You can mark the edited tracks to play at certain times during a game. An example would be having the opening part of "Welcome to the Jungle," playing as your team gets ready to kick off. It's an excellent option that adds more character to the games.

Madden has the EA Sports Radio Show where people voice their comments on many NFL related topics, and sometimes your own players will give interviews. Another nice feature, like the radio, found in Franchise mode is the newspapers, which are actual licensed rags from your team's home. So if you play as the New England Patriots, you will read The Boston Globe.

Madden once again made the mistake, however, in bringing back Owner mode. Many players who get the game for the sports aspect, find this mode an absolute waste of space. The owner mode is something you try on a Sunday afternoon when there is nothing to do.

Edge: Tie – Both games offer up enough extras. Even though the Crib is much cooler than Owner mode, ESPN loses points for making gamers have to play and listen to a bad actor like David Arquette in football.

Overall both games manage to have plenty of features that could bring some gamers into a new style of NFL gaming, while others will stick with old faithful. You may say that if this was a contest with one play left and Madden's team leading by four points, with ESPN needing that one yard to win, Madden's defense would more than likely be stuffing ESPN and taking home the championship.

Both games, despite the outcome, are excellent NFL games and will no doubt cause one another to look into improving each franchise. ESPN NFL 2K5 is available now for around $19.99 on PS2 and X-Box and Madden NFL 2005 is available for $49.99 on Gamecube, PS2, and X-Box. X-Box Live is sold separately and is required for online play. Online play for Gamecube is not available.

Dunne's last a disappointment

By Molly J. Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

ASSOCIATED PRESS

John Gregory Dunne's posthumous release 'Nothing Lost' has been described as confusing and full of clichés.

Reading John Gregory Dunne's final novel "Nothing Lost" is kind of like watching a precocious director ruin a film by jumping between past and present and abruptly switching narrators, despite working with a terrific plot and a fantastic cast.

The book was disappointing to say the least, given Dunne's accomplished literary career in fiction, criticism, essays, and film scripts. He was published in notable magazines, including "Esquire" and "New York Magazine," and wrote over 20 scripts, including the famous Barbara Streisand vehicle, "A Star Is Born." He was, perhaps, best known for his family. His brother is the investigative reporter and author Dominick Dunne and his wife of more than 30 years is the essayist Joan Didion.

The posthumously published "Nothing Lost" opens with a vignette, following a woman on a surveillance tape, seemingly narrated by someone who knows her but hasn't seen her in a long time. As suddenly as we are introduced to her, she is gone, replaced by an unknown narrator (later to be introduced as Max Cline) living in the fictitious state of "South Midland."

'Nothing Lost'
By John Gregory Dunne
Random House

It is Max Cline who clumsily outlines the story of Edgar Parlance and his gruesome murder in Regent, South Midland. This is the starting point for the multiple storylines that Dunne introduces at random.

The murder of Parlance, an African-American drifter remembered fondly by the Regent community, sets the scene for a media frenzy that launches at least six separate narratives, often told by a different character in a different style, depending on which chapter you're reading.

Max Cline is a gay lawyer and former prosecutor for the South Midland attorney general's office, recently demoted to teaching criminal law classes at a community college and private practice, after being booted by the newly-elected, homophobic attorney general Gerry Wormwold. Cline is our guide through the confusing milieu surrounding Parlance's death.

We meet Jocko Cannon, the meathead star athlete for the "Rhino" football team accused of dragging a 19 year-old co-ed down three flights of stairs shattering her cheek and fracturing her skull.

There is Carlyle, the trashy, media-obsessed supermodel, and half-sister to Duane Lajoie who is standing trial for allegedly murdering Parlance. Not to mention the philandering J.J. McClure, in charge of prosecuting the case, and his wife, Poppy McClure, the rich, beautiful, outrageous right-wing Congresswoman.

Those are only a few of the characters Dunne introduces with varying degrees of thoroughness. While all of these characters are interesting on their own, Dunne's vacillating literary styles prevent the development of any connection between the reader and the people in the book. This eventually compromises the integrity of the entire book, and at the end it is hard for the reader to sympathize with the breakdown of a relationship and character never fully explored in the book.

For example, the story of Teresa Kean is told alternately by Cline's unknown italicized memories, and through her own account, mysteriously recovered from her computer. Were she the main character, she might merit being explored from so many different angles. However Kean is only one of many characters that Dunne introduces using various literary devices, perhaps hoping to deflect from the truth. He is so bent of creating a multifarious story line that he fails to develop any single story enough to capture his audience's attention, and capturing the audience's attention is the real objective of any mystery writer; otherwise the author is the only one along for the ride.

Dunne uses cliché one-liners more reminiscent of a made-for-TV movie than a serious novel. Perhaps his experience writing scripts colors his ability to construct believable dialogue. In real life, no one ends their conversations with dramatic quips right out of a soap opera. Most of his paragraphs and chapters end with obnoxious cliffhangers that make the reader groan. "I think we're about to find that out, Teresa," Dunne writes.

The meat of the story, Parlance's murder and the trial of Duane Lajoie, is often ignored in favor of seamy side stories that add little to the overall book. There are J.J. McClure's sexual conquests, Kean's encounter with penile injections, a trailer park teen who sends illicit photos of herself to Lajoie in prison with her young son sitting on the bed, soiling himself. None of this adds to the general momentum of the book, serving only to momentarily distract the reader.

At some points, Dunne employs large-print titles using the names of different characters to differentiate between who is actually speaking from paragraph to paragraph. He must have realized the disadvantage the numerous story lines put him at.

Dunne often simply tells the reader what is going to be important later on. Even Max Cline muses whether or not he can put together a plausible narrative. Considering that this is the last book published from his lengthy career, it's too bad Dunne didn't ponder the same question.

Springsteen: 'Vote for Change'

By Tom Moon
Philadelphia Inquirer

When the music quiets and Bruce Springsteen begins what he calls the "public-service announcement" portion of his set at Friday night's Vote for Change concert at the Wachovia Center, the New Jersey native will do something he has resisted throughout a career of more than 30 years; make an overtly partisan political statement.

"There's some reluctance, certainly, to be coming out and doing what we're doing now," Springsteen said Tuesday in a phone interview about the series of 37 benefit performances he helped organize for Americans Coming Together, the group that's mobilizing voters for Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry.

The barnstorming tour of 12 swing states — which involves Pearl Jam, the Dave Matthews Band, the Dixie Chicks, R.E.M., Sheryl Crow, Keb' Mo', and others — represents a significant change in the delicate mix of rock and politics. While stars have often lent their skills to causes (famine relief, nuclear disarmament, aid to farmers), there has never been such a coordinated campaign to elect a candidate. The two-week effort arrives in Pennsylvania with shows held simultaneously in Philadelphia, Reading, Lancaster, Pittsburgh, State College and Wilkes-Barre. (The Philly show is sold out.)

Springsteen, 55, acknowledges that his stand probably will alienate some fans. He has accepted the risk, he says, because he believes the stakes are too high.

"This election is about a set of ideals and truthfulness, and creating the country you want your kids to grow up in," says the father of three, who lives in Rumson, N.J. "No other election I can remember has had that kind of significance to me."

Early in the campaign, Springsteen discovered that many of his musician peers felt likewise, and were looking for "some way to have a collective impact." Those conversations sealed it for him: "I realized that this is the time. I can't sit this one out if I meant the things I've been writing about these 30 years."

Springsteen's songbook includes poignant odes about deserted Rust Belt towns and police brutality and the heroic firefighters of 9-11. But while he has spoken eloquently on social issues at his shows for years, he says he isn't preparing a statement to deliver at the Vote for Change performances.

"There will be no intense speechifying from the stage, as far as I know," he says of the bill, which also includes John Fogerty and Bright Eyes.

Yet he knows that everything he says will resonate differently. "The same words are going to be ... changed by the moment and the event. I actually think it will add clarity to some of my music, recast some of the things I've been saying in a clearer and more powerful light."

He rejects criticism that the Vote for Change shows preach to the converted. After all, everyone with a ticket knows that his money is going to a group bent on dumping President Bush.

"We're going to find the Republicans in the crowd, and there will be a laying on of hands. ... We're going to convert people!" he says, sounding like a street preacher.

Then, turning more serious, Springsteen notes that he has encountered "a lot of people who actually haven't made their minds up" about how they will vote. "I have friends who grew up Republican, and they're unsure. One guy's an outdoorsman, so the environment is important to him. Those kinds of people we might be able to reach."

Another issue is the war in Iraq, a topic on which Springsteen is anything but ambivalent: "If you mislead your people into a war, and that costs a thousand lives and many, many more wounded and $200 billion of taxpayer money, and it turns out the grounds for going to war have been false, you lose your job ... There's an element of common sense to it."

Political observers believe the Vote for Change tour could be a factor in swaying voters.

"You get 10,000 people in a stadium, and swing them to your side, well, we saw states decided by less than that four years ago," says Matthew Felling, media director for the nonpartisan research group Center for Media and Public Affairs.

He believes Vote for Change removes "the conservative's favorite charge against entertainers, that they're chardonnay-sipping out-of-touch liberals. You can't say that about red-white-and-blue Bruce Springsteen."

More important, Felling says, is the capital Springsteen and others have built up. "The singers have a power the politicians don't possess — sincerity. Americans know that the wardrobes of Bush and Kerry are focus-grouped to death. There's more trust with the artists."

But there are risks to the performer. Robert Thompson, professor of popular culture at Syracuse University, puts it this way: "In a divided country, where people who think one way tend to get upset with people who think differently, (a performer) could alienate a big portion of the fan base very quickly. This wouldn't have been the case in the '60s, where issues like the draft united whole generations."

Thompson adds that Vote for Change's high visibility poses another danger: the taint of association that could last far beyond Nov. 2. "You're forever linked to this cause, no matter how the election turns out," he says.

That didn't stop Conor Oberst, the singer, songwriter and leader of Bright Eyes, from getting involved in the tour.

"It's not a time for subtleties," says Oberst, 24, who put aside work on a new CD to participate.

"I'm not saying electing Kerry will wipe the slate, but at a time when civil liberties are being flushed down the toilet and there are worries about freedom of speech," having Kerry in the White House "will be a vastly better situation. If you're an artist, I think you have an obligation to talk about these things, do what you can to change the situation."

Springsteen says that while he's been frustrated by the media's handling of Iraq and the apparent unwillingness of John Kerry to treat the election as a "street fight," he remains convinced that the idealism that spawned Vote for Change is not misplaced.

"That is a deeper sort of Americanism than the jingoism, the right-or-wrong dime-store version of the American myth the Republicans are so good at packaging. To me it's the essence of patriotism, being truthful."

'Weapons of Mass Distortion' tour electrifies the Iron Horse

By Silas Lowe
Collegian Correspondent

NORTHAMPTON — Project Object opened their "Weapons of Mass Distortion" tour at the Iron Horse in Northampton on Tuesday. Rarely does one go to see a tribute band expecting to be blown away, nevertheless the artful way in which this band was able to reproduce the music of Frank Zappa while at the same time infusing it with their own interpretations left the audience floored. However, with two prominent members of Zappa's band as the front men, Napoleon Murphy Brock and Ike Willis, one can hardly call Project Object a typical tribute band.

Project Object
Iron Horse
Northampton
Sept. 29

The music is a tapestry of complex time signatures, erratic melodies, striking band cohesion and satirical wit that defies categorization. At any given point it balances between avant-garde, jazz, reggae, rock and a myriad of other divergent musical genres.

When asked why he plays the music of Frank Zappa, keyboard player Eric Svagard simply stated, "Because it sucks."

The title of the tour "Weapons of Mass Distortion" is an obvious attack on the Bush administration. The band made this overtly clear by belittling our President at every opportunity, going so far as to insert his name into the lyric of some of Zappa's more vulgar songs.

The show opened with the well-known "Montana," about a dental floss farmer in the state who uses zircon-encrusted tweezers to do his harvesting and waxing, which was from the album, "Overnight Sensation."

The band covered a wide spectrum of Zappa's career including, but not limited to "Stick it Out" from "Joe's Garage," "King Kong," a medley from "Freak Out" (Frank Zappa's debut album), "Trying to Grow a Chin" and an encore of "Zombie Wolf."

The band, as assembled at the Iron Horse, consisted of Willis, Brock, Andre Cholmondeley, Dave Johnsen, Glen Leonard, Svagard and special guest guitar player Robbie Seahag. On a side note they will be playing at the Middle East in Cambridge on Nov. 10 with guest guitar player Dave Fiuzcynski of the Screaming Headless Torsos. If you don't know this band, and many people don't, you should.

Fiuzcynski is a fretless guitar player who redefines the art of playing stringed instruments. He also put out an album with John Medeski entitled "Lunar Crush," which is a real gem of an album.

In the nick of time, offense heating up for a pair at home

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Looking to build off two consecutive wins, the Massachusetts women's soccer team returns to action this weekend with a pair of home matches. The Minutewomen take on Saint Joseph's at 3:30 p.m. today, and Temple visits Rudd Field for a 1 p.m. game on Sunday.

The Minutewomen (2-5, 0-1 Atlantic 10) have experienced a boost in their offensive production of late. The Minutewomen have put seven goals on the board in the last two games. At the start of the season, goals were at a premium as they tallied only four in the first five games.

Coach Jim Rudy, fresh off collecting his 200th career win at UMass, hopes his squad is turning the corner after the slow start.

"Monday was big," Rudy said of his team's win against Holy Cross. "Everyone was making a big deal about the 200th victory, but I was making a big deal because it was our second win of the year.

"We've seen some constant progress in every game," Rudy said. "Every week there's something that's a little bit better."

Rudy has been preaching patience all year to his young team, and it finally seems like the Minutewomen are beginning to jell.

"Our upperclassmen are coming around, and they're all figuring out how to play together," Rudy said.

The biggest difference for UMass in the last two games has been an increase in scoring chances. The team has been getting more players to the goal, and the result has been more production.

One player who has stood out for the Maroon and White during its recent surge is freshman midfielder Jenny Roehrig. Roehrig has notched a goal in each of the past three contests, with the two most recent serving as game-winners.

Rudy looks at any offense provided by Roehrig as a bonus because her main role is taking care of the dirty work around midfield such as tracking down opponents, getting to balls and connecting with teammates.

"Roehrig's major contribution is helping to establish a presence at midfield," Rudy said.

One of Roehrig's strengths is her ability to pick and choose when to make her presence felt on the offensive end.

"She's a smart and deceptive player," Rudy said. "She doesn't overtly attack or take many shots, but then all of a sudden she appears at times when the opponents don't expect it."

"She's reminiscent, in a way, of the great player Erin Lynch. Lynch was called the dagger because two or three times a game, she would wait for the right opportunity and then surge to the ball and send a dagger through the other team," Rudy said.

It is clear how highly Rudy regards Roehrig by his comparison of her to Lynch, a three-time All-American and the 1994 and 1995 Atlantic 10 Player of the Year.

Rudy will need Roehrig and the rest of her teammates to keep playing at a high level this weekend as they take on two Atlantic 10 foes.

First up are the St. Joseph's Hawks (3-7, 1-0 A-10), who have yet to live up to some lofty preseason expectations. The Hawks qualified for last year's A-10 tournament and coach Jess Reynolds was quoted before the season as eyeing a conference championship this year.

UMass takes on Temple (3-5, 0-1 A-10) Sunday, yet another physical opponent. The Owls feature a balanced offensive attack with five players sharing the team lead for points.

Minutewomen keep reeling

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

Wednesday night's field hockey contest between Massachusetts and the Providence Lady Friars was a game of runs. The Maroon and White controlled the ball for the opening 15 minutes of play but struggled during a 10-minute offensive surge by PC in a 2-1 loss at Garber Field.

UMass (2-8) moved the ball well in the opening minutes and controlled the flow and tempo of the game. The Minutewomen drew their second penalty corner just eight minutes in to the game. Patricia Borneo sent the corner stroke to teammate Katelyn Wolfrey, who set up Marlie Tigchelaar for the goal. Tigchelaar's first goal of the season gave Massachusetts a 1-0 lead.

"I thought we played well in the very beginning of the game because we kept it simple," coach Patty Shea said. "We came out and scored a goal, and then we stopped doing the simple (things). We were stringing some nice passes together, we had some great play in the beginning and then we slipped in to a comfort zone."

PC (5-7) took advantage of the complacent Minutewomen and responded swiftly with an offensive counterattack. The Lady Friars fired four shots over six corners before finally striking pay dirt. Lauren Sickel released a shot that Massachusetts' goalie Christine Tocco blocked with a kick save. The ball bounced off of Tocco's pad right to a perfectly positioned Abby Maguire, who knocked the rebound in for PC's first goal.

"They didn't make any adjustments. We lost our discipline. We didn't stay balanced enough," Shea said. "We got caught with too many players up field. We didn't stay balanced with our defense. We just weren't really aware of where our teammates had moved so we lost our balance on the field, and we let them slip behind us. That can't happen. When you give them a chance like that, they are going to take advantage."

The Lady Friars didn't wait long to strike again. Providence forward Kati Lary intercepted an errant pass and sprinted to an uncontested breakaway on Christine Tocco. Lary drew the Massachusetts goalie out of the net and then dropped a pass over to a trailing Maguire, who drilled home her second goal of the game with 10:27 left in the first half. The goal put PC up for good.

"It was very preventable," Shea said of the goal. "We weren't in balance. We had the ball we were all kind of drifting forward on attack. We all lost our mental discipline in regards to our balance defensively. They came up with a great interception and threw the ball forward. We got caught on our heels. At that point, they were on a 2-0 break, and there's not much you can do. Our goalkeeper did the right thing; came out and forced her wide, and we didn't get back to help her."

After the two Lady Friar goals, UMass was unable to muster much offensively for the rest of the half. The closest the Minutewomen came was with under a minute to go, but Adrianne Monaco's shot was saved by Friar goalie Meredith Jones and Gina Sanders missed wide with the follow up.

On paper, the game appeared to be a deadlock as both teams fired seven shots in the half while Providence led six to four in corners.

The second half provided fewer scoring opportunities for the Minutewomen, as they were only able to get off four shots on goal in the final period.

"At halftime we needed to be more disciplined and needed to get back to the simple things. I think they did some things, but then at the end of the game, (Providence) started to press, and (we) started to get away from the simple. And they tried get back to the spectacular when they're under pressure which is extremely difficult to do," Shea said.

Maguire and Lari lead the barrage, launching five of Providence's 11 shots, but none of the attempts found the back of the net.

Tocco's play in the net was the key to keeping PC off the board in the second half. Tocco registered four of her seven saves in the second half. The seven saves brought the senior goalie's total up to 92, which puts her in the top five in saves nationally. Friar keeper Meredith Jones was equally impressive in goal, registering five saves.

Spiders have had trouble stopping opposing offenses, allowing a total of 25 goals on 46 shots. Freshman goalie Eric Sciocchetti has seen the majority of time in net, playing in the first six games and giving up 20 goals.

The defense of Richmond has been tweaked from week to week and is the team's main weakness. Seniors Stephen Douglas (one goal, one assist) and Jimmy Budd have not been able to pull together a young core of defensemen that includes sophomores Andre Townsend (one goal, one assist) and Joe Dinocero (one assist). Freshmen Phil Hartman, Trey Thornton and Sant Pugsley (one goal) also share time and are expected to grow and contribute more in years to come.

Junior midfielder Steven Wolfe (three goals, one assist) and junior forward Colin Vini (two goals, one assist) are the only pure offensive threats the Spiders possess. Vini was the team's MVP in 2003. Senior midfielder Paul Kelly (four assists) has proven to be effective at getting those guys the ball deep in opponent's territory.

The Spiders open league play at Fordham tomorrow. With losses to No. 22 Seton Hall, and the always-competitive Connecticut, it's hard to tell whether Richmond can turn their season around and make a run for the title. If they improve and do well in the A-10, it will be because Gettler found the right chemistry on defense.

Saint Joseph's

Saint Joseph's 18-year coach Tom Turner was hit hard at the end of last season, losing eight senior starters to graduation. Despite the loss and a current record of 1-6 hopes are still high that the Hawks can compete for the A-10 crown.

"Even though we are going to learn on the run, I still believe we can achieve our goal of making the Atlantic 10 playoffs," Turner posted on the teams Web site.

Saint Joe's was 8-11-1 overall (5-5-1 A-10) last season. They are returning only two seniors, keeper Chris DiStefano (21 goals against, 39 saves) who will see the majority of playing time in net, and defenseman Pat Mondile who should be a non-factor having played in only two games this season.

The Hawks have only scored six goals so far and will have to improve if they intend on making a run. The two leading scorers for the Hawks are junior midfielder Scott Cunningham (two goals) and sophomore defensemen Jim Brown (two goals). Freshman forward Chris Powell and sophomore forward Andrew Takats have also scored this season. Turner has found another promising player in freshman midfielder Patrick Duddy (two assists).

The Hawks are young and might be good in a few years, but with no scorers and shoddy defense, look for them to finish close to the bottom of the A-10 this season. They host UMass in the start of league play today.

Xavier

The Musketeers have not made the playoffs in the A-10 since 1997. They were 4-15-1 last season with a 3-8 record in conference. They did not win a single game on the road last year and are returning only two seniors. They were shut out 12 times and set a record for a season low in goals scored with only 13. Coach Jack Hermans is in his 14th year as head coach at Xavier, and he is very optimistic.

Despite a 2-6 record this season, Xavier will most certainly be exciting to watch should they make it to Washington, D.C. for the A-10 playoffs. With victories over Bowling Green and Conference USA powerhouse Cincinnati, Xavier has one of the toughest non-conference schedules in the A-10. The Musketeers have lost close games to Wright State, Georgia State, Detroit and Cleveland State. Their record could very easily be 6-2 heading into conference play today at Duquesne.

Hermans brought in a wealth of young offensive minded players at the start of this year after the lack of goals last season. Freshmen Jimmy Cummings, Jon Enders (two goals), Joe Fleckenstein (two assists), Matt Guidry, Patrick Hewitt, Matt Soldano (one goal, one assist) and Matthew Wheeler are all expected to contribute right away.

The offensive tenacity brought by these young players has even reinvigorated the returning upperclassmen. Senior forward Nick Frasher (three goals, one assist), junior defenseman Chris Wolever (one goal), junior midfielder Mike Horejs (one goal) and 2003 all-rookie team selection sophomore forward Toni Skudrzik (three goals, one assist) have all had impressive starts.

Junior Ty Helmle (five goals allowed, 22 saves) and senior Brian Schaeper (14 goals allowed, 27 saves) have been splitting time in the goal for the Musketeers.

Temple

The Temple Owls were 7-3-1 in conference last year (13-6-3 overall) and lost in the championship game to Rhode Island while completing their best season since 1990. Coach David MacWilliams has reason to smile with nine returning starters. Two exhibition wins over Barbados Soccer Academy and Villanova showed that Temple was a force to be reckoned with. Despite only scoring seven goals heading into league play, the Owls have held opponents to just 10 goals.

The team is anchored by senior goalkeeper Patrick Hannigan (nine goals allowed, 31 saves). Hannigan was named player of the week by the A-10 and the Philadelphia Soccer Seven for the week ending September 19. He also garnered a preseason all-conference team selection and last year's Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year. Temple has received great defensive performances from seniors Andy Watto, Steven Wacker (one assist) and Tony Viglietti.

Temple features a solid but young team. Freshman forward Stephen Bristow (two goals, one assist) leads the team in offensive production. Sophomores Matt Maher (one goal), Ryan Heins (one goal) and Ryan McMullen (one goal, one assist) have all grown as players and have stepped into a more involved role in the offense.

The team is led by experienced juniors who, last year, propelled the Owls deep into the A-10 tournament. Forward Nick Ebersole has two assists, defenseman Joe Brocker has one goal, and midfielder Tony Donatelli has a goal and an assist.

Look for Temple to make it deep into the A-10 playoffs. They almost beat Duke and NC State, and they won big against Long Island, Rutgers and Drexel, which legitimizes a potential run for the crown. Temple opens A-10 play tomorrow against Rhode Island. This could be the test needed to see how far they can make it in the postseason.

Duquesne

The Dukes were co-Atlantic 10 regular season champions last season. Two-time A-10 coach of the year Wade Jean, in his seventh year, returns to the helm after another impressive campaign, going 13-3-3 (8-2-1 in A-10). Duquesne was bumped out in the semifinals of the A-10 postseason tournament last year. They finished the season nationally ranked No. 25 in the National Soccer Coaches Association of America poll. Jean returns eight starters but lost the school's all-time leading scorer Damien Pottinger to graduation.

At 4-4, the Dukes have found it tough living up to lofty expectations. With arguably one of the easiest schedules in the A-10, they have managed to defeat Philadelphia, Yale, Lehigh and Robert Morris. They have recorded losses to Albany, Lafayette, Cleveland State and Brown. Preseason all-conference selection senior midfielder Derek Mackenzie (one goal, two assists) and fellow preseason all-conference selection sophomore defenseman Noah Salsi (one goal, one assist) have been virtually shut down by opposing teams thus far.

Last season's A-10 Rookie of the Year, sophomore goalie Zach Varga, has allowed only seven goals and has recorded 16 saves to pace the Dukes. Senior defenseman Matt Mehler (two assists), junior forward Andrew Bell (three goals), senior midfielder Jason Sourbeer (one goal, one assist) and junior forward Steve Mellor (two goals, one assist) have provided steady offensive production.

Freshman forward Auron Van Overschelde (one goal), and preseason all-rookie team selections, midfielders Travis Mackenzie, and Nick Balara, are also expected to help the marked stars of the team. Duquesne begins A-10 play tomorrow against Xavier. The Dukes remain at home until they travel to URI, UMass and St. Bonaventure to conclude conference play. Having almost a month of home field advantage might be enough to get them into the playoffs, but unless they can beat the teams they are supposed to beat, this season will not be as successful as last year.

Dayton

In the A-10 coaches' poll, Dayton is the preseason favorite to take the A-10 regular season title. In coach Dave Schureck's fifth season, Dayton (3-3-1) has already beaten Wright State, Evansville and Eastern Illinois. Close losses to Michigan State, No. 9 Michigan and Wisconsin make their current non-conference record deceiving.

Last season, Dayton (12-5-2, 7-3-1 A-10) cracked the top 10 in the nation only to fall out of NCAA tournament contention due to a string of injuries. This season, they return 19 of those players while losing only one starter. Star senior midfielder and team leader Tye Stebbins (four goals, one assist) was named to the College Soccer News National Team of the Week for the week ending Sept. 19. Stebbins scored the lone goal against Michigan in a losing effort. Stebbins and senior forward Chris Rolfe were chosen as preseason all-conference selections.

The Flyers offense has gotten a huge helping hand from their juniors. Defensemen Nate Darr (one goal, one assist), Dasan Robinson (one goal, two assists), midfielder George Nanchoff (one goal, three assists) and forward Omar Jarun (two goals) have shown that they can play at the championship level.

Senior keeper Steve Ladislaw (nine goals allowed, 13 saves) has helped bring along freshman keeper Matt Troop (five goals allowed, 16 saves). The two now share time in between the posts for the Flyers. Troop is a player to watch in the future as are preseason all-rookie selections Aaron Swanson and Chad Tetirick.

La Salle

Pat Farrell is in his 18th year as the head coach of the Explorers. Last season, he led La Salle to a 5-11-3 overall record (3-8 A-10) and a three-way tie for ninth place with Xavier and Fordham. This season, the Explorers are hoping that the right mixture of new and old faces will lead to a better record and a postseason berth.

This season, La Salle (4-2-1) has defeated Delaware, Philadelphia, Bucknell, Drexel and tied Navy. Their losses came at the hands of Villanova and Virginia Commonwealth University. They look strong behind the 2002 Defensive Player of the Year, senior goalkeeper Stash Graham (nine goals allowed, 34 saves).

Their sub par record last year reflected their immaturity and youth, but this year Explorer fans should see it as a blessing. Junior midfielder Josh France (two goals, one assist), junior midfielder Ryan Moseley (three goals, one assist), senior midfielder Kevin Coleman (two goals, three assists) and junior defenseman Scott Golden (three goals, two assists) have put both points on the board and helped to win games for La Salle.

Minutemen looking to clip wings

UMass opens conference play against St. Joseph's tonight

MATTHEW KEEN/COLLEGIAN

Freshman forward Sam Griswold splits between two New Hampshire defenders during soccer action last week. The Minutemen are 3-5 on the season, and they look to improve that record tonight at St. Joe's.

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After getting mixed results during its non-conference schedule, the Massachusetts men's soccer team will travel to Philadelphia to kick off its Atlantic 10 season against St. Joseph's (1-6-0, 0-0-0 A-10).

The Minutemen, who have won three out of their last five games, are still looking for their offense and defense to get on the same page. In its last game, UMass (3-5-0, 0-0-0 A-10) held Boston University scoreless through regulation. As the defense stepped up, the offense fell by the wayside as UMass ended up losing in overtime.

UMass has been missing the assistance of Tim Kitchell, who usually plays center defensive midfield. Kitchell was given a red card in the Minutemen's game against Harvard for cleating a downed player on Sept. 14. Kitchell has served his suspension and will be a key component to a team that has been looking for stability up the middle.

With Kitchell back in the lineup, players like Todd Skelton and Ralph Pace can return to being offensive threats rather than defensive options. In the last game, UMass moved Pace and Skelton to the back at times to sure things up.

Leading the way for the Minutemen on offense so far has been Rob Charest and Oral Bullen, who have four goals and two assists apiece. Two of Charest's goals have been game-winners, his first in double overtime against Hartford on Sept. 14, then again against New Hampshire in overtime on Sept. 22.

St. Joseph's has had its fair share of issues this season, losing its last two games. The Hawks one and only win of the season came against little known Philadelphia University, 3-2 in double overtime on Sept. 15.

The Hawks lost a lot in the offseason, with eight starters graduating. Three of their top goal-scorers were part of this graduating class, with Adam Duffy (six goals, three assists), Matt James (five goals, one assist) and Andrew Kulinski (three goals, five assists), who was the all-time leader in assists.

The loss of offense has obviously hurt St. Joseph's as it has only scored five goals in seven games, including three shutouts.

If there were one team that the Minutemen would like to get on the same page for, it would be the Hawks. Last year, UMass had its most dominating performance against St. Joseph's, lighting up the scoreboard in a 5-0 victory on Nov. 2, 2003.

The ongoing battle for goalie between Nick Billman and Colin Burns is continuing into the A-10 season. Both goalies have played four games this year, and both have 1-2 records.

Billman has the slight edge in goals against average with 2.15 while Burns has a 2.45.

Shaking down A-10 men's soccer

Rhode Island

Reigning Atlantic 10 champion Rhode Island (5-3) has started out exactly where it left off last season. URI has beaten Rider, Harvard, Northeastern, Providence and Vermont. The Rams losses have come against perennially successful clubs, Lafayette, Oregon State and Boston University have proven to be tough non-conference opponents no matter who they have lined up against and have given URI problems. Despite a record that may not correctly reflect their success, the Rams started the season ranked 24th nationally.

Coach Ed Bradley goes for his 200th victory today at Temple. Bradley, in his 16th season, went 13-10-1 last season (6-4-1 A-10) and led the Rams past Temple in the A-10 finals. Bradley and the Rams were finally downed by Connecticut in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

Coach Bradley will depend on a scoring attack that, last year, was devastating to opponents. Striker forward Sasha Gotsmanov (eight goals, one assist) was named to the preseason all-conference team and has so far lived up to the hype with 24 career goals. Sophomore midfielder Jeff Gonsalves (three goals, three assists) has matured and stepped up for the offense, scoring two goals against Harvard to down the Ivy League favorites.

Freshman midfielder and preseason all-rookie selection Dawid Badecki has two goals and an assist, and junior forward John Kochis, junior midfielder Simon Gatti, sophomore forward Joe Spofford, freshman midfielder and preseason all-rookie selection Lukasz Turnikz, and junior forward Brian Mazza have all contributed to the Rams success with a goal apiece.

Anchoring the defense is junior keeper Dean Ruddy (11 goals allowed, 30 saves). Rudds, a redshirt junior, has 91 saves in his career at Rhode Island in his second year as the starter.

St. Bonaventure

With the toughest schedule in the A-10, the Bonnies have started out 4-2-1 by beating non-conference teams Bowling Green, Syracuse and Loyola. After tying Binghamton, St. Bonaventure went on to beat Niagara, only to receive their first two losses of the season against Oregon State and Gonzaga in consecutive games last week.

Sixth year coach Bill Brady had hoped to improve on last season's dismal record (2-16-1, 1-10 A-10). The Bonnies have responded thus far by going undefeated for the first three weeks of the season and carrying a national ranking (25th) until the two recent losses.

Leading the charge in the rejuvenation of St. Bonaventure is junior midfielder Andy Garcia (two goals, five assists, last years all-rookie team member forward Kevin Omokhua (three goals), junior midfielder Frederick Taylor (one goal, one assist) and junior midfielder Konrad Paszkowski (three goals).

The Bonnies expect big things from freshman defenseman John Darrah (one assist), freshman forward Brendan Roach (one goal), and the two freshman twins Jon and Nick Lopez.

Senior goalkeeper Sean Eyde has been superb allowing just nine goals and recording 31 saves, and senior forward Mike Hanna (one goal) has been effective off the bench.

St. Bonaventure could easily take this year's title. They have the defense and the goal scorers to go up against anybody. They have shown that they can win anywhere under any circumstances. If Omokhua can be the scorer he has shown glimpses of becoming, then the Bonnies are unbeatable. Pay close attention Oct. 31 when they play at Rhode Island, as it could be a preview of the postseason championship game.

Fordham University

Second year coach Jim McElderry and his Fordham Rams are looking to improve on last year's 10th place finish (4-12-1, 3-8 A-10). The Rams have a mixture of senior leadership and exciting new talent that they hope can revamp their program.

Last year's team MVP and current captain Riad Mehovic has two goals and an assist so far this season. Both goals paced Fordham to a 3-0 win over Army on Sept. 19. Mehovic has nine goals in his career at Fordham. Fellow seniors Scott Felluss, and Greg Mannix will be seeing significant playing time as defense while Luke Nephew will join Mehovic at midfield. Junior forward Mike Forenza has a goal against both Marist and Army and is in a four-way tie for the team lead in goals with two. Junior goaltender Stephen Faber will get the majority of time in the net for the Rams. He has allowed six goals in six games and is expected to groom freshman heir Justin Burse.

Burse leads a class of freshmen and sophomores who are highly touted around the league. Freshman midfielder Brian Glennon was named to the preseason all-rookie team. Forwards David Jacques (two goals) and Shaun Muantem (one goal) have exceeded expectations, while sophomore forward Anthony Akande (two goals) was named last week's Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week.

Before the start of league play next week the Rams are 2-3-0 with wins against Army and Iona College. They are 2-1 at home this season. If their youth can continue to improve, they will likely be a contender in years to come. They start league play against Richmond today at home and then go on a four-game road trip. They return to Murphy Field on Oct. 17 against Temple. If they want to be successful this season, they must learn to win on the road.

George Washington

George Washington (1-5-1) is looking at a rebuilding year after losing eight seniors at the end of last season, including one of the top scorers in Colonials' history, Arnar Johannsson. Coach George Lidster, who is in his 17th season, is counting on his two senior co-captains, defenseman Trent Wilee (one goal) and midfielder Matt Miller (one assist), to teach the freshmen the ropes of Division I soccer. With only two seniors on a team with 12 freshmen, success this season will depend on the progression of the younger players.

Juniors Andre Chapman (two goals, one assist) and Benjamin Mortimer (one goal) have been offensively productive so far this season. Junior forward Jon Allen (two goals, one assist) has also picked up some of the offensive slack in trying to replace Johannsson. Junior midfielder/forward Frank Ambrosio (two assists), and junior midfielder Steve Brown (two assists) have also given the Colonials a much-needed offensive spark.

Sophomore Jeremiah Burke, who was named to last year's all-rookie team, also comes back to help lead the defense. Other young up-and-coming players include goalie Derek Biss (10 goals allowed in six starts), preseason all-rookie team defender Matt Davis (one assist), sophomore midfielder Joseph Siegel (one goal), and freshman forward Wade Gerhardt (two assists).

The Colonials finished 7-11-2 last year with a 5-4-2 record in conference. With only one win this year, coming against Howard, it is doubtful that they will be a threat in the A-10. They open up A-10 play tomorrow at La Salle.

Richmond

In 2003, Richmond made it to the A-10 tournament semifinals but is off to a rocky 1-5-1 start in non-conference play. The Spiders shared the A-10 regular season title with Duquesne last season as well. Despite losing nine seniors, coach Jeff Gettler was optimistic that they could make another run for the title.

"Overcoming the loss of nine players is never an easy task, but with the solid nucleus of returning players and a talented group of newcomers, we expect to compete for the Atlantic 10 championship once again," Gettler said on the University of Richmond Department of Athletics' official Web site in August.

Richmond was undefeated in league play last season, going 7-0-4 (10-5-5 overall). This season, the

Pagan pride in Amherst

MATTHEW KEEN/COLLEGIAN

The Pioneer Valley Network of Pagans attracts people at the Fifth Annual Pagan Pride Day, held this Sunday in Amherst Common.

By Maria Varmazis
Collegian Correspondent

The Fifth Annual Pagan Pride Day, sponsored by the Pioneer Valley Network of Pagans, was held on the Amherst Town Green on Sunday with a large turnout.

The day had "a pretty darn good" turnout according to Co-Coordinator Lisa Wood.

Drumming, music, rituals, storytelling, vendor booths, divinations, crafts and rides were among the many venues offered. Pagan Pride Day was held to spread awareness of the local Pagan community and educate non-Pagans in the area about the practices and realities of Pagan traditions.

Sarah-Megan Walsh, president of the UMass club Student Pagans Integrating Religion and Life Spiritually explained Paganism as a "diverse... Earth-centered," religion that makes "no distinction between nature and spirit."

Wood was encouraged by the large attendance and believed that as more than 250 people had already shown up only two hours into the event—a number on the way of surpassing last year's turnout of 350 people.

Pagan Pride Day was also held as a goodwill venture to collect food items to benefit the Western Massachusetts Food Bank. The previous year's contribution of 875 pounds to the Food Bank would be easily beaten this year.

Wood said that many Pagans practice alone. She thought that this event would be a great opportunity for followers to be more knowledgeable about their faith.

"A lot of pagans practice by themselves so this is a chance to get to see that there are other people out there."

Wood also wanted the event to reach out to community members that are unfamiliar with Pagan practices. "We're different and we're like everybody else," she said. "We're not scary and we're not mysterious...we're soccer moms and we're other than soccer moms."

Applefest a success

By Samantha Smith
Collegian Staff

Families, friends and students came to Amherst Common to enjoy artwork, music and a bevy of booths exhibiting a healthy supply of food at the eighteenth annual Apple Harvest Festival on Saturday morning.

The Festival, which was run by the Amherst Family Center, lasted from 10 a.m. until 5 p.m. In this time span there were a multitude of events for adults, children, and students to enjoy including hayrides, pony rides, carnival-like games and live entertainment. One entertainer, award-winning musician Roger Tincknell, was happy to be part of the festivities.

"The Amherst Family Center sponsored me," Tincknell said.

A graduate of UMass Amherst, Tincknell volunteered to provide an hour-long gig that let children interact with him and each other. It proved to be quite enjoyable for the kids and the older audience as well.

And, watching the live spectacle of performers wouldn't have been complete without snacking on the famous fruit of the day — apples, which were supplied by Atkins Farm, a local farm stand located in South Amherst. Assistant Buyer Manager of Atkins, Paul Hodgkins, explained his relationship with the Festival.

"We got involved with the Amherst Family Center five and a half years ago," he said. "We have our orchard and a retail store, and we liked the idea of getting involved with a craft fair. We had no way to say no."

Hodgkins also explained his relationship with UMass.

"We do a lot of business on the UMass campus," he said. "The business community has been working together for a long time, and I hope we continue to do so."

MATTHEW KEEN/COLLEGIAN

Feeding the goats is one of several activities featured at Applefest this weekend.

After enjoying a caramel apple or two, it was impossible to not see the numerous craft booths the festival had to offer. One such booth, Beads Indeed, ran by artist Marie Wallace, contained many pieces of handcrafted jewelry of all styles and designs. This was Wallace's first time at the Festival. She noted that she enjoyed the "beautiful New England town" of Amherst, and thought that the campus of UMass was equally picturesque.

What was clearly evident at this Festival was the amount of hard work that was put into it explained Nancy DiProsse, the director of the Apple Harvest.

"The Apple Harvest," she said, "is a major fundraiser for the Amherst Family Center. It's run mostly by parent volunteers and office staff, but tons of people in the community are involved, too."

DiProsse explained that the festival's staff works to make sure the event is at its best.

"The staff gets together to organize such things as getting about 100 crafters to come...they sort through the possible crafters to keep the quality high," she said. "Volunteers work on everything from publicity, getting the equipment we need, to finding sponsors to buy ads in our program book."

Lastly, DiProsse explained how important the Applefest fundraiser is for UMass.

"The Amherst Family Center is affiliated with UMass's Commuter Services and Housing Department. It's a nonprofit organization that helps provide education and a place for children to play and meet other families. We've been helping students get involved for over twenty years."

UMass Freshman Anna Drury summed up the day nicely.

"It was good to see the community and the school come together to get involved with something that benefits both sides," she said.

Women's group holds discussion

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Correspondent

The Everywoman's Center of Amherst and the Women's Studies Department is hosting a panel presentation and discussion titled "Women Activists Speak Out: Why Our Vote Matters," this afternoon from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. in Campus Center room 911-915.

Five panelists will focus on the impact of the upcoming election on women and the importance of voting. Each panelist will speak for roughly ten minutes on a particular woman's issue. There will be a question and answer portion to follow.

Sandy Mandel, the events coordinator for the Everywoman's Center, stated that her primary motivation for putting the event together was to inform women on the impact the election will have on each one of their lives. She also emphasized the impact that women can have on the election.

"It's not like the election is going to happen to us," said Mandel.

She feels the "differences are extreme" between the stances President Bush and Senator John Kerry have on women's issues. Mandel said that President Bush's stance on issues such as gay marriage, abortion and the economy are quite different than those of Sen. Kerry.

"The election will impact every area of women's lives," Mandel said.

Nancy Patteson, Women's Studies Graduate Program Coordinator, helped to organize the event. She said wanted to help "provide perspectives on the impact of the election."

State Representative, Ellen Story, will moderate the discussion.

"I'm very pleased to be asked, especially with the important election coming. The more the public gets to know about the politicians the better," Story said.

Story hopes this event will motivate people to get involved in government. She feels it is vital that, "bright, eager, young people learn about what goes on in government."

Katy Noone, a senior Journalism major and Women's Studies minor, will be one of the esteemed panelists this evening. Noone was recommended to the panel by professor Millian Kang.

Noone completed a research project on "Women and Voting" for Kang's Critical Perspectives in Women's Studies class. The project consisted of a 10-page long research paper and an on-campus action component. Noone's component consisted of her and several other classmates working in the Campus Center for a week last April, handing out voter registration forms and absentee ballots. They were able to register fifty students to vote.

No one said that absentee ballots must be submitted in person by noon on the day before the election at the local town hall. All students who are registered at home will not be able to vote in Amherst unless this absentee ballot is completed or if they re-registered to vote in the town of Amherst.

The panel also includes Mayor of Northampton Mary Clare Higgins, Professor of Economics at UMass Nancy Folbre, MacArthur Foundation recipient Annalise Fonza, legislative aide to Springfield Representative Benjamin Swan and Eimy Santiago, who recently spoke at the Democratic National Convention.

The League of Women Voters of Amherst will offer voter registration at the event, which is free, open to the public and handicap accessible. Refreshments will be provided.

Jaguar receives unsafe ratings

By Dee-Ann Durbin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The 2004 Jaguar X-Type got the worst rating of any midsize sedan in side-impact crash tests conducted by the insurance industry.

The X-Type, which starts at $31,000, fared worse than some less expensive cars, according to test results released Sunday by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety.

The institute's test measures the impact on dummies in the front and back seats of a sedan that is struck in the side by a sport utility vehicle traveling 31 mph. The government's test mimics a side-impact crash involving two cars.

Adrian Lund, the institute's chief operating officer, said the Jaguar's side air bags protected the dummies' heads, but the side of the vehicle was crushed and could have caused severe injuries to the driver's torso.

Both the 2005 Mitsubishi Galant and the 2004 Saab 9-3 earned the institute's highest rating, along with the 2004 Lexus ES 330 and the 2004 Acura TL.

The 2004 Saab 9-5, 2005 Mercedes C class and 2005 Volvo S40 earned the institute's second-highest rating, "acceptable."

The Saab 9-3 and the Toyota RAV4, a small sport utility vehicle, are the only vehicles to earn the institute's best pick designation on both side-impact and front-crash tests, Lund said.

The Mitsubishi Galant's top rating was a significant improvement from 2004, when it was tested without side air bags and got the institute's lowest rating. In 2004, the vehicle had optional side air bags.

The institute does not test vehicles with air bags unless the safety devices are standard. The 2005 Galant has standard air bags that protect the chest and head. Lund said the difference was dramatic.

"Mitsubishi should be commended for making side air bags with head protection standard in this relatively inexpensive car," Lund said. "The results for the Galant show that you don't have to spend a lot of money to get good protection in side-impact crashes.

The starting price for the 2004 Galant was around $18,500.

The institute said all of the cars had head-protecting side air bags, which have been shown to reduce deaths by about 45 percent among drivers who are struck in the driver's side.

Twenty-seven percent of 2004 vehicles offered head-protecting side air bags as standard equipment. An additional 21 percent offered them as an option, the institute said.

Car accident; 3 injured

Two female passengers were injured Friday after being struck by a car driven by a Hadley man on University Drive on the University of Massachusetts campus. The accident victims' male companions then assaulted the driver when he got out of his vehicle.

Brian Delisle, 19, struck Erica Conforti, 17, and Shauna Moroney, 17 of Stoughton, Mass., while they were crossing University Drive near Southwest Residential area at 9:54 p.m.

According to the UMass Police Department, the females were not in the crosswalk at the time of the accident. Neither the operator nor pedestrians are UMass students. The names and ages of the male companions were unavailable at press time.

Delisle and Moroney were both transported by Amherst Fire Department to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton and released. Delisle's injuries were due to the assault, according to UMPD. Conforti was treated at the scene.

The cause of the accident is still under investigation, as well as the altercation that took place immediately following the accident.

Pagan Pride event successful

This year's Pride Day marks a significant change in location, a change that Wood believes contributed to the larger turnout than previous years. In the previous four years, the event was held in Strathmore Park in Russell, which is "slightly more enclosed." According to Wood, the location change "[has] been excellent, everybody was really excited to have it in Amherst this year."

In response to questions about the college Pagan community, Wood believes that the college years are a key time for many to realize their religious convictions.

"A lot of students come to Paganism in college. It's the first time they... meet other people, and I know a lot of times I hear it's like 'I didn't realize other people thought or felt the same way I did, until I went out to school.'" she said.

Walsh said Pagan Pride Day was a chance for us to gather together in the open and celebrate.

"It's something that we enjoy doing and we encourage those from the community, even those who have no clue what Paganism is, to come out and spend time with us. By spending time and seeing and meeting people you get to overcome preconceptions and fears and learn more."

She emphasized the importance of educating people about Paganism, especially when many are under false impressions.

"We try to do a lot of clearing of negative stereotypes and to show that it's not living up to the stereotypes that have been associated with it for so long... [Paganism] is not the black witch and the pointy hat..." Walsh said.

Surette agreed with Walsh's statement.

"We still have a lot of Christian churches telling people that we're in service with the devil... and that's not the case. We still have local law enforcement agencies thinking that we're Satanists... and we have nothing to do with that sort of thing," Surette said.

Community members in attendance were pleased with the day's events, echoing the enthusiasm of the Pagan Pride Day coordinator.

"It met my expectations, they had a lovely day for being out on the common like this, and I wasn't sure... whether it would feel weird to be in a public square...[but] since Pagan Pride is meant to be that kind of showing who you are to more of the world so they can know that it's not all the stuff that all the propagandа says," said Tamatin Laurel.

Iraqi forces emerge in patrols

By Zidan Khalaf
Associated Press

SAMARRA, Iraq (AP) — Bloodied by weeks of suicide bombings and assassinations, Iraqi security forces emerged Sunday to patrol Samarra after a morale-boosting victory in this Sunni Triangle city, and U.S. commanders praised their performance.

American and Iraqi commanders have declared the operation in Samarra, 60 miles northwest of Baghdad, a successful first step in a major push to wrest key areas of Iraq from insurgents before January elections.

But locals were angered by the civilian death toll.

Of the 70 dead brought to Samarra General Hospital since fighting erupted, 23 were children and 18 were women, hospital official Abdul-Nasser Hamed Yassin said. Another 160 wounded people also were treated.

"The people who were hurt most are normal people who have nothing to do with anything," said Abdel Latif Hadi, 45.

Twelve miles south of Baghdad, two bodies - those of a woman and a man whose head was severed - were found, with police saying the corpses looked like those of Westerners.

Police Lt. Hussein Rizouqi said no identification was found on the corpses. The woman, who was shot in the head, had blond hair, he said.

Insurgents have used kidnappings and grisly beheadings in their 17-month campaign to drive the United States and its allies out of Iraq. More than 140 foreigners have been kidnapped since April, some as political leverage and others for ransoms. At least 26 have been killed.

A Lebanese electrical company appealed to Iraqi kidnappers to release two employees seized last week, saying they were not working with U.S. forces. The men were among 10 people seized by a group calling itself the Islamic Army in Iraq - the same group that claimed responsibility for abducting two French journalists last month.

U.S. warplanes hammered another rebel-held city, Fallujah, the latest strike in weeks of attacks targeting groups linked to terrorists, particularly the network of Jordanian militant Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

The city hospital said two people were killed and 12 were wounded in the airstrikes. Two more people, a man and his wife, were killed and two others were wounded when a tank fired on a house, Dr. Rafe al-Issawi said.

The U.S. military, which confirmed only one strike targeting a building where insurgents were moving weapons, regularly accesses the hospital of inflating casualty figures.

Residents said U.S. troops built temporary checkpoints across two entrances into the city, 40 miles west of Baghdad, regarded by the U.S. military as the "toughest nut to crack" in Iraq.

"We're very worried that Fallujah might be next after Samarra," Fallujah resident Saad Majid, 40, said. "I have children I'm very worried about them. We don't sleep all night because of the strikes."

U.S. military officials have signaled they plan to step up attacks into key Iraqi cities this fall - partly as a way to pressure insurgents into negotiating with Iraqi officials.

"I have personally informed (Fallujah residents) that it will not be a picnic. It will be very difficult and devastating," Iraqi President Ghazi al-Yawer said Sunday on the Al-Arabiya television net work.

But he said Iraqi troops had to establish a presence in all cities.

On Sunday, residents said they heard sporadic explosions as U.S. and Iraqi forces hunted for rebel holdouts in an otherwise calmer Samarra. Iraqi police patrolled the city, while American soldiers

St. Helens update

By David Amkins
Associated Press

MOUNT ST. HELENS, Wash. (AP) — Mount St. Helens stewed in volcanic gases and low-level earthquakes Sunday, with crowds of eager tourists hoping to glimpse an eruption that scientists said could happen immediately or take a few weeks.

A second long tremor early Sunday and an increase in volcanic gases strongly suggest magma is moving inside, researchers from the U.S. Geological Survey said. The mountain's alert was raised to Level 3, the highest possible, after a volcanic tremor was detected Saturday for the first time since before the mountain's 1980 eruption.

"I don't think anyone now thinks this will stop with steam explosions," geologist Willie Scott said Sunday at the Geological Survey's Cascades Volcano Observatory in Vancouver, Wash., about 50 miles south.

But Scott said scientists discussed lowering their alert from a Level 3 "volcano advisory," which indicates eruption is imminent, to Level 2 "volcanic unrest," which indicates an eruption is possible. They needed more data before making any change, he said.

"What we haven't gotten back today yet is a lot of field measurements - there's a gas flight going on, a flight to use thermal imaging to look at the (lava) dome, GPS data needs to be downloaded," Scott said Sunday. "There's a lot of work that needs to be done. That will occur overnight and tomorrow morning."

Scientists said they do not expect anything close to the devastation of the May 18, 1980, explosion, which killed 57 people and coated much of the Northwest with ash.

"Of course the volcano reserves the right to change its mind," said monument scientist Peter Frenzen with the U.S. Forest Service, which operates the park.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Monday, October 4, 2004 Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Age of innocence over

Becky Martins

Nothing can feel more violating than being a victim of theft.

From an early age, people are educated on the importance of morals. We are taught not to lie, cheat, hurt others, and steal. Many of us learn from such lessons and apply them to our own lives, but others fail to see the significance in ethical behavior. These individuals believe themselves to be above the law and above the concept of treating fellow human beings with respect. Before long, their actions illustrate their lack of consideration and concern for others.

Until coming to college, I guess I lived life in a bubble. Coming from a small town, the only real crime I saw was on the news. Many people would leave their doors unlocked at night without thinking twice. And while illegal activity occurred, it was rare and oftentimes kept quiet. I guess growing up in such an environment influenced my perception of the world. Negative things only happened to others, not myself. People could not possibly be so immoral as to take from or hurt others. I knew I was not capable of such things, so how could others be?

But two weeks ago, I received a very rude awakening.

The night began like any other Friday. I went out, made appearances at a couple of parties, and returned to my dorm room in Kennedy early Saturday morning. After unlocking my door, I threw my purse on my bed, as I had done every night upon getting home. Afterwards, I went down the hall to visit some friends, unconsciously leaving my door resting against the door-frame, unlocked. I had had intentions of returning soon, but before long, a few minutes had become an hour. Around 2 a.m. I headed back to my room, tired and ready for sleep. I did not think to check my belongings. As far as I knew, my room was in the exact condition as I had left it an hour earlier. Surely, no one would have entered and searched through my things, knowing I could be back at any minute.

The next morning, I woke up at 10 a.m. and felt the need to use my cell phone. I began to look for my black Guess bag, knowing my phone would there since I had used it the night before. But after few minutes, my search proved unsuccessful. My room was fairly clean and did not provide many hiding places. I knew my purse had to be there, since I had gotten into my building and unlocked my door the night before. But after calling my cell with my room phone and hearing no ring, I panicked. My wallet, credit cards, IDs, keys, and miscellaneous, but personal, items could not just disappear? At this point, after rethinking my actions the previous night, I came to a realization: As much as I did not want to believe it, my belongings most likely had been stolen.

After filing a police report, having my dorm room lock changed, and canceling cards and replacing IDs, I was lucky enough to get a break. After being missing for a week, my purse turned up in the laundry room on the floor below me: with contents soaked, my cash stolen, and cell phone still missing—So much for a happy ending.

Even though I have some of my belongings back, it does not make the situation any easier to deal with. The comfortableness I had felt living in the dorms is gone. The trust I had felt in my peers, since they are mostly likely the ones responsible, is broken. But most significant to me is the change in how I perceive people.

It is disheartening to realize how much theft occurs in the world, especially on UMass' campus. All of the dorms, especially in Southwest, have chronic breaking and entering and cases of stolen property. It is not uncommon for someone to find his or her belongings missing, such as when a friend of mine's bag was stolen from the Text Book Annex while she bought books. Even campus property, which is oftentimes donated and something to take pride in, is not safe from culprits.

The comfortableness I had felt living in the dorms is gone. The trust I had felt in my peers, since they are most likley the ones responsible, is broken.

For instance, on September 19, 2004, the Chief Metawampe statue, which had stood near the Student Union, was taken from its stand. Though it was found, the incident still resulted in the figure sustaining noticeable damage, as well as in giving UMass students a rap of being disrespectful, unappreciative, and irresponsible. Basically, because certain individuals find it acceptable to steal and deface property not belonging to them, we all have to pay.

I wish people had enough respect for themselves, and for others, to leave property alone not belonging to them. But I know this is too much to ask for in today's growingly immoral society. Instead, I advise people to learn from my mistakes and not to be naïve to reality. The world is not a carefree place where little crime occurs, despite what lies we may have grown up believing. Never assume we are immune to the world's negativity. Some people are capable of hurting others and feeling little remorse for their actions. Sadly, though, these are some life lessons I had to learn the hard way.

Watching a silenced perspective

Ramzi Kanazi

After one of the bloodiest days since the start of the second Intifada, western Massachusetts celebrated the Palestinian Film Festival,"Aqoola Lakum" (Let Me Tell You). The BBC reported that on Thursday, "at least 27 Palestinians and three Israelis died in fighting...many civilians were among the dead and injured."

On Friday, the festival screened 26 films from October 1 to October 3 in Northampton, Holyoke, and Springfield, commenced at Smith College with "Ticket to Jerusalem" at 7 pm. The contrast is startling.

The first night's program, "Life Under Occupation" featured a short film, "Like Twenty Impossibles," and a faux documentary "Ford Transit". These films offered a powerful view on a nearly silenced perspective of Palestinian life. Those often seen in the media as only killers or victims were real people this weekend.

In the first film, "Ticket to Jerusalem" by Rashid Masharawi, a man travels from checkpoint to checkpoint so that he can show movies to children with his mobile cinema throughout the occupied territories.

This movie tells a tale of a man who struggles with issues familiar to all people—from his relationship with his wife to struggles with work. It does so under the suffocating setting of Israeli occupation. Considering refugee status and what the future may hold for them, the film also illustrates some of the conflicts between Palestinians and Israeli settlers: Israelis who live in homes recognized as Palestinian or areas accorded to Palestinians under international law.

This touching film highlights the sacrifices that the protagonist makes to provide cinema to the occupied children. The cinema exerted such a powerful effect on his own upbringing that he could not fathom the idea that these children who suffer humiliation and so many injustices could miss out on such a positive, formative experience. His commitment to these endeavors caused stress in his relationship with his wife, but she realizes and ultimately accepts that his sacrifice is her sacrifice too.

Following the screening, a question and answer session took place. This was conducted by a panel that consisted of three Palestinian filmmakers Hanna Elias, Annemarie Jacir and Kamran Rastegar. These filmmakers were uniquely passionate about the subject matter of their work. The audience, as well, was engaged and interested to learn more about the Palestinian experience.

In "Ticket to Jerusalem", Jewish settlers had taken over the residence of an old Palestinian woman and her daughter, leaving them just one room in a very large home. The settlers tormented them by locking the only bathroom door, by running in the courtyard naked, and through verbal belittlement. After viewing the film, one member of the audience asked the panel why the Jews were portrayed so despicably. The panel responded that this was not the case, and they commented that the settlers are many times worse than the images presented in the film. They distinguished that there are many Israeli Jews who are very progressive and committed to the peace process. The settlers, on the other hand, are in some number, opportunists who descend onto the Palestinians' land, wreaking havoc on those trapped within the occupied territories. These settlers are belligerent towards the Palestinians. The presenters heatedly described this point. Their depiction of the settlers made it clear that the cinematic rendition of their actions was generous indeed.

The settlers, on the other hand, are in some number, opportunists who descend onton Palestinians' land, wreaking havoc on those trapped within the occupied territory.

In addition, the panel members discussed the difficulties that they themselves experienced while filming in Israel. They spoke of instances where their equipment was confiscated and their tapes were either erased or destroyed. They encountered the same checkpoints that were prevalent in several of the films shown during the festival. These artists had to endure long waits and unflattering confrontations. They have been hurt and dispossessed. Their movie characters are often reflections of their own lives.

As well as participating in the question and answer session after the first film, the Palestinian-American Jacir responded to questions following the screening of her own work, "Like Twenty Impossibles," a short verite fiction that explores different identities of Palestinians and their treatment under Israeli occupation. After this discussion, it was apparent that she modeled the main character, which she played, after herself. She explained that her films reflect what she sees as a "process of humiliation." She continued by describing situations during her childhood in which witnessed her family strip-searched upon crossing the bridge from Jordan to Israel as a child. Living in Ramallah, Jacir stated that after 9pm, "the ghetto is locked." No one is allowed into or out of the city. Other occupied cities experience curfews where the occupants cannot leave their homes for extended periods of time. Despite this, she continues to travel there for the three months allowed as a tourist because she knows that this is home.

It was truly refreshing to be exposed to information that is normally silenced. I hope that many more will join in exploring other facets of disputed peoples not reported in the West.

Choking on alphabet soup: Organizations face questions

Chris Eckel

How many acronyms can I fit into one column? Start counting... The chatter on campus is that the two worst groups around are the SGA and OIT, because neither is very effective. OIT always lets down the students and never manages to return those emails we all send at 2:30 in the morning when SPIRE isn't working. And don't even think about trying to find OIT staffers in the office unless you've got all day. They manage to hide away for several hours, although they do eventually give into the persistence of students who can't function without their AIM. Once you track them down, it's a matter of mere weeks before your problem is fixed. There has been no shortage of displeasure expressed about the SGA in the last several years.

Complaints about the existence of ALANA Senate seats, the lack of ALANA Senate seats, flawed elections, and the budget apportionment process have all swept across this campus. Most recently, students from Grayson to Coolidge have seen the website depicting prominent members of the Student Government Association drinking in the SCERA office and posing next to a caricature of Speaker Patrick Higgins as a member of the KKK. All the people in those photographs erred tremendously, and UMass will suffer for their poor decisions.

Higgins has paid dearly for his lapse in judgment, as he has lost the privilege to lead the students of this campus. Other officers who were at the party may resign in the future. Further-more, there is no way to predict the chain of events that will come about because of these photos, and the potential for a racially and/or ideologically divided campus is frighteningly real.

However, now is not the time to dismiss the ability of the SGA to effect positive change on this campus. The potential for the SGA to improve this school remains vast, and you can all help in doing that work. If the actions of the SGA truly matter to you, and they should, get out there and get involved. The first step, of course, is to vote. Later this week, dozens of your fellow students are going to be outside the DC's begging for your vote. It's tempting to just walk by, but give them a second of your time and see if they are worth voting for. If they're willing to stand outside for two days to try and improve their school, it doesn't seem too unreasonable for you to give 34 seconds of your time to do the same. The reward for voting is that once the candidates are elected, their job is to listen to you, their constituents. Go and find your Senator. They aren't that hard to track down, since their phone number and emails are listed on the website, and some will live in your living area. The highest-ranking officers of the SGA are even easier to find. The Speaker and the President both spend much of their time in the SGA office, located in 420 Student Union. Contrary to popular belief, they aren't there because they have nothing else going on in their lives. They are paid out of student fees to work in that office. Go and make an appointment and tell them what you think about the issues that matter to you.

...there is no way to predict the chain of events that will come about becuse of these photos, and the potential for a radically and/or ideological divided campus is frighteningtly real.

Don't think there's anything going on at UMass that concerns you? How about the new alcohol policy that mandates that your parents are going to find out if you sneak a sip of beer? How about the new construction all over campus that's just now beginning and is slated to cost over $500 million when all is said and done? What about the proposals to re-organize the Greek system? This year there will 130 security cameras that will be operating on campus, and soon, if all goes to plan, there will be cameras in every residence hall.

For all you lobby Casanovas, how do you feel about having your embarrassing attempt to secure some digits recorded for posterity? Judging by the Fox network, everyone in America wants to be on television, but this doesn't seem the best way to do it. Anyone interested in whether or not the football team will be moving to Division 1?

These are just some serious issues that the student government will be dealing with this year. Not only do the officers of the SGA want your opinion, they need it. An effective government is one that listens and acts upon the concerns of those it governs. However, to be heard, you have to do more than write or talk about how the SGA needs fixing. Go and talk to people who serve the SGA, and let your opinion be known in unmistakable terms.

Complaining to your friends about our student government isn't doing enough, and simply emailing the officers of the SGA also fails to do the job. Go and track them down and talk to them face to face. Just ask the guys at OIT: It's a lot easier to ignore an email than it is a face. And by the way, the answer is 22.

All oppression must go

Wesley LaRochelle

Racism has always been a tempered subject, particularly on diverse and liberal college campuses such as this one. It is a pressing issue and certainly one that has not gone away. But something bothers me about the reaction being laid out towards this subject in the recent past: why is there hardly ever such a reaction to the problems of "homophobia?"

Whenever there is a hate-crime committed against a homosexual on campus, it hardly appears as a threat to the campus community. I do not want to take away from the necessary attention paid to racism, I just want a heightened awareness of the fact that homophobia and racism are interlinked and that homophobia is a real issue on campus.

Nobody has made mention to the delicacy of safety there is to homosexuals in this area. As in the past debate of same-sex marriage where homosexuality has been put in the spotlight, not many people have commented on the danger homosexuals have been placed in.

When the holocaust memorial was wrecked, the native american statue tampered with and even the recent photos depicting examples of racism were presented to campus it was met with outrage.

Since I've been on campus, I've had people threaten to beat me up for looking at them, I had someone write "fag" on my door late at night, I've seen hundreds of words scrawled across walls, posters, and so forth expressing hatred to gays, I've seen GLBTQA posters ripped down, slurs written across them, and constantly overhear conversations of people speaking derogatively of gay (and other) individuals. The ALANA website even lists the GLBT special interest floor as the only floor undisclosed of its location to keep people from harassing the students that live on it. Why hasn't anyone done anything to improve that situation? I'm sure the floor in itself is there to spread the educational understanding of homosexuality—as is the Stonewall Center—but this doesn't give the campus an excuse not to be involved.

If you walk by the Stonewall Center you may notice the damage done to the plexi-glass that covers their display sign. Swastikas, cracks from rocks, dirt, the words "homo" and "fag" are all etched into the glass and there has been nothing done to replace it. I have to walk by this everyday. Imagine if you were Jewish and had to walk by a sign for your center etched with such commentary, or if you were black and every day you had to see racist comments sprawled across the sign that adorned your cultural center.

When the Holocaust Memorial was wrecked, the Native American Statue tampered with, and even the recent photos depicting examples of racism were presented to the campus, it was met with outrage. But when I spent a month with a roommate who did nothing but ridicule my lifestyle, argue with me on how "disgusting and gross" homosexuality was, and in the end threatened me and called me a faggot, no one told me how far I should've gone with it. I was too scared to drag the event on any longer myself and still no one stepped up to me as a University official and expressed the importance of taking actions further to stop this and other incidences like it.

I express gratitude toward those that are concerned with the safety and well being of all individuals regardless of sexuality, race, gender, religion, ability or age. All I ask is that people recognize that oppression based on sexual orientation is just as real and pressing as other forms of oppression. I also ask that this campus work together to overcome all forms of hatred and not at the expense of placing one group's needs over another. I, myself, am here to let you know that there is so much you can do as an individual to stop these hateful acts. Also, I'm letting you know how important it is that you step up to speak out about ANYTHING you see or hear that is disrespectful of anyone.twas met with outrage.

Working Gear

Walking around campus, it's pretty hard to imagine that yourself and your peers will soon run the world. It doesn't seem likely that the girl who sleeps next to you in chemistry class may be the next Nobel Prize winner, or that the guys who spits on the buttons in the elevator on a drunken Saturday night may be the next CEO or a Fortune 500 company. But a few times a semester you are reminded of this eerie fact, and it makes you absoluteley afraid — career fair time.

Monique Jemmott

Last Wednesday, the SOM career fair brought out our bright-eyed eager leaders of tommorrow in their Sunday's best. The looks ranged from business casual of a shirt and tie for men, or a skirt and blouse for women; to a full blown suit, complete with power tie, and jr. executive briefcase. I personally didn't go to the career fair (I plan to defer the responsibilities of the real world for at least one more year through grad school,) but I did begin to wonder, if infact I did trade in my jeans and Uggs for the working stiff's uniform, would I be able to maintain my fondness for the trends?

The more I thought about it, the more I realized that I really only have one suit. A simple black one that I bought for an interview last year, and wear whenever I need to be in professional wear (of course with different color blouses and shoes). I've never had a need for more than one suit, or a host of business attire at that.

I find that amongst the people I know, the amount of professional clothes they own varies by what types of fields they study. My friends who are business or economics majors have way more business attire than say, myself (a journalism major,) or my friends studying art, or communications — oftentimes because they have had internships in corporate settings.

So what would I do if in fact I did have to go to work upon graduation? To build up a whole professional wardrobe is quite expensive, and I don't forsee having wardrobe-building money right after I graduate— and I think that the people I work with would eventually notice that I keep wearing the same suit every day with different shirts.

The other night while on the phone with one of my close friend's, who recently graduated from UMass, I asked her about her experience. "I was looking like a straight bum for the first month I was working there" she confessed to me "I felt really bad, because all the other girls had their cute little power suits, and trendy little pumps, and I had like 5 pairs of pants I was wearing every week, one for each day, praying that a pair didn't rip or something" eventually, she got the wardrobe together and has more pairs of pants, amongst other things in the rotation.

This may seem like something very minimal to someone of their first job, but how you dress at work really does make a profound statement on your character. As a summer intern at for a major retailer's corporate office, I was lucky that the summer was business casual. But still, I can recall on more than one occasion in my two summers there, the topic of cooler-talk being how the new executives look more like they're going to class than to work — appearance matters more than you think.

And so here I offer a few pieces of advice for keeping your name out of future workplace conversation titled "where does she think she's going?" — begin picking out business attire now, there are many separates that can be worn to work, that are very trendy now (i.e: Tweed, cardigans, cropped slacks, pumps), so you don't have to wait for work to start to wear them; Start off shopping in modestly priced stores for business attire (you don't need the $600 DKNY suit just yet, slow down). Instead cruise stores such as H&M and Target where you can get trendy, stylish suits for as low as $50, and don't be afraid to hit the wholesale clubs (Costco, BJ's, Sams) for your basic business items such as blouses, and stalkings. The prices will be significantly cheaper than the department stores, and you can buy stockings to last a year! And lastly, a simple way to pull together all the cheap business chic attire you will find along your journey — tailor. Hemming too long slacks, or taking in a jacket that may be a tad to big, can make a world of difference in your look, when your clothes appear to be made just for you it gives your entire appearance a look that no one can deny is all about business.

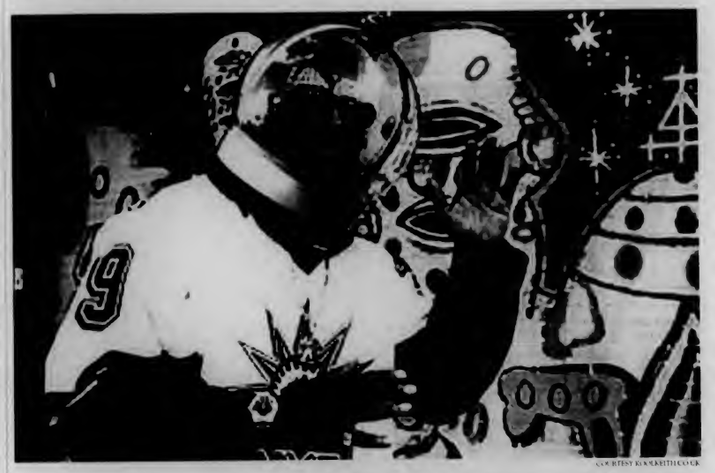
Kool Keith comes to Northampton

Rapper brings unique style to the Valley

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Kool Keith may not be a household name, but anyone that knows his unique brand of eccentric, funked-up rap also knows he's one of the most influential — and most copied rappers —to have ever evaded the mainstream radar. Fans and curious parties will get a chance to see the prolific but rarely touring MC on Monday night when he stops by Pearl St. to unleash a show that will no doubt be unlike anything most of the audience has seen before.

Kool Keith
Pearl Street
Northampton
Tonight



Keith, who has released four albums so far this year, first came into the public eye in the '80s when he was part of the classic hip-hop group "Ultramagnetic MCs" before going solo after the group broke up in the mid '90s. Keith's first solo LP, "Sex Style" was instantly recognized as innovative, skillful, and brilliantly eccentric. The rapper furthered his reputation for all those qualities with his next album. Released under the name Dr. Octagon, the album "Dr. Octagon-ecologyst" is Keith's most successful album — and arguably his best. The album, rapped by Keith as a futuristic, alien, cannibal gynecologist was Keith's first real foray into releasing discs under pseudonyms. This soon became one of Keith's many infamous traits and now it seems more unusual for him to release an album under his own name then to use a pseudonym.

Keith has continued to release many albums under many different names over the past 10 years, and while the quality of some of them varies, Keith has remained a force to be reckoned with. While Keith has a strong reputation for writing hizarre and brilliant rhymes, he has just as strong a reputation for talking trash. Granted, Keith is one of the few rappers who measure up to his own boasts.

He has gained a reputation as an honest, if borderline ranting, artist who is not afraid to tell it like it is, or stand up to major record label and corporate giants. But like any worthwhile musician, Keith knows how to put his money where his mouth is and back up his infamously great claims about himself— especially since it's all on record.

Anyone can hear sounds on Keith's records from 10 years ago, and realize that for instance, Outkast is getting a lot of praise for doing things very similar (right down to music video costumes) to what Keith used to do. As such, Keith has gained an even stronger reputation as a pioneer and as an artist who is ahead of his time. If someone wants to hear what the sound of rap in 5 years will sound like, they'd be wise to listen to one of Keith's current records.

When Kool Keith stops by Pearl Street on Monday, ostensibly to promote his new album — recorded with longtime collaborator Kutmasta Kurt under the name The Diesel Truckers, fans and people who have never heard Keith's music before will certainly get quite a show. It can be safe to expect Keith to perform a career-spanning set of tracks, rant a bit, bring some friends on stage, and almost certainly, throw some porno magazines out to the crowd. Aside from that, it's hard to guess what Keith will do; his shows are notoriously unpredictable, but it will certainly be worth the price of admission. Fans will most delinitely go home happy, and rap fans looking for something exciting and fresh will leave with a new favorite rapper.

Stones: Watts cured

LONDON (AP) — Rolling Stones drummer Charlie Watts has won a battle with throat cancer, lead singer Mick Jagger said.

Watts, 63, was diagnosed with cancer four months ago and recently finished a successful six-week chemotherapy treatment at a London hospital.

"Charlie has had all his treatments and he's now been cleared and is free of any illness," Jagger told the Daily Mirror for Saturday's editions.

The chemotherapy left Watts weak, and he will spend time recovering with his wife, Shirley, before going back to work, the Mirror reported.

The drummer has recently split his time between the Stones and his jazz band, Tentet. Jagger said he hoped to record new material and schedule a tour in the near future for the Stones.

"Keith Richards and I have been writing lots of songs for the new Rolling Stones album," Jagger said. "We haven't booked the tour yet and when we do we'll let you know, but there will definitely be another one."

Campbell honored

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Glen Campbell is joining a heady list of Western heroes.

The Autry National Center is honoring Campbell with its Western Heritage Award for promoting the spirit and legacy of the American West. Past recipients include James Stewart, James Garner, Clint Eastwood, James Arness, Willie Nelson, Johnny Cash, Robert Wagner, Clayton Moore and Gene Autry.

"I'm in some pretty heavy company," said Campbell, 68, noting, "Gene Autry was my hero. Dad would take us to see his movies. Gene Autry was just awesome."

Campbell served 10 nights in jail for extreme drunken driving earlier this year following an arrest near his posh Phoenix home. His string of hits include 'Rhinestone Cowboy,' 'Galveston,' 'Gentle on My Mind' and 'By the Time I Get to Phoenix.'

Connery cancelled

PANAMA CITY, Panama (AP) — James Bond no longer has diplomatic status — at least not in Panama.

The government on Friday canceled 121 diplomatic passports issued by the previous presidential administration, including one extended to actor Sean Connery.

The cancelations came as part of a massive effort to clean up and update the Foreign Relation Department's files, according to Vice President Samuel Lewis Navarro.

The vice president described the Scotland-born Connery as a friend of former President Mireya Moscoso. Connery traveled to Panama in March 2003, visited a coffee plantation belonging to Moscoso and received an award from the then-president.

'Tonight' for Conan

NEW YORK (AP) — Conan O'Brien said he was looking forward to "being on at a time when people can see me" when he replaces Jay Leno as host of the 'Tonight' show in five years.

NBC announced last week that O'Brien, whose show airs at 12:35 a.m. Eastern, will move up an hour earlier when he takes over for Leno in 2009. The move by NBC — and endorsed by Leno — was to keep O'Brien from jumping to another network when his contract expired.

"My parents have no idea what I do for a living," O'Brien joked Saturday night about his late, late gig. "They think I'm still in law school."

O'Brien, who spoke at The New Yorker Festival, said he would likely leave New York, where his "Late Night" show is based, to Los Angeles, home of 'Tonight.'

"We have time to figure it out," he said.

O'Brien, 41, was twice the editor of the Harvard Lampoon, worked as a writer on 'Saturday Night Live' for three and a half years and was the supervising producer of 'The Simpsons.'

He debuted on 'Late Night' in September 1993 after David Letterman moved to CBS for an earlier time slot when he was passed up for the 'Tonight' show job.

yards and a touchdown against UMass on Saturday in a 29-7 Eagles' victory.

But take a closer look at the stats. He has also thrown six interceptions this season. Three of them were by the Minutemen. Two of those were by Shannon James.

"(Peterson) had three interceptions and, as I said, he could have had five," UMass coach Don Brown said following the game.

There is one thing you can't read in the stat sheets, though. There aren't any statistics called "poor decisions" or "terrible throws."

In the first quarter on Saturday, with the Eagles already leading 7-0, Peterson found himself scrambling around on third-and-14. When he finally looked downfield, he noticed a wide-open Larry Lester for a 60-yard completion. It should have been a touchdown, but Peterson badly under threw Lester and BC was forced to settle for a field goal later in the drive.

The Eagles may be able to take points off the board against Division AA teams, but they won't be able to hang with ACC opponents in years to come by doing things like that.

With the ball and leading 13-7 in the second quarter, Peterson connected with Kevin Challenger for a 35-yard touchdown pass. Once again, the ball was under thrown, but it somehow found its way through Tracy Belton's hands and into Challenger's.

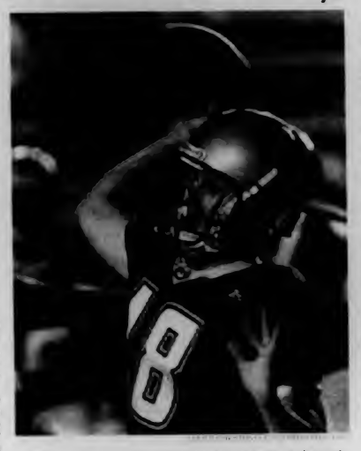
This happened all game. Peterson couldn't throw downfield to his receivers with any consistency or much accuracy. In fact, of his 16 completions against UMass, only nine of them were to receivers or tight ends, and his leading receiver was fullback Mark Palmer, who caught six balls. No one else caught more than three.

The fact that he couldn't connect with his receivers is even more mind-boggling because they were often in single coverage. Due to the disparity in size between BC's offensive line and UMass' defensive line, the Minutemen were forced to stack the box and blitz their linebackers. This would normally be a quarterback's dream if he could pick up on the coverage, something Peterson wasn't able to take advantage of regularly enough.

Peterson was often rattled in the pocket, and he was too quick to pull the ball down and take off with it rather than looking for an open receiver. He dropped back to pass 37 times in the game, and he decided to abort mission and run with the ball seven of those times.

These weren't characteristics of Flutie, so I think the comparisons are very premature at best and, as a senior, Peterson doesn't have much time left to add to his BC resume.

"Paul has got a long way to go," Brown said. "(Flutie) had a heck of a career."



Brown does see one important stat that the two quarterbacks have in common: an impressive number in the win column.

"I don't really judge quarterbacks on numbers," Brown said. "That's all part of it. It's wins, and he is 4-1 as a starter (this season), so I think that's enough said."

If the Flutie comparison seems to be a bit far fetched, maybe Boston College Super Fans can start another comparison with another New England quarterback who does his fair share of winning.

Start the presses, everyone. Paul Peterson just may be the next Tom Brady.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist.

BC quarterback Paul Peterson had 219 yards passing and a touchdown for the Eagles. He also threwthree interceptions against UMass.

the game away with a play that was very symbolic of the afternoon for UMass: close, but not close enough.

Having taken possession at their own 41, the Eagles used a 13-yard completion to Larry Lester and an 11-yard run by Brooks to move the ball down to the UM 35 yard line. On the next play, Peterson lofted a pass towards the left side of the end zone for wide receiver Kevin Challenger, who was covered on the play by the Minutemen's Tracy Belton.

As the ball approached, Belton leaped to make the interception but had the ball sail through his fingertips and into Challenger's hands for a touchdown. The 35-yard strike concluded a four-play, 59-yard drive and gave the Eagles a 20-7 lead with 9:54 left before halftime.

BC went on to add a Ryan Ohlinger field goal at the 4:22 mark of the second quarter, and took a 23-7 lead into halftime.

Strong defensive efforts from both sides relegated the second half to a stalemate. BC finally broke the ice when Brooks broke free for a 49-yard touchdown run with 3:51 to play in the game, giving the Eagles the 29-7 lead after Ohlinger proceeded to miss the extra point.

The Eagles wasted no time in finding the end zone on their initial possession of the game. Brooks, starting in place of the injured Andre Callendar, carried six times during an eight play, 47-yard drive that culminated with the freshman easily finding the end zone from a yard out to give BC a 7-0 lead just 3:11 into the game.

Boston College then forced UMass to go three-and-out on its first possession, and added a 27-yard Ryan Ohlinger field goal at the 5:36 mark to grab a 10-0 edge.

The Minutemen did not go away, however, as James intercepted a Peterson pass on the next BC possession and returned it 47 yards to the Eagles' 16-yard line.

After a holding call pushed UMass back to 24 yard line, Day found sophomore wide receiver Brandon London with a 23-yard pass and followed it up with a one-yard quarterback sneak into the end zone to cut the BC lead to 10-7 with 1:35 remaining in the first quarter.

However the Eagles resumed pounding away on UMass' undersized defensive front, as Whitworth carried the ball eight times during a 12-play 54-yard drive that set up another Ohlinger field goal and a 13-7 BC advantage.

"We decided to take a pretty aggressive format today," Rudy said about adding Canfield to the starting lineup.

The move clearly paid off as the team amassed more shots in yesterday's game than in any game this season and Canfield led the way by putting eight of her 11 shots on goal.

While the weekend ended on a positive note for the Maroon and White, things didn't start as well as they fell to St. Joseph's 1-0 on Friday.

St. Joes (4-7, 2-1 A-10) is known around the league for its physical play and the Hawks only solidified their reputation against UMass, as Friday's game was more of a battle than a soccer game.

Walker kept the game scoreless in the first half as she recorded a number of great saves.

The outlook of the game changed drastically with 5:20 left in the first half. UMass defenders Tiffany Hamill and Christina Nunes collided while going for a loose ball. Both left the game, as Hamill suffered a bruised sternum and Nunes badly bruised her knee.

"That was a big moment in the game," Rudy said. "We were really hitting our stride and I felt good and then that play happened."

Rudy was forced to juggle the lineup and UMass was unable to regain any momentum.

The game appeared to be headed to overtime scoreless until the Hawks' Megan Schutt delivered the only goal of the game with 17:51 remaining.

The Minutewomen had a chance to tie the game with four minutes remaining as Canfield had an impressive attack on goal. Unfortunately for UMass, Canfield's breakaway shot went wide, ending the Minute-women's last scoring attempt of the game.

UMass drops two against ranked teams

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

It was yet another tough weekend for the Massachusetts field hockey team as they faced two nationally ranked opponents and walked away with dual losses.

The Minutewomen (2-10) were less than a minute from walking into halftime confident, as they would have held No. 16 Syracuse (7-4) to one goal in the first half. With 34 seconds left in the half, Orange forward Brittany Carriero tapped in a pass from teammate Paige Sullivan to put Syracuse up 2-0.

The last-second goal seemed to take the wind out of the sails of the Maroon and White as they entered second half flat. The Orange-women capitalized on the momentum swing after just two minutes in to play. Paige Sullivan intercepted a cross pass deep in UMass territory and fired an uncontested hit which she put top shelf past Tocco.

"The thing that causes concern is that we're not working hard enough to get in the right defensive position. Defense is hard work; it's moving your feet, it's getting there," Massachusetts coach Patty Shea said.

The Orange added yet another insurance goal three minutes later as Joanne Lombard took a feed from Meredith Getzel and Lindsazy Pierson on a Syracuse corner stroke. The goal put Syracuse up 4-0.

UMass struggled to get the ball deep in to Syracuse's territory for most of the second half. Their first shot on goal didn't come until 7:26 when Caitlin Beresin shot just wide of the net. Fortunately for the Minutewomen, forward Rachael Mervine was able to get a stick on the rebound as she put the ball in for the only UMass goal of the game.

The first half was a different story for UMass. The Minutewomen were patient on offense, working the ball around the field and finding teammates in the open seams.

"We had opportunities, we've had opportunities in every game we've played. We have to finish, we have to know when it's smart to maintain possession and when it's smart to take the pressure off," Shea said. "I think we're trying to thread some perfect passes that you've got to be the most incredibly skilled player to do."

In the second game of the weekend No. 10 Northeastern (9-2) put the pressure on early and often in route a 6-1 victory of Massachusetts.

The Huskies put on a tenacious offensive attack in the opening minutes of the game rifling nine shots, seven of which were on goal.

The pressure finally payed off at 19:14 when Mari Creatini scored on a pass from Whitney Shean.

Creatini and Shean hooked up five minutes later as Creatini drilled in her second of the game and twelfth of the season. Less than 30 seconds after collecting her second assist, Shean stole a pass off the face off and went in for a breakaway goal putting the Huskies up 3-0.

Northeastern had put 16 shots on goal and drew five corners against the young UMass defense. In comparison, the Massachusetts offense was able to muster just three shots on goal and was unable to draw a penalty corner.

"We miss trapped some balls. We knew exactly what they were going to do on corners and your players have to be disciplined on the field to understand it and execute it," Shea said.

The offensive assault continued in the second half as the Huskies struck twice in the early portion of the half. Ashley Webber scored Northeastern's fourth goal of the game on a pass from Jay Quinn at 31:11. Less than three minutes later Liane Dixon put back a rebound of her own shot to put the Huskies up by a score of 5-0. Dixon would later add another goal to make the score 6-0.

"I think there were some speed match-ups," Shea said when asked about the most potent part of the NU attack. "When someone has more speed you almost have to give them a little bit more space. I thought they had some speed advantages in some instances and we just chose some wrong angles to go at."

Massachusetts got on the board with 12:44 left to go in the game. Caitlin Beresin was able to put back a loose ball in front of the net to make it 6-1. For the game, the Minutewomen were out-shot 33-to-5 and were unable to draw any penalty corners. The Huskies on the other hand drew 11 penalty corners over the course of the game.

Eagles soar over UMass

BC too much for Minutemen

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

CHESTNUT HILL – For Massachusetts head football coach Don Brown, Saturday's game with Division I-A Boston College was exactly what was to be expected.

Using their mammoth offensive and defensive lines to move UMass off the ball on both sides, the Eagles took control of the game in the first half and held on against a competitive Minuteman defense for a 29-7 victory before 43,262 at Alumni Stadium – the third largest crowd to see a UMass football game in the program's history.

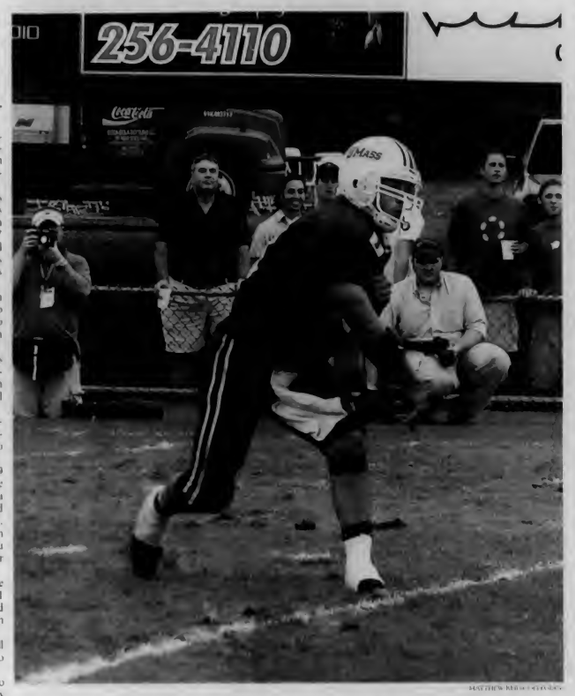
The loss was the third in a row for the Minutemen (2-3 0-2 Atlantic 10), who return to Atlantic 10 action when they travel to Harrisonburg, VA. to battle James Madison on Saturday at 1:30 p.m.

"We played a very big, physical team on both sides of the ball today, and they were extremely well-coached," Brown said. "They pounded us on both sides of the ball, and they deserved to win the football game."

Freshman tailback A.J. Brooks paced the Eagles (4-1 0-0 Big East) offense with 161 yards and a touchdown on 23 carries, while L.V. Whitworth also chipped in with 76 yards of his own on 15 carries.

Quarterback Paul Peterson was 16-of-30 for 239 yards and a touchdown, but was intercepted three times, including one by sophomore Tracy Belton and a pair from junior Shannon James, who was named Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week for his effort.



"Interceptions are going to happen," Boston College coach Tom O'Brien said. "UMass comes at you from all different angles…I think it was a good test for our offense."

Junior Tim Day had trouble moving the offense once again for UMass, completing 13-of-31 for 131 yards and recording just eight first downs. It marked the second consecutive week that the Minutemen scored just seven points.

"We had some trouble on offense again, but we'll fix them," Day said. "We'll be back next week, ready to go, and I'm looking forward to it."

Leading by only six with just over nine minutes to play in the first half, Boston College essentially put they

Peterson gets too much hype

Jeff Howe

Let's put an end to this now.

It shouldn't be open for discussion, and even saying these two names in the same sentence is even a ridiculous stretch.

In fact, there is one way that these two names can be put into one sentence, and I'm about to do it.

Paul Peterson is in absolutely no way as good as Doug Flutie. He shouldn't be drawing comparisons to Flutie, and anyone who considers themselves to have a football IQ higher than Mike Tice should understand this.

Flutie was an icon, not just around the Boston College campus, but around all of New England. He was notoriously small in stature, but his passion and leadership were unmatched.

Flutie helped put Boston College football on the national map in 1984, not just with the Miami miracle, but also with a victory over Alabama earlier in the season on national television. He meant more to the BC program than Michael Vick meant to Virginia Tech a few years ago.

"The Play," or Flutie's 48-yard Hail Mary heave that fell in Gerard Phelan's lap to beat No. 1 Miami 20 years ago next month, is one of the most celebrated plays in sports history.

Flutie was a Heisman Trophy winner, and he had amassed 11,318 total yards in his collegiate career, the most total yards by any single player in college football history. And no one playing football in Chestnut Hill will ever wear the number "22" again.

But lately there have been whispers around the Boston area linking these two quarterbacks together.

Maybe it is Peterson's running and scrambling abilities that remind BC fans of Flutie. After all, there has been a long spell of pocket passers taking snaps at Alumni Stadium. But should Peterson be compared to Flutie because he is quick on his feet

I don't think someone who couldn't beat out Quinton Porter for the starting quarterback job in 2003 should be praised as the second-coming of Flutie.

Sure, Peterson has some nice stats under his name. He is 7-1 as a starter since taking over the job when Porter was injured with three games to go last year. He has thrown for 1,055 yards and eight touchdowns through five games this season. He was 16-30 for 239

Men's soccer ties twice

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

In its opening weekend of conference play, the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-5-2) (0 - 0 - 2 Atlantic 10) traveled across Philadelphia, from Saint Josephs (1-6-1) (0-0-2 A-10) on Friday to Temple (4-5-1) (1-0-1 A-10) on Sunday.

St. Joseph's	1

UMass battled for 220 minutes against the Owls and Hawks, and the final result in both games were the same—after two overtime periods the matches ended in 1-1 ties.

Temple	1

Against the Owls, UMass captain Oral Bullen scored in the 78th minute to force OT. Bullen's goal came after he headed a pass from sophomore Richie Higa past Temple goalie Patrick Hannigan. Freshman Mike Mingione was also credited with an assist for setting up the play.

Bullen's goal drew UMass even with Temple after Owl captain Steven Wacker started the scoring in the 48th minute. Wacker received a pass from sophomore Ryan Heins and fired a shot past Minuteman goalie Nick Billman from 15-yards out for his first goal of the season.

The Maroon and White have now played at least one overtime period in its last four games, going 1-1-2 during that stretch.

A defensive minded team, Massachusetts was unwilling to compromise its defensive position to attack the Owl goal. The teams fought to a stalemate over control of the midfield, and committed a combined 10 penalties.

Massachusetts received four yellow cards and Temple accumulated five.

A turning point in the game came in the final 16 minutes of overtime, when Chad Baker of Temple was red-carded for committing an unsportsmanlike conduct foul. Baker's infraction forced the Owls to play a man down for the remainder of OT.

On Friday, Saint Joseph's freshman Craig Olsen started the scoring with an unassisted goal in the 26th minute. Olsen deflected a shot off a Massachusetts defender, controlled his own rebound, and bounced a shot off the crossbar into the net.

Thanks to a lucky bounce, Olsen was able to score from point-blank range because senior captain Colin Burns was caught out of position, having run out of the net to defend the initial shot.

UMass answered with a goal at 60:11, when Tyler Pagano sent a long cross to Robby Charest, who headed the ball past St. Joseph's goalie Chris DiStefano from five yards away.

The teams played a defensive and physical match, and St. Joseph's was called for 5 yellow cards while the Minutemen were charged with two.

The defensive styles of both teams were seen during extended play, as neither team record a shot in either of the two overtime periods. Reflective of the Temple game, UMass did not want to open up a scoring opportunity for the Hawks by over committing on the offensive side of the ball.

DiStefano faced 17 shots and recorded five saves; Burns made two saves on nine shots.

Charest and Bullen lead the Maroon and White with five goals and two assists each.

Two of Charest's scores have been golden-goals, scored in the final minutes of overtime. He decided a contest September 14th, with a double overtime goal coming in the 104th minute against Hartford. Then on September 22nd, Charest broke a 2-2 tie with New Hampshire in the 94th minute, when he capitalized on a breakaway pass from Bullen for his second goal of the game.

After being held without a goal in the first three games, Bullen recorded a pair of goals in a win over Siena (Sept. 17), and a goal against Hartford.

Freshman Tyler Pagano dribbles the ball against New Hampshire on September 22nd. Pagano has a goal and three assists this year.

Minutewomen split pair

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The results of this weekend's games for the Massachusetts women's soccer team couldn't have been more different.

On Friday, the Minutewomen dropped a 1-0 heartbreaker at home to St. Joseph's but rebounded yesterday with a thrilling 3-2 overtime win over Temple at Rudd Field.

UMass	3

In Sunday's contest, the Minutewomen dominated play but were forced to come from behind twice to tie the score and force overtime.

With 1:18 remaining in the first overtime, freshman forward Britt Canfield took a pass from sophomore Liz Weinsten and beat the Temple goalie on a shot into the right corner of the net.

Canfield's second goal of the game gave the Minutewomen their first Atlantic-10 win of the year.

UMass coach Jim Rudy was pleased with his team's effort yesterday, especially coming off such a tough loss on Friday.

"This is a big win," Rudy said. "We really needed this one, especially because next weekend is going to be incredibly hard."

Next weekend the Minutewomen (3-6, 1-2 A-10) host conference foes Richmond and George Washington.

While goals were hard to come by for UMass on Sunday, the same cannot be said for shots. The Maroon and White out-shot Temple 32-7, with 17 of those shots on goal. The Owls only tested sophomore goalie Kristin Walker with three shots on goal.

"We certainly did it the hard way," Rudy said referring to his team's lack of goals despite controlling the game. "We couldn't have had a loss today after that game the other day and with our domination today."

UMass seemed to be a bit sluggish at the start of the game as Temple (3-7, 0-3 A-10) got on the board ten minutes into the game on a perfectly placed free kick from 30 yards out by Courtney Eaton.

Freshman defensive midfielder Tina Rodriguez plays the ball against Holy Cross. UMass plays Richmond this Friday at home at 3:30 p.m.

The shot deflected off Walker's hands then hit the crossbar landing just over the goal line.

Senior Lindsey Fairweather answered for Umass, tying the game with just over two minutes remaining in the first half. Fairweather took a long pass from freshman Tina Rodriguez and dribbled past one defender before depositing the ball into the right corner of the net for her third goal of the season.

Temple would take the lead five minutes into the second half on a goal by Melissa Foley, but UMass continued to attack until Canfield finally evened the score.

Canfield knocked in a loose ball amid a mass of players on the Temple goal line with 24:02 to play.

The play was set up by junior Lindsey Bellini's cross in front of the net.

UMass had a chance to take the lead four minutes later, but Fairweather's shot hit the crossbar after getting set-up in front by Canfield.

Fairweather said it was important for the team to pick up a win on the first weekend of Atlantic-10 play.

"Friday's loss was hard for us," Fairweather said. "We came out today and said 'we're not losing.'"

"We just kept going at them," Fairweather added. "Possession-wise we definitely dominated."

Both Rudy and Fairweather

Coordinating Council appoints election commissioners to man polls tomorrow

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

After receiving special permission from the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, the Coordinating Council held a meeting last night to appoint elections commissioners to man the polling stations during this week's Student Government Association Senate elections.

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante and the Chancellor of Elections Viktoriya Bronshteyn decided last week to postpone Senate elections, previously slated for last Wednesday and Thursday, due to the lack of volunteers to assist with the polling stations and ballot counting. Gargano granted permission for the SGA to hold an emergency meeting in order to appoint eight commissioners that will hold the job temporarily so that Senators for the SGA can be elected.

"We got special permission to have this meeting," Bustamante said. "This meeting is strictly about getting election commissioners so that we can have good elections this Wednesday and Thursday."

All eight motions to appoint an elections commission passed overwhelmingly. Undergraduate students Emma Lang, Ahad Hayat, Bibi Khandija, Urfan Sadozai, Harkirat Kour, Michelle Pedevillano, Glana Tortorella and Caitlin Burbidge will all be working in various dining commons during the elections. They also will be donating their time to help Bronshteyn tally up the votes.

"This is a very important time for everyone in SGA," Bustamante said. "Because right now we have no senate or judiciary, it is important that we nail this, and this is a moment where we either get stronger or we go into a darkness and the administration takes over."

Members of the Student Government Association Coordinating Council appointed all election commissioners for the upcoming Senate elections last night. Elections will be held on Wednesday and Thursday.

In addition to electing a new Senate, President Bustamante had been under the assumption that once Senate elections were ratified, a new Speaker and Associate Speaker would be appointed. However, Associate Speaker Seamus Brennan has yet to resign and insisted in a memo that he be recognized as his formal position.

Jeffrey Napolitano, Secretary of Press Relations for SGA, was enraged to find out that Brennan had not submitted a resignation. "He said he was going to resign for literally a week now," Napolitano said. "[Bustamante] even got special permission to have a session without a Speaker or Associate Speaker."

According to Napolitano, Brennan plans to take over the position of Speaker, appoint an Associate Speaker, then resign, thus lining up the newly appointed Associate Speaker for Speaker position.

Former Speaker Patrick Higgins resigned last Thursday after controversial photos revealed him and eight other prominent SGA figures drinking in a University office and referencing a caricature a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard.

Student Coordinator for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, Brian Roberts, who allegedly snapped the pictures and posted them on his website, has not yet resigned and plans to run for Senate this week.

"I have a hard time believing that members of the 'KKK9' are not resigning. If pictures of them drunk, in a University office with Klan graffiti behind them isn't enough to shame them into resigning, I don't know what is," Napolitano said.

Bustamante, who did not anticipate Roberts' attendance at the meeting, condemned his decision to run for Senator in Orchard Hill.

"His behavior isn't compatible with the position of running SCERA," Bustamante said. "What is even scarier is that he said that he recognizes his poor behavior but feels this whole thing is being blown out of proportion."

Bustamante acknowledges that he cannot interfere with democracy and attempt to prevent Roberts from running; however, he said that he plans to do everything in his power to remove him as Student Coordinator for SCERA.

Football player receives neck wound in fight

By Erika Lowley

A member of the Massachusetts football team suffered a puncture wound to his neck during a fight involving five other UMass students early Friday morning in the Southwest Residential Area.

According to three anonymous sources, including an unidentified member of the football team, starting junior defensive back R.J. Cobbs of Parsippany Hills, N.J., suffered a puncture wound on the right side of his neck. UMass police would not identify the victim due to a pending investigation.

Cobbs was treated and released from Cooley Dickinson Hospital for the quarter-inch deep cut and released with a two-inch by two-inch gauze bandage. He was still able to start in the football game against Boston College on Saturday.

The injuries of the other men involved are not known, although UMass Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald said some facial injuries might have been sustained due to punching.

UMass police are unsure if the puncture wound was caused by a weapon or the bushes that the six men were wrestling in during the fight.

"We're not sure of the implement of the puncture wound," said Archbald. "We don't believe it was a knife."

According to the same sources, the fight involving three Caucasian and three African American males broke out at approximately 2:30 a.m. Friday morning directly outside of the main entrance of McKinnie Dorm. Three of the six men involved are also members of the football team.

According to Archbald, the three white males were standing on the outside of the dorm engaged in a heated argument with two black males on the inside of the building, and challenged them to come outside and fight. The two recruited a third male from inside to help them in the fight, which lasted approximately one minute. At least three of the men involved had been drinking, according to the Umass Police Department.

Parts of the fight were captured by a security camera on the outside of one of the dorms. The tape shows the men hitting, kicking, and wrestling in the nearby bushes. The videotape is now being reviewed by UMPD to determine if any charges will be brought against the six, as well as identify more witnesses.

"We have identified all six parties and several witnesses," said Archbald. "The investigation is only about 70 percent complete."

Archbald said that racial overtones were a factor in the fight and police have already met with the victim, several witnesses and the District Attorney's office to determine if civil rights violations were a factor.

Police are required by law to report any incident involving a civil rights or hate crime violation to the DAS office to determine if the charges are valid.

"We do take these matters very seriously," said Archbald. "We have to proceed meticulously … as soon as we can move forward we will."

No charges have been formally brought against the six because police have yet to speak to two of the men involved. According to Archbald, charges may not be brought against all of the men, but could range anywhere from disorderly conduct to assault and battery to civil rights violations.

UMPD was not notified of the incident until 6:18 a.m. on Friday morning, when a nurse at Cooley

Voting to be held for Senate tomorrow

The Student Government senate elections will be held this Wednesday, October 7, and Thursday, October 8, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m.

Polling stations are located in all of the Dining Commons on campus and in the Campus Center. Residents from each living area are assigned to vote in a specific Dining Common.

-Residents of Northeast and Sylvan are expected to vote in the Worcester DC

-Residents of Orchard Hill and Central are expected to vote in the Franklin DC

-Residents of Southwest are expected to vote in the Hampshire and Berkshire DCs.

Commuters are expected to vote in the Campus Center.

In the cases where they are needed, absentee ballots will be provided at the polls. The Vice Chancellor's office will provide some staff assistance to ensure that all polling locations will be open and available to the student body.

Bush says Kerry is dangerous for peace

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

CLIVE, Iowa (AP) — President Bush said Monday that rival John Kerry's foreign policy stands "are dangerous for world peace," leveling some of his harshest criticism of the campaign during a trip to an important battleground state. Bush also signed tax relief legislation for 94 million Americans and hit Kerry on that issue, too.

Labeling Kerry a tax-and-spend liberal, Bush told over a thousand campaign supporters, "I've lowered taxes and my opponent wants to raise taxes."

Re-fighting last week's TV debate on Iraq, in which polls suggest Bush lost ground to Kerry, the president said, "The policies of my opponent are dangerous for world peace. If they were implemented they would make this world not more peaceful but more dangerous."

The Kerry campaign answered back. "If George Bush thinks John Kerry's plans to strengthen the military, build alliances and implement the 9/11 Commission's intelligence reforms will make the world a more dangerous place, he's even more detached from reality than he demonstrated at the debate the other night."

Bush lost Iowa four years ago by less than 5,000 votes, and the president used the trip to play off his frequent portrayal of Kerry as a candidate who shifts his stand on the war in Iraq.

"You may have noticed he changes his position quite frequently, but not on taxes," Bush said. "In his 20 years in the Senate, he's voted to raise your taxes 98 times. Now all of a sudden he saying he's for middle-class tax relief."

Ellen Story, Mayor of Northampton encourage women to vote in elections

By Brian Duffy
Collegian Staff

Ellen Story, Massachusetts State Representative for the Third Hampshire District, and Northampton Mayor Mary Clare Higgins were among several of the notable speakers highlighted in the "Women Activists Speak Out: Why Our Vote Matters" presentation given in the Campus Center last night at the University of Massachusetts.

Arranged by Nancy Patteson of the Women's Studies department, in collaboration with Sandy Mandel of the Everywoman's Center of Amherst, the event encouraged women to vote. The League of Women Voters of Amherst provided voter registration for all in attendance.

One hundred million people did not vote in the 2000 Presidential election, said Story. Story said she asks everyone she meets if they are registered to vote, from the checkout person at Stop & Shop to her dental hygienist.

Julia Scribner, a Women's Studies major, attended the event hoping to improve the quality of her research paper for a women's studies course. "I haven't registered to vote and I need to," she said.

Nancy Folbre, Professor of Economics at UMass, was the first of five panelists to speak. She opened by urging those in attendance to "Rock the Vote."

"Democracy is the worst form of government except for all the other ones we've tried," she said, quoting Winston Churchill. Folbre said that our country's government resembles a plutocracy, with "money that votes, and money that wins." She encouraged the crowd to keep their spirits up in a time of great political uncertainty. "The point is not to understand the world, but to change it," she said, quoting Karl Marx. "I think we should do both."

Mary Clare Higgins, the Mayor of Northampton, urged women to vote and run for office. "Women need to be in the rooms, and at the table making decisions," said Higgins. She explained that white men typically make political decisions. Higgins is one of only five female mayors, out of 42 possible positions in the state of Massachusetts.

She said she reads several different newspapers each day and asked the crowd if they do the same. "If you don't know what's going on in the community, how do you know what needs to be changed?" she asked.

She said the election is between two "starkly different" candidates. "If you think the government is designed to

Nobel Prize awarded for odor-sensing research

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

Linda B. Buck

Two Americans won the Nobel Prize in medicine Monday for discovering how people can recognize an estimated 10,000 odors, from spoiled meat to a lover's perfume.

Dr. Richard Axel, 58, of Columbia University and Linda B. Buck, 57, of the Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Center in Seattle revealed odor-sensing proteins in the nose and traced how they send their information to the brain.

The Nobel Assembly at the Karolinska Institute in Stockholm said it chose the pair for the $1.3 million prize not because of any practical payoff from the work, but simply because they enhanced understanding of "the most enigmatic of our senses."

For two scientists to single-handedly map one of the major human senses is unique in the history of science, Nobel assembly chairman Goeran Hansson said.

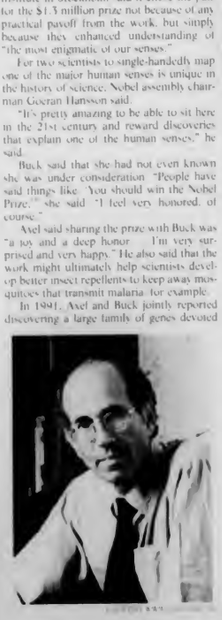
"It's pretty amazing to be able to sit here in the 21st century and reward discoveries that explain one of the human senses," he said.

Buck said that she had not even known she was under consideration. "People have said things like 'You should win the Nobel Prize,'" she said. "I feel very honored, of course."

Axel said sharing the prize with Buck was "a joy and a deep honor. ... I'm very surprised and very happy." He also said that the work might ultimately help scientists develop better insect repellents to keep away mosquitoes that transmit malaria, for example.

In 1991, Axel and Buck jointly reported discovering a large family of genes devoted to producing different odor-sensing proteins, called receptors, in the nose. Before that, scientists could only guess at how many different receptors were needed to distinguish smells in the environment.

Scientists now know that people have some 350 to 400 types of odor receptors, each of which can detect only a limited number of odors.



When a person sniffs perfume or fine wine, for example, a mix of different types of molecules flows over the receptors in the back of the nose. That activates an array of receptors, but only those primed to respond to those particular molecules. The brain notes which receptors are activated and interprets this pattern as the smell.

Since any given receptor can participate in more than one pattern, "you might have a rose and a skunk being recognized by some of the same receptors," Buck said.

Axel and Buck, who worked independently following their 1991 paper, went on to show that only one kind of receptor appears on each of the 5 million or so odor-sensing nerve cells in the nose, which was a surprise. They also showed how these nerve cells are wired into the brain.

The Nobel assembly said that it is still unclear what the medical and scientific implications of the discoveries will be, but that the work could affect areas as diverse as psychology — to explain why scents often remind us of childhood — and cooking, since scent and taste are intertwined.

"It's possible, I guess, that someone down the road could use this knowledge to cook up something really delicious," Hansson said. "But I think that's pretty far in the future."

World leaders accused of indifference to suffering

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip (AP) — On Monday, Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia condemned what he called international indifference to Palestinian suffering in the face of a broad Israeli offensive in the Gaza Strip aimed at halting rocket attacks on Israel.

At least 65 Palestinians have been killed in the five-day offensive, making it the deadliest Israeli incursion into Gaza in more than four years of fighting. Seven people died in Monday's violence, including four militants and a 14-year-old girl who residents said was shot as she baked bread with her mother in their garden.

In southern Gaza, Palestinian residents said a 4-year-old boy was killed by tank fire as he stood in the doorway to his house near the town of Khan Younis. The Israeli military said there were no shootings in the area.

Also Monday, a spat between Israel and a top U.N. official in the region escalated after the U.N. official acknowledged some of his Palestinian employees were probably members of militant groups.

Israel invaded northern Gaza last week after a Palestinian rocket attack killed two children in the Israeli town of Sderot. Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said that the operation will continue until the rocket attacks stop.

Despite the Israeli campaign, Palestinian militants managed to fire two more rockets at Sderot on Monday, slightly wounding one man with shrapnel.

Israeli forces have carved out a five-mile buffer zone in northern Gaza in an attempt to get its towns out of rocket range.

Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat said in a radio address Monday that the people of Gaza will never surrender, but he hinted the militants should halt the rocket fire.

"I call on the factions to put the Palestinian high interest above everything ... not to give the occupation any excuse against us," he said.

The operation has exacted a heavy price on the Palestinians, leaving a wide swath of destruction in the Jebaliya refugee camp and leaving dozens homeless.

Qureia, speaking before a meeting of the Palestinian Cabinet in the West Bank town of Ramallah, criticized the "massive destruction" and called for strong international pressure on Israel.

"This ugly Israeli crime is taking place in full view of the world, and so far, we have not heard a strong word from the world community that can bring an end to this aggression," he said.

The United States, European Union and a number of other European countries have urged restraint by Israel and raised concerns about civilian casualties.

France condemned the Israeli operation on Monday, while Egypt's foreign minister urged Israel to stop its "policy of assassination and destruction," the semi-official Middle East News Agency reported.

The U.N. Security Council also called an emergency meeting at the request of Arab nations to consider a resolution demanding an immediate halt to the offensive.

But much of the international reaction has been directed at the Palestinians as well, urging an end to rocket attacks and recognizing Israel's right to defend itself.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Adam Ereli said the United States was calling on both sides "to take every measure to avoid civilian casualties and we are urging the Israelis to minimize the humanitarian consequences of their actions. At the same time, we would reiterate Israel's right to defend itself."

Ruanan Gissin, a senior Israeli official, attributed the tepid international response to recognition of Israel's security needs. "The world has come to know Palestinian terror organizations for what they are," he said.

Analysts also cited world "fatigue" with the festering Israeli-Palestinian conflict, as well as the international focus on Iraq.

"All efforts are concentrated on Iraq," said Germano Dottori, a political analyst at the Center for Strategic Studies in Rome.

Mark Heller, an analyst at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University, said that international outrage may be tempered by Israel's "serious determination" to pull out of Gaza next year.

The rocket attacks threaten to undermine support for Sharon's withdrawal plan, Israeli officials say. the offensive is aimed at clearing the way for the pullout to proceed on schedule next year.

In a separate development Monday, Israeli officials renewed accusations that the U.N. agency in charge of Palestinian refugees was harboring terrorists.

Israel has demanded that the U.N. investigate the actions of its top official in Gaza, Peter Hansen, after the Israeli army released video taken by an unmanned aircraft flying over the Gaza Strip that Israel said showed militants loading a rocket into a U.N. vehicle.

UMPD still investigating the footage of early morning fight

Dickinson Hospital in Northampton reported a student had been admitted with a stab wound. Police immediately secured the area in Southwest as a crime scene and recovered several unidentified items, one of which could have been an item used in the puncture wound stabbing.

UMPD has interviewed four witnesses so far and are searching for others who have been identified through the videotape. "We are ... in hopes of getting a more neutral representation," Archbald said. "There were a number of people traveling into the dorm during the altercation ... [who] we are still trying to track down."

"We are aware of the incident," said Director of Athletics John McCutcheon according to a UMass Athletics Department press release. "At this time we are waiting for the situation to run its course through the University system."

McCutcheon said that the student athletes involved in the incident have been willing to work with the University and officials.

help you, you're for Kerry. If you think the government is evil, you're with Bush."

The third panelist to speak, Annalise Fonza, is a PhD candidate at UMass in the department of Landscape Architecture and Regional Planning. She is also a Legislative Aide for the House of Representatives and a former United Methodist Pastor. She currently teaches a class in the Afro-American Studies Department, called "Black Springfield Revisited."

She described voting as a "democratic and human right" and encouraged women to avoid "politics of victimization," including "I can't do this because I'm a woman, because I'm a lesbian, or because I'm black."

"Labels limit us," Fonza said. She finished her talk by urging all people to continue to fight for equality by remaining committed to the struggle.

Senior Journalism major and Women's Studies minor, Katy Noone, said, "I really believe in women having a voice both locally and nationally." She said that voting is a "revolutionary tool."

No one spoke on the findings of the research project she completed last spring semester. Her paper concluded that college-age women spend a lot of their time engaged in leisure activities (watching TV, chatting online, drinking alcohol) that do not further the feminist voice.

The last hour of the event consisted of a question and answer exchange. One audience member expressed her dissatisfaction with the difficulties in voting.

Mayor Higgins said that despite the fact that Election Day is on Tuesday, it is no excuse not to vote. She told the crowd that it is possible that between four to five new Supreme Court Justices may be nominated during the next Presidential term.

"You don't have to like the President," Higgins said. She asked the crowd to look at the totality of politics of each candidate.

Annalise Fonza encouraged the crowd to be wary of media coverage and their depiction of the candidates. "Search out truth yourselves," she said.

A teacher at Youthbuild told the crowd that many inner-city people don't vote because they don't understand the process or the issues. She asked how best to go about informing members of her program about the principal aspects of the election and the election process.

Fonza encouraged her to write a grant asking for the addition of an informative program. Representative Benjamin Swan of Springfield was in attendance and encouraged this woman to do the same.

Everywoman's Center Events Coordinator Sandy Mandel urged the crowd to respect their individual political leanings, despite often uncomfortable criticisms from family members.

"I thought it was very inspirational. I wish more women could hear this kind of stuff, not just privileged college students," said Stephanie Costa the public relations officer for the University Democrats.

Televisions impractical in the dining commons

The University of Massachusetts as a whole has been trying to cope with the difficult situation that has been presented to everyone as a result of the recent budget cuts. Consequently, campus life has become a lot more complex for its students, requiring more money to be paid to the university and, despite advertisements' claims, a bumpier transition process into the semester.

In the Worcester Dining Commons, four brand-new, flat-screen televisions were installed so that students may be able to watch television and keep up to date with the news while they eat. While the intentions are noble, the logistics and practicalities of placing televisions, which could range anywhere from $2,000 to $5,000 apiece, were not thought through from all angles.

Since the budget cuts, there have been many changes that the student body has had to endure. First off, the physical education department was eradicated due to lack of funding about two years ago, and most recently, the journalism and communications departments were forced to merge last year for the same reason. In addition, there are many professors working for the university that should be receiving a higher salary, but are not because money is so tight. Furthermore, the university didn't have a working computer system where students could print out their class schedules for the first week of classes. Having four brand-new televisions that are highly expensive installed in the DC may not seem like the best use of the university's money to make the student body happy given the current financial situation.

Also, one must think of the location in which the televisions were mounted. On average, a student spends a very minimal portion of their day in the DC, when compared to the time spent attending class, doing work and chilling in their dorm room. The amount of time it takes, on average, for a student to get his or her food, sit and eat may total 30 minutes at most, especially when a lot of students are in a rush to eat so they can get to their classes on time. While the intention of offering students some entertainment and trying to keep them informed via CNN while they dine is certainly noble, it is not practical in the sense that the majority of what a student would be able to watch during his/her time at the DC would most likely consist of commercials.

One other aspect that was seemingly not taken into consideration was the volume of students in the DC compared to the actual level of sound emitting from the televisions. It is quite hard to actually try and listen to the programs being shown unless one is sitting right under them.

With the University of Massachusetts being in its current financial bind, the appropriate appointing of current funds is crucial to the future growth and prosperity of this university. And, of course, student life should come first in deciding where the money should be spent seeing as how they are the reason higher education exists at all. However, when tuition, fees and housing costs are raised in the middle of semesters, and students are incapable of having a working Internet connection in their dorms after they have already paid the fees for one, the priority in alleviating student life does not come with an expensive television during mealtime.

Dan McDonnell

Like almost everybody else in the United States of America, I spent last Thursday night watching the presidential debate. It was back and forth between good old John Kerry and George W. Bush. It was a good solid hour and a half of arguing over the War on Terrorism, among other issues. This was actually one of the first full debates I have ever watched.

I have never been a big fan of politics. It has just never been something that really caught my attention. Watching a debate to me is like standing in front of a dartboard while wearing a white t-shirt and a bull's eye painted on my chest. It's just not something I really want to do, ever. But my journalism teachers keep telling me that I need to be informed on the presidential race so I figured, what the hell, let's check it out.

So I sat and watched the entire debate, minus a food and bathroom break and a lot of spacing out because I just can't stay focused on politics for more than 10 minutes at a time without having an aneurysm. It's actually funny that I am even writing a column about politics because I swore to myself I wouldn't do it. I promised myself I would stay away from the political issues because in all truth, I am completely clueless about anything having to do with politics.

Basically, what I learned from 9:00 p.m. through 10:30 p.m. on Thursday, Sept. 30, 2004, is that George Bush supports the War on Terrorism and John Kerry does not. At least that is what I came to understand. It turns out that's not completely true; Kerry just doesn't support Bush's methods as it has been explained to me. I also observed Bush explaining that Kerry continues to change positions on every issue and Kerry just believes that Bush is an incompetent moron (again I might be wrong; like I said, I'm pretty clueless, so bear with me).

Now, if I were going to vote this year, I personally would lean towards G.W. He might not be the smartest man in the country, but at least he sticks to his guns. He believes that this war is necessary, and he will not go back on that thought. He might be wrong, but at least he is solid on where he stands.

Kerry, on the other hand, seems to change his mind every 37 seconds, just like G.W. said. (By the way, isn't G.W. a better name than George? I'd vote for him on the G.W. thing alone. Just say it out loud, G-Dubya. Classic.) Kerry does not seem to have an official stance on anything other than the fact that he thinks G.W. is a bad leader and an incompetent moron. One minute Kerry says he has a plan to fix everything in Iraq, the next minute he wants decaf with cream and Sweet'N Low. Then he wants a bagel, and finally he thinks the war was a mistake. And people think Bush is the one who's lost.

A Presidential candidate took the ball on the mound of Fenway Park, one of the most historical athletic complexes ever built. Kerry didn't even reach home plate. My respect left the building quicker than Pauly Shore left Hollywood's A-List in the mid-90s.

One of the other big factors in this election actually took place last month. John Kerry showed up at a Red Sox game, which, I will admit, made me like him a little bit more. But then he took the mound to throw out the ceremonial first pitch. A Presidential candidate took the ball on the mound of Fenway Park, one of the most historical athletic complexes ever built. Kerry didn't even reach home plate. My respect left the building quicker than Pauly Shore left Hollywood's A-List in the mid-90s.

Flashback to last year at the World Series, even though it took place in hell's backyard of Yankee Stadium, G.W. threw a perfect strike. Who would you rather have leading our country, the guy who threw it right down the middle or the guy who has a weaker arm than my grandmother? I'm going with the big Texan with the cannon and the pinpoint control.

I'm not saying I am a 100 percent definite G.W. supporter, but if I were voting, he'd be my guy. Maybe he isn't the best guy for the job, but he's definitely more consistent than Kerry, which is what we need. Plus, Kerry recently became one of the three guys in America I would love to just walk up to and punch, the others being Jorge Posada and whoever it is that came up with the idea for those Geico commercials. You know the ones I mean, the "well, I've got good news...I just saved a bunch of money on my car insurance." Those commercials have taken time off of my life that I'll never get back. Posada is self-explanatory, just look at the guy and you'll understand.

To sum up my Thursday night, I can only say this. I sat and watched two guys argue over the War on Terrorism and foreign policy and sacrificed the last hour of WWE Smackdown, and I am still not completely convinced as to who is definitively the better man for the job. The election is coming up in a little over a month. Am I going to vote? Yeah, I am going to vote, but probably not this year. I am waiting for 2008, when Jesse "The Body" Ventura runs for office.

A convenient union

Yousef Munayyer

At the conventions for the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), you may not be surprised to learn that the convention floor will be packed with people waving Israeli flags. However, what may surprise you is that many of these people are "Christians." I leave that word in quotation marks because it is another religious title that has been hijacked and manipulated for political gain, however that is a topic for another column. The focus, rather, should be on the strangest of bedfellows, Zionism and Christian fundamentalism.

At first glance, they may seem to be as cooperative as ice cream and salsa, but the reality is they are very closely knit and use each other in many ways. In the short term, both groups support Israel in the strongest way. In the long term, however, they differ because of ideology.

Zionism's support for Israel is pretty clear, as are its intentions. It is the political movement that led to the establishment of the state at the expense of indigenous Palestinians. On the contrary, Right-wing "Christians," have a different plan in mind. Their widely held belief, which can be clearly understood through examining the literature and statements of their leaders, is that their support for Israel and their actions that influence the geo-political landscape of the holy land will echo into heaven and expedite the process of Armageddon. I kid you not.

Hal Lindsey, author of the best selling, "The Late Great Planet Earth," has said, "144,000 Jews would bow down before Jesus and be saved, but the rest of Jewry would perish in the mother of all holocausts." Does anyone agree with me that these people are out of their minds? I completely support religious freedom. Yet, there is a fine line between religion and fairy tale, and these people have fallen off the edge.

What is truly scary, though, is how many people actually believe this stuff. There is this idea of "rapture" in which hopeful "Christians" would be taken to hang with Jesus as the rest of humanity is in turmoil and suffering just before the end the world. These ideologies hold that several terrible events may happen before as a sign of warning, anything from an abnormal hurricane season, a volcano or your typical attack of locusts and rivers of blood. The ideology is clearly intended to create a situation of perpetual fear, scaring people into belief. Lindsay's book sold 20 million copies in the United States and 30 million worldwide.

A large group of people who believe in this "dispensationalist" group act blindly to support Israel. Ironically, central to the theory is that the second coming of Christ, or the rapture, will mean the end of the world. And to many, this can only happen if Jews are in possession of the "land given to them by God." In other words, these "Christians" are supporting Jews now only in order to abolish them.

...the second coming of Christ, or the rapture, will mean the end of the world. And to many, this can only happen if Jews are in possession of the "land given to them by God." In other words, these "Christians" are supporting Jews now only in order to abolish them.

Zionists, on the other hand, don't seem to mind very much. This alliance, a temporary marriage of convenience, will give them all the political strength they need from a global superpower, in the short run, to secure their future as an oppressive, racist state.

Rabbi Jerome Epstein of the United Synagogue (a conservative Jewish organization) doesn't seem to mind the intentions of the Christian right. He says, "I'm going to take the support because Israel needs it. Their theology is in a different world. We can cope with it. If I convince them not to support Israel, are they going to give up on their attempt to convert Jews? No."

The "Christian" right plays a very large roll in American politics and has a stronghold in the White House. The president himself is born again, and his Attorney General hums "Rock of Ages" as he deports suspicious Muslims. The administration won on the bedrock of the southern United States, the cesspool of rotting Christian values, and even took Tennessee from Al Gore in 2000. This year, the President will once again rely heavily on those states for his re-election bid.

The Jerry Falwells and Pat Robertsons of this country are leading a flock blindly. If they could see past their lunacy, which I'm not even sure many of the leaders believe in, they would see how many of the policies of the Zionist state are war-like, aggressive and murderous. This is the mentality of those who would cast the first stone. On the other hand, what else can you expect when Revelations is their favorite book?

There is something dangerous about planning your future by using the end of the world as your starting point. America's "Christians" need to look at their stance on this issue and reexamine it. They cannot continue to operate in a state of constant paranoia. Every time I hear about a dead Palestinian child, of which there are thousands, I have to wonder what the hell is so "Christian" about supporting that. It's time for these people to wake up and smell the chutzpah, even if it takes being born for a third time.

Modernization a good thing

Stacy Kasdin

Since midway through my freshman year at UMass, I've had this plan: when I got enough money, I was going to invest it in the redevelopment of Hampshire Mall. I was going to move in another department store or two, revamp the food court and put in some clothing stores to catch the high school and college audience's eye (like American Eagle, Abercrombie, Hot Topic, Express, etc.). I was also going to put on a second floor. Nearly four years later, I'm far lower on funds and substantially further away from putting my plan into action. Fortunately, though unfortunately, someone else had the same bright idea I did.

This tiny Route 9 mall, despite its basic lack of modern and popular stores, has done a great deal of business through their movie theater and food court for as long as I've been here, and most likely longer. College and high school students flock to the mall on weekends and evenings to eat, see movies, and play video games in the small arcade, but until recently there was little else to do besides those three things. Then about a year ago, K-Mart went out of business, and along came the mall's original savior: Target.

Wal-Mart's chic cousin attracted to the mall a new crowd who wanted something a little classier but still low-priced. It also gave the old crowd some place new to occupy their time. That's when someone had the brilliant idea that if Target could attract this many new patrons, then even more people would be attracted to a bunch of new stores, specifically those appealing to the youth of this college town. Thus, in came American Eagle and Pacific Sunwear. In addition to Deb, these two stores have given JC Penney's juniors department a run for its money, providing stylish name-brand clothes within the college student's budget.

It amazes me how a town can take on so many new, modern parts and still keep its same old charm, but I believe Amherst has done just that.

Right now, Hampshire Mall is a bit of a mess due to the construction of the three latest mall-rejuvenation-efforts: Dick's Sporting Goods, Hot Topic and Best Buy. Best Buy is replacing its lesser-known counterpart, Media Play (which went out of business last spring), and is sure to bring an even larger crowd to the mall when it opens. Dick's is replacing a sporting goods store I no longer remember the name of that closed a few years ago. Hot Topic is simply coming in because it will inevitably be a surefire hit with the young crowd in this area. Among the aforementioned stores, Bath and Body Works, Claire's, Electronics Boutique and Radio Shack, Hampshire Mall is shaping up to actually look like ... well, a mall.

In fact, it seems like since I've been here, that whole area of town has taken a turn for the better. Across from the mall, the shopping center that used to house Wal-Mart, Bread and Circus, Linens 'N Things, Marshalls and a few small local shops is now home to Old Navy, Michael's and Barnes and Noble. Even Amherst Center is welcoming new shops like Fatso Burger and Ben and Jerry's. It amazes me how a town can take on so many new, modern parts and still keep its same old charm, but I believe Amherst has done just that.

Many people seem to think that all this renovation is going to be bad for the local mom-and-pop stores in the area, but I think exactly the opposite. In addition to all these new shops and eateries, there are still plenty of little local businesses receiving a lot of support and achieving success. The local businesses here are so unique and appeal to their customers needs so well that I do not think they could go out of business. Many of them offer products that could never be found at a mainstream franchise, such as Food for Thought's unusual book selection and Antonio's specialty pizzas.

I feel that modernization has been a big step forward for the Amherst/Hadley area because now it offers the best of both worlds, which is great for the young and old alike.

I get a little jealous thinking about what projects are in store for this little section of the Pioneer Valley after I graduate and go off into the world, but here in the five-college area, there will certainly always be people around to enjoy them. I guess I'll just have to come back and visit often!

A 'Revolution' in dance

Butoh performer visits Bowker Auditorium

BY LEANN LEAKE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

When the lights darkened, we were left for several still moments with nothing at all to watch, the only sounds were self-conscious rustles and nervous coughs. No one knew what this would really be like, but the theater was full and we expected something.

Where were we? At Japanese modern dancer Akira Kasai's solo performance titled Pollen Revolution last Friday night. Kasai is a practitioner of Butoh, a uniquely Japanese form of dance that involves a lot of improvisation and emphasizes emotions over technique. Kasai has been a Butoh dancer almost from its beginning in 1959, but he has always been a rogue element in it, stretching the boundaries and experimenting constantly. In the early 80's he studied eurhythmics, which he later used in his approach to Butoh. Starting in 2001 he began to take inspiration from hip-hop in his work.

In the theater Friday night, the feelings of nervousness and something like fear were palpable in the dark: no matter what we had read, no one knew what to expect. The audience was absolutely silent as the lights came up with agonizing slowness to reveal (blurry guess by blurry guess) Akira Kasai in the ornate kimono, white makeup, and elaborate hair of a geisha, his back to the audience. After a strange rising electronic noise that built in volume and pitch with the lights, the music became a traditional Japanese piece with samisen and voice. Kasai danced slowly and ornately, pausing regular in delicate poses. But at three intervals in this movement the electronic rushing noise intruded, breaking through and obliterating the formal music and causing Kasai's character to become bewildered and break out of the formal dance. It was these intervals that were particularly disturbing, as the geisha made grasping motions, pantomimed opening doors and running, grimacing and making faces as though screaming.

After a change on stage, Kasai emerged into the light dressed in black and dancing more freely to electronic music. When this second section started he danced in a thin beam of intense white light that fell across the stage as though a giant's door was open behind the audience. Soon the music became more rhythmic and the dancing more tortured, with Kasai twisting and jumping. He began to shout in "Japanese: takeover China … take over Japan … take over Jupiter, Neptune, Saturn! Take over human!" changing as he spoke into a white suit.

With this the third and shortest movement had begun. As hip-hop music blasted, Kasai twisted and shook and leapt in an absolute celebration of life. In retrospect it seems that it would be easy to dismiss or laugh at a Japanese dancer performing to hip-hop, but it was exciting and beautiful to watch. Kasai has mastered this fusion of hip-hop and Butoh.

"Hip-hop came from the bottom of the social pyramid. Butoh came from the underground of Japanese society. In hip-hop the movements come from a very deep, soulful source, but they are at the same time sculpted from the outside. It's not just making a beautiful form, but deforming it and breaking it down. That is also an essential element of Butoh," Kasai said. At the end of the song, snowflakes poured from the ceiling and Kasai swirled his hands in them, leaping and shaking his hands with joy and triumph.

After a standing ovation, he danced to Elvis' "Heartbreak Hotel" as an encore, throwing carnations exuberantly to the crowd. Positive energy filled the air.

While I went in expecting an interesting experience, I did not expect to truly enjoy myself and connect so emotionally to the piece. The improvised words and moves felt energetic and altogether wonderfully human, just like the struggle of humans through time that was carried out throughout the piece. I was impressed and delighted at the sheer power and energy that Kasai, at 60 years old, kept up throughout the 70-minute piece. Pollen Revolution was absolutely wonderful, in ways that only something as ambiguous and open to interpretation that a medium like dance can be. Some people cried in the theater that night because of the tortured struggle that Kasai acted out, but I left fascinated and uplifted.

Coyote Ugly girls continue wild ways despite labels of degradation

COURTESY TONYA JAMESON

Lisa Rackley takes a moment to cut loose and dance with friends at the College Street Saloon in Charlotte, N.C. in August 2004.

BY TONYA JAMESON
CHARLOTTE OBSERVER

CHARLOTTE, N.C. – I'm torn.

I'm standing in Coyote Ugly saloon on College Street in Charlotte. A woman lies on the bar with freshly poured tequila spilling from her belly button.

A man slurps the tequila from her navel while other guys cheer him on. Testosterone permeates the air.

The woman towels off her belly, stands and dances until another customer shells out $20 for a body shot.

The partyer inside me briefly considers buying one, but the aspiring feminist in me screams: DEGRADING!

Like female Olympians half-naked in FHM magazine, "Girls Gone Wild" videos and bare breasts at Mardi Gras (or anything with free beads), Coyote Ugly exemplifies the complex success of the women's rights movement today.

Whether we like it or not, the struggle to give women the right to vote, choose an abortion and to excel in corporate America has also given women the right to be knitters, stay-at-home moms and Coyotes. The line separating career aspirations and personal fulfillment is as blurry as the one between exploitation and expression.

Coyote Ugly, which has 14 establishments nationwide, is a money-making contradiction in girl power. The bar falls somewhere between Hooters and the Men's Club because it uses cute women in tight clothes to sell alcohol to horny men. Unlike the other establishments, Coyote Ugly is primarily owned and operated by women.

"It's all about the female empowerment," said co-owner Joanna Olsen.

Women pour the drinks, do choreographed dances atop the bar and allow body shots. They also grab men by the head to pour liquor down their throats, playfully spank patrons and routinely call guys punks or worse for being afraid to get smacked on the rump or take a shot.

"They're sexy, but they're in charge," Olsen said. "When they're on that bar, they're totally in charge."

Men love the abuse.

"It's crazy," said one guy. "It's like nothing I've ever seen before."

"No bar in town beats this," said another.

The true genius of Coyote Ugly, however, isn't in catering to men, it's the bar's treatment of the girlfriends and wives of male customers. Women get in free and the Coyotes entice them to express themselves: to play on the bar or to hang their bras from the barbed wire dangling above.

On opening night, Lisa Rackley climbed atop the bar with her friend Betsy White. The two are bar-dancing vets, having stomped on the wood at Bar Charlotte, which has a swing suspended from the ceiling.

"It's just fun to do," said White, a mortgage broker. "It's breaking out of the norm."

Tammy Casper shared her sentiments.

"I love to dance," said Casper, a financial planner. "Any chance I can get on a bar and dance in front of people is great."

She said she didn't mind having men leer at her.

"None of them are grabbing," she said. "They can look all they want."

A couple of weeks after I met Casper, White and Rackley, I met a Pennsylvania man who stopped by to get a T-shirt for his 17-year-old daughter. She loves the 2000 movie based on the original bar in New York. To his dismay, she wants to become a Coyote instead of a college student.

The Charlotte club gets five to 10 job inquiries a week and holds tryouts from 9 to 11 p.m. Wednesdays. More than 200 women auditioned in early August at the initial tryouts. The willingness of women to get buck-wild while men hoot at them isn't limited to working and partying at Coyote Ugly.

I heard similar comments from women, college students and professionals, who flash their breasts at Harley-Davidson bike week in Myrtle Beach and at the "Girls Gone Wild" party at Ibiza nightclub a few years ago. All cared more about having fun than whether they were degrading themselves.

Their attitude is why I'm torn. These women seem to be having a great time, and except for having some strange guy suck on my belly, working at Coyote Ugly looks fun.

However, I know the consistent objectification of women in music, television, magazines and movies sends the wrong message to kids. Entertainment tells these young eyes that part of being a woman means baring it all and shaking it fast for men. We see too many girls absorbing these messages in the way they dress and how they dance at grade school parties.

I want my young nieces to know being a woman means more than being a sexual object, but I'm standing in Coyote Ugly watching another man slurp vodka off a woman's belly knowing I'll be back again. But I won't be buying a body shot.

Keane, a ray of 'Sunshine'

BY MATT O'ROURKE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Keane crossed the pond in full fashion with their soaring debut album, "Hopes and Fears." With vocalist Tom Chaplin at the helm, the piano-rock trio is certain to seize fans of pop and rock alike with their attractive melodies and intelligent lyrics.

Keane formed, not unlike many bands, when the now trio (their guitarist left in 2002) met in high school. Fierce Panda Records signed Keane, and this is where the band recorded their first single, "Everybody's Changing." The single has been praised by NME records as "indisputably mighty," and is also considered to be one of the most successful releases in Fierce Panda's history (including releases from bands such as Coldplay and Idlewind).

Keane
'Hope and Fears'
Interscope

"Hopes and Fears" has received many accolades, including Album of the Year from Q Magazine, and a Shortlist Music Prize nomination.

The album title "Hopes and Fears" is a fitting name for the album, as Keane reflects on the highs and lows of one's emotions. The album kicks off with "Somewhere Only We Know," a ballad that describes a place where Chaplin and a significant other used to go, a place they could call their own. The piano-drums arrangement is complemented by Chaplin's powerful vocal backup in a melody that is sure to stick in your mind all day.

Unlike the U.K. version of the album, the second track on the U.S. version is "This is the Last Time." This is yet another tune about love, but it also embraces the attempt to forgive someone for lying and offering someone one last chance. The driving rhythm in Richard Hughes' drumming pushes the efforts of Tim Rice-Oxley's heavy piano chords on one hand and light melody on the other. One cannot help but make the comparison of Chaplin's voice to that of Fran Healey of Travis, mixed with a dash of Freddie Mercury of Queen.

"Bend and Break" pushes the album forward with a style similar to that of Coldplay's "Clocks," while providing a slightly more powerful falsetto than Chris Martin's. The tempo slows with "We Might As Well Be Strangers," but the momentum does not falter as the song builds and eventually dissolves into "Everybody's Changing." This track is backed by slight electronic sounds, which only amplify Oxley's melody and Hughes' constant beat.

Beginning with a light falsetto and precise heartbeat-like drum pulse, "She Has No Time" builds brilliantly into a bittersweet ballad. The lyrics are simple, yet deep. At one point, Chaplin sings, "Think about the lonely people/Then think about the day she found you/Or lie to yourself/And see it all dissolve around you." This is simple, yet good advice.

"Sunshine" rings with beautiful vocal effects, granting the listener a somewhat visual mental picture of the sun at different times of day. The song of course, has little to do with the sun, but rather the music adds to the lyrical image of struggling with love.

"Untitled 1" makes use of a beatbox and Flaming Lips-style electronic effects to add to Chaplin's vocals.

"Bedshaped" provides a light-air melody, which builds with Chaplin's singing, "You'll follow me back/With the sun in your eyes/And on your own/Bedshaped/And legs of stone." There is also a unique guitar-style backup on Oxley's keyboards, which you must hear yourself to appreciate. It is a great finish to the album, which only leaves the listener wondering what Keane will craft next.

To say that Keane is a cheap rip-off of Travis and Coldplay is foolish. Keane takes piano/keyboard rock groups to a new level for which Coldplay was merely setting the foundation. Fans of Travis and Coldplay will most likely love Keane, but those who appreciate piano-rock groups and well-written lyrics should also take the time to give this album a serious listen. There's something for everyone on this album, and pop-rock enthusiasts should immediately add this to their collection.

Eve's night out in New York

Original Sin
Eve

New York City is probably the only place I can visit and feel justified being single. It is a place for adventures, for surprises, and above all, a place to meet new people. I choose to go alone, and somehow I never end up feeling lonely.

I arrived late in the afternoon, which was just enough time to enjoy a long awaited coffee in Central park. I parked my car uptown and walked forty blocks toward my destination. I circled the park until I found the perfect bench and sat down without a care in the world. I was content. I had absolutely no idea where I was to sleep that night, and the only two people I knew in the city were away. That is probably the most exciting feeling, the feeling when you know that anything could happen.

I noticed how late it was getting, so I bit my lip and dialed 411. "Hi, could I have the number for a two-star hotel in the city?" I love living on the edge. Any more stars would make me feel like I was on a business trip. After calling six different hotels, I started to worry. Everything was booked. I looked up and noticed someone walking toward my bench. He was very cute and seemed normal compared to the other people in the park. He sat down next to me and began reading his book. I looked over at him and smiled sweetly. "Excuse me? You wouldn't happen to know of any cheap hotels in this area? I'm not from around here, and I need a place to stay … " He closed his book and thought for a moment. "Um … well … there's a … um … place I know down the street … um … my brother works there. Call this number." He wrote down a number and handed it to me. He was shaking. He opened his book and continued reading. I had never met such a shy person. Especially in this city. "Hey, what's your name?" I asked. He looked up and seemed happy. I took initiative. "I'm Samson. What's yours?" I was so pleased to hear that. I was actually conversing with a shy Jewish guy who reads books. This was deliantly something to write home about.

That is how our friendship began. We spoke for a full hour about everything, and found that we were very similar. He is pre-med. I am pre-vet. He speaks Hebrew. I speak Hebrew. He has six brothers and sisters. I don't? I paused for a minute and felt confused, but he kept talking, so I decided not to question. After a while I noticed I was near starving and invited him to join me for dinner. He agreed and we made our way downtown.

"Um … I am Kosher. I hope you don't mind. I can't really eat anywhere non-Kosher." He looked at me nervously. I accidentally flashed him the "are-you-serious-that-is-so-annoyingly-ridiculous" face while rolling my eyes. I just can't understand this side of my culture.

"Ok, whatever," I said. "I'm hungry and if you know a place feel free to lead us there." He smiled and I followed. Seventy-five blocks later, we arrived. It was one of the most run-down, dirty restaurants I had ever seen. I held my breath and sat down on a rickety chair, situated in front of a very sticky table. He felt right at home. I looked around and noticed that every single person in the restaurant was Orthodox, and every one of them was covered head to toe in this ninety-degree weather. I was wearing close to nothing. After I ordered something I had never heard of, I realized what was happening.

"You are Orthodox? Why didn't you tell me?" He blushed and answered, "Because I didn't think you would even talk to me." He looked down, completely embarrassed. All I wondered was why he would want to talk to me. I am every religious person's worst nightmare, and that is exactly what I said to him. He stared at me for a moment then answered, "You are refreshing. It's nice to meet someone so free of rules and religious authority. Thank you." I was flattered.

After dinner and breaking the ice with our mutual acceptance, I had a brilliant idea. "Hey, how about letting me show you what it's like to live my life?" I smiled devilishly. "Okay, where to?" And we were off. Off to a better place with lots of new people to meet, and many drinks to be had. To this day, he will gladly admit he had a hell of a good time.

'Ladder 49' gives truth to the heroics of firefighters

BY TAMMI MUNN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"How is it that firefighters run into a burning building while everyone else is running out?" This is the tantalizing line that John Travolta utters in "Ladder 49," a line that alludes to the great courage of firefighters.

'Ladder 49'
Directed by Jay Russell
Starring John Travolta, Joaquin Phoenix
Touchstone
115 mins.
Grade B-

Jack Morrison (Joaquin Phoenix), a member of the Baltimore City Fire Department, finds himself trapped in the depths of a blazing inferno one night after having successfully rescued a victim trapped 12 floors up. It is his job to rescue the fire victims and return back to safety with both them and himself. As he lies waiting to be rescued himself, he reflects on his journey through life, his days as a rookie, the transformation that he went through to become a seasoned firefighter, his marriage and the experience of fatherhood.

The acting is quite spectacular in this film. There couldn't have been a better casting than Phoenix in the lead role and Travolta as his mentor, friend and captain of the firehouse. The pace, however, lacked a steadiness that would have allowed the viewer to form a bond with the other characters. It was obvious that the most important subjects in "Ladder 49" were the firemen themselves, the jobs they have to do and their bonds with each other.

The love story between Jack and his wife Linda (Jacinda Barrett) seems poorly developed, but then it technically should seem that way if the flashbacks are of the important moments of Jack's life. The conversation that Jack and Linda have on their first date is very slow with silent moments of awkwardness. The flashbacks go forward after this, advancing with ever widening gaps in years until as much as ten years goes by in between flashbacks, it may have been better to slow the story down at this point. The story seems to fly from first date to the couple having nine and ten-year-old kids in such a short span of time, that it is a bit disorienting.

First impressions of this film led the viewer to believe that it was nothing spectacular, but on second thought, it truly was an amazing film. It is interesting to consider what a person who hasn't had the pleasure of hands on firehouse antics would think of this film; surely they would learn a great deal about the everyday firefighter.

One major flawed procedure that will jump out at any firefighter who watches the film is the fact that the character Jack finds himself wrapped in difficult situations twice. Requiring his comrades to save him both times. His only excuse for getting into these problems is because he is expected to save the fire victims all by himself. Any firefighter would know that real-ristically this does not happen. A single person is not capable of saving another human being in a flaming building without some form of back-up.

Other than that, "Ladder 49" made a truly accurate account of a firefighter's daily life, though some people may think there are many clichés. The film depicts the tricky [illegible] pride of [illegible] parade, the [illegible] scene and the [illegible] on the job. Payton shows up to Celts camp on time, ready to be a leader

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

WALTHAM (AP) – Gary Payton is running the show again after playing a supporting role in the Shaq and Kobe drama.

Any doubts that family concerns would keep the aggressive point guard from reporting to the Celtics vanished Monday when he showed up at training camp to prepare to lead Boston's new up-tempo game and teach his young teammates how to lead the offense.

"I know I'm going to have to take a couple of them under my wing to try to make them better basketball players," Payton said. "Hopefully, they can catch on really quick and we can get wins."

That's a change from his one season with the Los Angeles Lakers, where the offense revolved around Shaquille O'Neal (now with Miami) and Kobe Bryant, two stars with an uneasy relationship. So even when Payton did bring the ball up and pass it, he didn't get it back as much as he would have liked.

"Last year it was tough for him to get tired because of the way they were playing. He was standing in the corner by himself without the ball a lot," said Celtics coach Doc Rivers, who noted the Lakers got away from Payton pushing the ball up court as the season progressed. "Gary's a guy that likes to run the show and that's why we brought him in here."

Despite Payton's frustration with the Lakers' playing style, he exercised a $5.4 million option with them for the coming season and wasn't ecstatic about leaving the West Coast, in part because his daughter is a high school student there.

"There's always a lot of uncertainty when it's flipped on you like that," the 36-year-old Payton said. "I had a lot of family issues that I had to deal with, a lot of things that I had to work out first, and I don't know where everybody got that from because nobody heard me say that I wasn't coming."

Rivers said he always expected Payton to report, but Danny Ainge, Boston's executive director of basketball operations, said he had some doubts. Ainge said he talked to Payton on Sunday for the first time since the trade was made on Aug. 6.

"I've known Gary for a long time and I know that it would be a difficult decision for him," Ainge said. "So, yeah, there were some anxious moments."

But now Ainge has the "instigator" he thinks the team needs – a physical player who drives to the basket and plays scrappy defense. Payton also provides a third scoring option to go with Paul Pierce and Ricky Davis. Payton expressed no misgivings about joining a team that has won just three playoff series in the last 12 seasons and was swept by Indiana in the first round last season.

"This is a basketball type of city," he said at a news conference with the team's 16 championship banners hanging from the ceiling of its practice gym. From Tuesday through Sunday, the Celtics will hold training camp at the University of Vermont in Burlington.

Ainge, a pesky guard on Boston's championship teams in 1984 and 1986, thinks Payton will bring his own feistiness.

"We talk a lot about toughness. We talk a lot about instigators and Gary fits that criteria," Ainge said. "He's been there before. He knows how to win and I think he can be a good influence on our team."

Marcus Banks, who was in the original workings of the trade that brought Payton and Rick Fox to the Celtics, had a tough rookie season after being drafted in the first round last year. Banks isn't likely to play as much now that Payton is in Boston, but thinks Payton can help him learn how to run a team.

"I'm a team player and whatever it takes for us to win a game, I'm all for it, no matter if I play or not," Banks said.

Payton was in the All-Star game in nine of his 14 seasons and has career averages of 18 points, 7.2 assists and 36.8 minutes per game. But last season, he averaged 14.6 points, 5.5 assists and 34.5 minutes. All were the lowest in the past 11 seasons.

He said he wasn't accustomed to the Lakers' offensive system after playing 12 full seasons in Seattle and 52 games there in his 13th before finishing the 2002-03 season with Milwaukee. He played in all of the Lakers' 82 games last season.

"I didn't get the chance to play the type of basketball I wanted to play," he said. "Now that's over with. I feel comfortable coming here. I know it's going to be different so it'll be back to my days when I (had) free reins to do the things that I can do."

themselves several miles away from the fire where the chief can still communicate with his firefighters in the air and on the ground.

"A mobile command center is like a Winnebago that is built like a tank," Leary said. "That's how big these things are. If they ever have another experience like 9/11, they don't have to be in the building."

Both vehicles were tested out at each of the city's respective national conventions.

Leary's work doesn't go unnoticed, especially by the players.

"You read about all of the things that Denis has done for the firefighters in Worcester," Young said. "I'm from Worcester so it's great that I'm allowed to play in something like this and help out.

"He's done so much, and you can see what he's doing with his show ["Rescue Me"], and it's bringing a lot of awareness to the firefighters in New York. It's just a good thing."

"I haven't had the chance to do this," Sweeney said. "But, given the state of the game right now (with the NHL lockout), myself, Scott Young, Brendan Shannahan and Tom Poti are people who live in the New England area, especially in the off season, it's an opportunity to give back to the community. It's such a worth cause, and Denis goes an awful long way in trying to help out that cause."

Clarke jokingly made sure the donations kept on rolling in.

"I just sold my tie for $500 to some guy in the hall," Clarke said. "I donated the money to the foundation. I'll just pat myself on the back."

Although Leary's foundation was started primarily to help the Worcester Fire Department, it has since gained much support and gone national.

"(Leary) raises money all over the country now – New York, Colorado – this is bigger than just Boston," Clarke said.

Patriots are looking to win 19th straight, set new NFL record

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FOXBORO (AP) – The Patriots have found a streak they think less of than their own: It's the four-game losing streak Miami will bring to New England next week.

"We don't look at anybody's record," safety Rodney Harrison said. "Any day they could turn it around. Hopefully, it's not Sunday."

The Patriots have won 18 consecutive games – matching the longest winning streak in NFL history – but it's not something the team likes to talk about. Coach Bill Belichick has steadfastly refused to even acknowledge that the team has a good thing going, reminding reporters – and his team – that last year doesn't matter and this one won't either if they worry about their winning streak.

"We've won three games," he said after the Patriots beat Buffalo 31-17 on Sunday. "That's it." But that's not it.

The Patriots have not lost in more than a year, finishing last season with 15 consecutive victories and a Super Bowl title and then picking up right where they left off in their first three games this year. If they beat Miami on Sunday, the Patriots will separate themselves from five others who have won 18 straight – including the Dolphins that went 17-0 in 1972 and won their first game the next season.

The 1997-98 Broncos, 1989-90 49ers, and the 1933-34 and 1941-42 Bears also won 18 in a row, as did the Cleveland Browns in 1947-48 in the All-America Football Conference.

The NFL schedule-makers sent Miami to New England for the potential record-breaker. The '72 Dolphins are protective of their perfect season – popping champagne each year whenever the last unbeaten team picks up a loss – so Miami figured to bring a certain pride into the game.

But that was before Ricky Williams left and the Dolphins scrambled to replace him. Miami coach Dave Wannstedt has also shuffled quarterbacks trying to spark an offense that has scored two touchdowns while committing 14 turnovers.

Now, the Dolphins look like pushovers.

Just don't try telling that to the Patriots.

"They are tough, and they have always been tough. ... They are competitive in every game," Belichick said. "I'm sure they feel like if they could eliminate those turnovers they would probably have two or three, maybe four wins here. I'm sure they are working on that. And we had better be able to do a better job at the things we didn't do a good job of (against Buffalo), or we're not going to be too happy with the outcome."

Of course, Belichick has said similar things about most of the last 18 games New England has won – some easily, and some not. While he denies the existence of the streak, others just question its importance.

"I don't think you're going to be talking about this 20 years from now like you hear about the '72 Dolphins," cornerback Ty Law said. "That can't be taken away from those guys. They were the first ones. All you can do is match it.

"You're talking about the '72 Dolphins. This doesn't mean a thing compared to that."

Patriots receiver Deion Branch is tackled by Colts safety Mike Doss. Indianapolis was New England's first victim of the 2004 season and number 16 overall. The Pats go for a record 19th straight win Sunday.

University Health Services
Mental Health Groups Fall 2004

COED SELF-EXPLORATION GROUP FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDENTS
Mondays, 3:00-4:30 pm or Wednesdays, 3:00-4:30 pm
For college men and women who experience difficulties in interpersonal connections or who have concerns about their relationships.

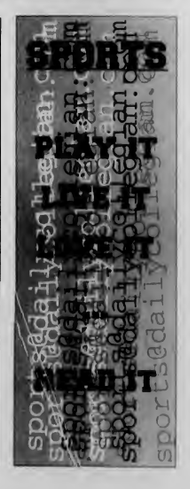
WOMEN'S EATING ISSUES GROUP
Tuesdays, 3:00-4:30 pm
This is a group for women who are interested in changing negative eating patterns, decreasing food and weight concerns and enhancing self-acceptance. Members will have an opportunity to learn about the underlying dynamics contributing to eating issues and to develop coping strategies.

COED SELF-EXPLORATION GROUP FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS
Thursdays, 3:45-5:00 pm
For graduate men and women who experience difficulties with interpersonal connections or who have concerns about their relationships. Members will have an opportunity to explore personal relationships, work, studies, and other relevant concerns.

MINDFULNESS-BASED STRESS REDUCTION (MBSR)
Thursdays, 3:30-5:00 pm
Mindfulness is a particular way of paying attention:
- with mindful intention
- in the moment
- without judgement

Although MBSR embraces the acceptance of things as they are without striving, research has shown that, with regular practice, it has the potential to lower stress, anxiety, and depression. It can promote relaxation, improve concentration, raise self-awareness, and enhance the immune system. Referrals and inquiries may be made to Kathryn Proulx @ 545-2337.

Groups are conducted by Mental Health Division staff. Payment is deducted from your UHS Basic Plan, Student Health Insurance Plan, GIC, or Health New England plan subject to plan limitation and co-pays.



Groups require an initial screening that can be arranged by calling 545-2337 or stopping by at 125 Hills North, Monday - Friday 8am-5 pm.

Celebrity Hat Trick nets a winner

Hockey game raises money for firefighters

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — As the nation grieved with the Worcester Fire Department and the families who tragically lost their loved ones in the fire and wreckage of the Cold Storage Warehouse in December of 1999, many were looking for answers while others were looking to find hope.

Everything started when two homeless people lit a candle, but it all ended with six firefighters losing their lives. Actor and comedian Denis Leary, who lost his cousin and one of his childhood friends in the blaze, felt the urgency to set up a relief fund.

On Sunday, Leary hosted his fifth annual Celebrity Hat Trick at the FleetCenter, and all of the proceeds from the event will go straight to fire departments across the country.

"We usually raised about $400-500 thousand for the event, which is fantastic," Leary said after the game.

The FleetCenter filled up quite nicely for the main event, which featured actors and hockey legends, past and present. Featured were former Boston Bruins Bobby Orr, Ray Bourque, Cam Neely, Terry O'Reilly, Wayne Cashman, Don Sweeney and Lyndon Byers.

Hollywood stars such as Michael J. Fox, Kiefer Sutherland of "24," Lenny Clarke of "Rescue Me," Steven Tyler of Aerosmith, Chad Smith of the Red Hot Chili Peppers, director Bobby Farrelly and of course, Denis Leary.

Heading into the game, the players were excited but were also cautious of Leary's competitive nature.

"I'm just thrilled to be a part of it," Neely said. "On a scale of one to 10 on how competitive we are, Denis is a 10 and we're all a two."

"It could be interesting to see some of the actors and some of the firefighters [skate]," current Dallas Stars right-winger Scott Young said. "I think it's going to be a lot of fun. I think it's going to be a great day."

"Denis plays an awful lot of hockey so he can find his way around here," Sweeney, who currently plays with Dallas, said. "And the guys [whose numbers] are hanging up here in the rafters like Cam [Neely] don't ever lose that touch. There is a good collection of hockey players here and obviously, it's for a great cause."

When the game had finished, the MasterCard All-Stars [MC] defeated the EMC All-Stars 17-16 in an offensive affair.

At the end of the first half, hockey Hall of Famer, Pat LaFontaine of EMC, was awarded a penalty shot. LaFontaine skated toward the net as the MC All-Stars threw their sticks at him, but he was able to skate through them to score and cut the lead to 10-8 while making the crowd erupt at the same time.

With 19 minutes remaining in the second period, new EMC goalie Chad Smith had given up four straight soft goals, and coach Lenny Clarke traded him to MC for goalie Mike Dunham. Smith went on to make an array of acrobatic saves, including a highlight reel stop when Ray Bourque set Neely up for a one-timer in front of the net.

"If [Smith] had made two of those saves for our team, we would have never traded him," said Clarke. "It was a scam. I think he just wanted to be near [MC coach Bobby Orr]."

With 22.9 seconds left in the game and EMC having eight skaters on the ice, Michael J. Fox, a huge fan favorite, scored his second goal of the game to cut the lead to 17-16.

"I knew that no matter what I did today, no matter how I tried to cheat or sneak or do anything wrong against the rules, I was going to lose to you," Clarke said after the game to Orr. "Get off my back. You just happen to be the greatest hockey player who ever lived."

"This year was easy," Orr responded. "It really was. We were very confident right from the beginning. We had a plan."

Leary puts part of the blame on fellow "Rescue Me" star and assistant coach Gina Gershon for the loss.

"She brought the whip and got the guys in line in the first half," Leary said. "Then she had to leave, and the guys fell apart on the bench. No whip, no discipline."

The players and the fans alike had a great time during the game, but the real reason for the event was to support the fire departments.

"We don't really think about the money," Leary said. "We think about things. We buy trucks and training equipment. We bought two trucks this year, one for the Boston Fire Department and one for the New York Fire Department.

"On 9/11, one of the reasons [the FDNY] lost so much of their manpower is because, when you fight fires in a skyscraper, your command station is in the lobby, and most senior members of the FDNY were in the two lobbies of the World Trade Center," Leary said.

The two trucks donated by Leary's foundation are mobile command centers, which are used out west to fight wildfires. They are able to station

Red Sox open Division Series with new ace on the mound

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Curt Schilling is a three-time All-Star, a World Series co-MVP and a top-2 contender for AL Cy Young Award this year. And he's finally the ace of his own pitching staff again.

Although he deferred to Pedro Martinez after coming to Boston, Schilling has claimed the top spot in the Red Sox rotation and earned the chance to pitch Tuesday's playoff opener against Jarrod Washburn (11-8) and the Anaheim Angels. While Martinez struggled in September, Schilling (21-6) cemented his position as the Boston ace by winning his last eight decisions.

"He was the No. 1 pitcher from the get-go. He deserves to be the No. 1 starter," Martinez said after his regular season finale when he lost his fourth consecutive start. "I actually should pitch like fifth, or maybe not even pitch in the playoffs if I continue to pitch the way I have."

That's not likely because even a slumping Martinez was good enough to finish second in the AL in strikeouts, ninth in ERA and 10th in wins. But in the final month, Martinez went 2-4 with a 4.95 ERA, while Schilling went 10-2 after the All-Star break and 4-0 with a 2.61 ERA in September.

For the Red Sox, though, it's never that easy.

The team was slow to acknowledge that Schilling had surpassed Martinez, in part because during the season it doesn't really matter who is considered to be the ace. But it can't be avoided once the playoffs start.

The No. 1 guy in a live-game, one off-day series can come back on normal rest and pitch Game 5, if necessary – or Game 4 on three-day's rest if desperate. The team also wants its ace on the mound for the opener to avoid falling into an early hole, though it's not as if choosing Martinez would be a surrender.

But Boston management put off the announcement as long as possible because it couldn't predict how Martinez would react.

The highest-paid pitcher in the game, one beloved in Boston, Martinez has occasionally instead taken the occasional heckler to heart. He long resented the Los Angeles Dodgers for trading him away as a wild, young pitcher, and his contract negotiations in Boston grew contentious when the team was unable to re-sign him to a long-term deal over the off season.

PAUL J. BERSWELL/SUNDAY

For the first time since joining the Red Sox, Pedro Martinez will not be the team's ace. Schilling takes the mound against Anaheim today.

Having once picked up his option 11 months early just to keep him happy, the Red Sox have walked gingerly around the future free agent for fear of damaging their chances to re-sign him this winter.

"We have to be respectful of everybody in Pedro's case. He deserves it," manager Terry Francona said. "He's a very prideful guy, and that's part of the reason he's so good.

"He was about as professional as you can be," Francona said after delivering the news. "He's going to get the ball in game two. I'm really OK with that."

Schilling was used to playing second banana. Despite some stellar seasons, he was Randy Johnson's No. 2 for three-plus years on the Arizona Diamondbacks. During that time, the two shared the Series MVP and Johnson won the last three of his four consecutive NL Cy Youngs; Schilling finished second to his teammate twice (2001-02).

He was also fourth in NL Cy Young voting in 1997 with the Phillies. A young Montreal Expos right-hander named Pedro Martinez won the award that year.

So when Schilling came to Boston over Thanksgiving, he begged off any campaign against the incumbent.

"How many Cy Youngs has he got, three or four? At last count, that's three more than I've got. He is the No. 1 on that stall," Schilling said. "I didn't have a problem pitching behind Randy Johnson in Arizona, and I'm going to be equally comfortable pitching behind Pedro Martinez."

Now he'll find out how comfortable he is pitching in front of Martinez.

UMass is slumping

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-5-3, 0-0-2 Atlantic 10) seems to be stuck in a slump.

The defense is doing its job, grinding out 90-minutes with the opposition and keeping the score close. The Minutemen have allowed only two goals in the last three contests but failed to pick up a win, tying 1-1 twice this past weekend at Saint Joseph's and Temple. The loss came on the road, 1-0 at Boston University on Sept. 28.

Ironically, the heart of the problem lies in the very philosophy that has helped keep UMass competitive for the last five years.

With a young team comprised of 17 underclassman and two seniors, UMass plays an extremely defensive-minded game, designed to slow down opposing offenses and create a relatively low number of quality scoring opportunities.

By trapping teams in their defensive zone, the Minutemen have enjoyed successful seasons, banking on the fact that forced turnovers create immediate scoring chances.

The problem with this year's team is that only two players seem to use the pressing style of UMass' defense to their advantage.

Luckily for the Maroon and White, offensive midfielder Robby Charest and senior forward Oral Bullen have utilized the wide area of open space created by a team unwilling to compromise its defensive position by streaking non-forwards up field.

Bullen and Charest, two of the smaller and faster players, have been able to chase down clearing passes and convert them into scoring chances.

This was exemplified in UMass' 4-2 victory over Siena on Sept. 17. Midway through the second half, goalie Colin Burns booted a goal kick across midfield where Matty LeMire headed it into the offensive zone. Bullen gave chase and beat the Siena defense to the ball, setting up a one-on-one opportunity with the goalie.

By out running the defense, Bullen and Charest have a combined 14 points on five goals and two assists apiece — compared to the rest of the team, which has managed to accumulate only 20 points over the first 11 games.

The end result of the unbalanced scoring has been seen over the last few games, when opposing teams began blanketing Charest and Bullen with one and sometimes two defenders.

If the Minutemen are going to make a run for the conference title, they must find alternative ways to score. LeMire, with two goals, is the only player other than Bullen and Charest to have more than one goal. He has utilized his strong leg to record a pair of scores that came off shots from beyond the box.

LeMire created scoring chances from far enough out that he didn't compromise his defensive responsibility as a midfielder; yet still put pressure on the other team. This adjustment was a necessary movement away from the two-pronged attack of Bullen and Charest.

The major concern about UMass' defense is that it requires a large amount of physical contact. While effective, the Minutemen are often called for penalties. On Sunday, UMass received four yellow cards and on Sept. 19 lost starting defender Tim Kitchell for most of the Harvard game and the entire New Hampshire game, after the junior was red-carded for cleating a downed player.

When calls have gone their way, the Maroon and White have been unable to capitalize. Sunday, Chad Baker of Temple was handed a red card for unsportsmanlike conduct. The infraction put the Minutemen at a decisive advantage by forcing the Owls to play man down for the final 16 minutes of overtime. Despite the extra attacker, UMass did not record a single shot in 20 minutes of OT and only mustered one quality scoring opportunity that came when Richie Higa sailed a shot over the crossbar.

The Minutemen will look to get their offense cranking on Friday, when they travel to face A-10 rival Richmond. UMass coach Sam Koch will search for his 150th win from behind the Massachusetts bench.

MATTHEW BRIDGE/COLLEGIAN

UMass freshman defender Kenny Cook plays the ball. The Minutemen have been struggling to build consistancy this season.

'First Daughter' premiers, but fizzles.

Graduate of UMass Amherst now United States Ambassador to Yemen

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Correspondent

This past June, the U.S. State Department appointed Thomas Krajeski, a graduate of the University of Massachusetts Amherst, to the position of United States Ambassador to Yemen.

With such an influential appointment, high-ranking State Department officials can now be counted among the diverse alumni of UMass Amherst. Krajeski joins the likes of UMass's other prominent alumni, including Bill Cosby and Ken Feinberg, Special Master of the September 11 Victim Compensation Fund.

Krajeski, a 1975 graduate, studied Russian and German while at UMass. Born in Groveland, Mass., he attended UMass Amherst and owned a home with his wife and daughter in North Hadley. Despite the ambassador's New England roots, the former minuteman likes to point out that "it's an international world."

STEPHEN MORTON/AP

Krajeski bids farewell to Khalaf Al Habtoor as he takes a new post as deputy Director in the Office of Northern Gulf Affairs.

At the time that Krajeski was studying at UMass in 1968, the Vietnam War was raging. He reflects, "Were we fighting for freedom and democracy against the evil of communism, as some believed, or was it an imperialistic war of oppression against a poor third-world country, as others thought?"

Similar thoughts may ring familiar with students today as American public opinion is divided with regards to current American involvement in Iraq.

Krajeski's studies at UMass were divided into two periods of time. In 1970, after a year-and-a-half on campus, he was drafted into the armed forces. After refusing to serve on the grounds of being a conscientious objector, he was sentenced to two years of community service at several hospitals in Boston.

Krajeski finally returned to the University in August of 1972 and graduated in 1975. From the discussions that continued unabated on campus during that tumultuous time period, Krajeski says that he "learned to question, criticize, and analyze foreign affairs."

"How can students take advantage of the opportunities available to them while at college?" Krajeski asked. "Learn a language or two. Travel, travel, travel. Get involved in an international voluntary organization."

COURTESY IMAGE

Thomas C. Krajeski

When considering a major, the ambassador said that many students are at a loss as to what area will propel them furthest in the direction towards their desired success. How can learning a language help? The ambassador said that he is "constantly amazed at the lack of foreign language abilities among Americans. If you are at all interested in working for a major international company, or a law firm, or one of the hundreds of international, non-governmental organizations," the knowledge of a foreign language is "essential."

As for studying abroad in Yemen, Krajeski said, "Anybody who wants to study the Arabic language should consider Yemen a fascinating Arab country." He

Police continuing investigation on possible stabbing

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Police are still investigating a fight that took place early Friday morning involving three Massachusetts football players including starting defensive back Robert J. Cobbs, who received a quarter-inch deep puncture wound to the neck during the fight.

Police have not released the identities of the other five men involved in the fight, but are looking to file charges by today or tomorrow. UMPD has not said if Cobbs' injury was implicated from a person.

"We are narrowing down the necessary interviews," said UMPD Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archibald. "We want to progress as much as anyone."

Cobbs started in the away game at Boston College on Saturday, and led the team with 12 tackles, despite his injury.

According to Associate Athletic Director Jason Yellin, the athletic department and coach Don Brown were aware of Cobbs' injury before game time. Cobbs is still practicing and playing with the team.

When asked by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian if the athletic department will take disciplinary action against Cobbs or the other two unidentified players if criminal charges are filed, Yellin said he had no comment at this point.

"At this point in time we are waiting for a review by the University," he said.

Archibald says the Dean of Students Office is aware of the investigation and that the District Attorney's office is helping to determine whether or not civil rights were violated during the fight, in which three of the men were Caucasian and three were African American. Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, could not be reached for comment.

According to the Massachusetts District Attorney's office, the DA is aware of the investigation, but is refusing comment until official charges have been filed by police.

The UMass Athletic Department's Student-Athlete Misconduct Policy states that all student athletes are subject to prosecution and disciplinary action for any violation of state, local, and federal law as well as punishment by the University and Athletic Department for violation of University policy.

Punishment can include suspension from practice, competition, or all student-athlete privilege

Students to 'rally against racism' today on Student Union steps

By Brian Duffy
Collegian Staff

A rally will be held today on the University of Massachusetts campus at noon to inform students about "a culture of racism", according to Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante.

The event will begin on the steps of the Student Union and conclude outside of Whitmore Administration Building, with s speakers at each location.

Cassandra Engeman, a graduate student in the Labor Studies Department and a member of the Graduate Student Union, feels the march from the Student Union to Whitmore will symbolize a much-needed improvement in relations between the administration and the student body.

The rally is being organized by members of the campus community and ALANA who have met at the Malcolm X Center for the past two Sundays.

Susan Allen, sophomore communications major and intern at the office of ALANA Affairs, described the first meeting as "emotionally charged." At the second meeting she said, "we decided what action we wanted to take as a community." Allen hopes the rally will provide students with awareness of the issues and "bring the campus as a whole on the same page."

Graduate Assistant for Leadership Development at ALANA Affairs, Gladys Franco, said that her office has not received an apology from Patrick Higgins, Brian Roberts, or any of the other individuals involved with the photos that were taken by SGA members who illegally drank alcohol and drew Ku Klux Klan pictures in the SGA office.

"These people have been attacking the ALANA Caucus and the office of ALANA affairs for over a year," Franco said.

"We've been dealing with blatant and institutional racism on this campus for years. We can't let leaders of the SGA pose next to pictures of the Ku Klux Klan and think it's funny. It's not blown out of proportion," Franco said.

Gladys said she has been told that the light involving football player Robert J. Cobbs outside of McKimmie Dormitory last Friday morning was racially charged. She said that the UMass Police Department has been unwilling to release information on the altercation.

"That's a problem because the community is not aware," she said.

Franco feels that the administration is creating the façade that things are going well. She believes that UMass has become "a business, not a place where education is the primary focus."

She says that there is no commitment by the University to address issues of diversity.

Franco said Mike Gargano, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs, to be a liar. "Gargano has given us so many excuses; he's lying to the community, and he knows it," said Franco. She said Gargano's actions are inconsistent with his words.

The position of Assistant Director for Community Development and Support Services for ALANA has been vacant for two years. Franco says that Gargano has stalled this hiring process repeatedly. "He's put up one barrier after another. We comply with what he wants, and he puts up another barrier."

Alumni reunion looks at issues in journalism

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' Journalism Department alumni met at Herter Hall Saturday to discuss a range of issues that affect today's journalists.

The two-hour long session featured a discussion panel of three journalists: Craig Sandler, president of the Massachusetts State House News Service; Cosmo Macero, columnist and business editor for The Boston Herald; and Joan Vennochi, a columnist for The Boston Globe. The title of the event was "Don't Blame Us: Massachusetts Politics — Where We Are, Where We're Heading." This seemed quite appropriate as the board of journalists often shared the enthusiastic emotions of many fellow journalists in the audience when talking about events in today's local and national political scene.

The discussion's main topic was the repercussions of the recent change in Speaker of the House at the Massachusetts State House. Speaker Thomas Finneran (D-Mattapan) resigned last week and was replaced by Democratic State Representative Salvatore DiMasi of Boston's North End.

Sandler mentioned that DiMasi's

Senate elections today in Dining Commons

The Student Government senate elections will be held this Wednesday, September 29, and Thursday, September 30, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m.

Polling stations are located in all of the Dining Commons on campus and in the Campus Center. Residents from each living area are assigned to vote in a specific Dining Common.

-Residents of Northeast and Sylvan are expected to vote in the Worcester DC.

-Residents of Orchard Hill and Central are expected to vote in the Franklin DC.

-Residents of Southwest are expected to vote in the Hampshire and Berkshire DC's.

-Commuters are expected to vote in the Campus Center.

In the cases where they are needed, absentee ballots will be provided at the polls. The Vice Chancellor's office will provide some staff assistance to ensure that all polling locations will be open and available to the student body.

Vice President Cheney and Senator Edwards battle in debate last night

By Tom Raum
Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Sen. John Edwards accused the Bush administration Tuesday night of bungling the war in Iraq and presiding over a historic loss of jobs. "Your facts are just wrong," Vice President Dick Cheney shot back in a crackling campaign debate.

In a clash at close quarters, Edwards accused Cheney of "not being straight" with the American people about the war. He said U.S. casualties are rising monthly and the United States is bearing 90 percent of the cost and suffering 90 percent of the dead and wounded. Cheney promptly challenged those figures, saying the Iraqi security forces had taken nearly half of the casualties.

"For you to demean their sacrifice is beyond the pale," he said to Edwards seated a few feet away.

"Oh, I'm not," Edwards protested before the vice president cut him off.

The debate format encouraged give-and-take, and neither the vice president nor Sen. John Kerry's running mate shrunk from the task.

"Frankly, senator, you have a record that's not very distinguished," Cheney said to the North Carolina lawmaker after accusing him of a pattern of absences in the Senate during his one term.

Edwards summed up his points like the former trial lawyer he is.

In a jab at the Bush-Cheney campaign's claim on experience, he said, "Mr. Vice President, I don't think the country can take four more years of this type of experience."

He also said that as a member of Congress more than a decade ago, Cheney voted against Head Start and banning plastic guns that can escape detection in metal detectors.

Edwards was on the attack from the opening moments of the debate.

He said that in addition to mismanaging the war in Iraq, the administration had Osama bin Laden cornered in the mountains of Afghanistan at one point, but turned over the hunt for the mastermind behind the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks to Afghan warlords.

"The senator has got his facts wrong," said Cheney. "We've never let up on Osama bin Laden from Day One. We've actively and aggressively pursued him."

In rebuttal to Edwards'

new appointment will make it hard for Governor Mitt Romney to target the Speaker's position as being held by a villainous figure, as he has done in the recent past with Finneran.

"Romney sets opponents up as targets and knocks them out," Sandler said.

Examples he gave included Finneran and former UMass President William Bulger. He said DiMasi will probably be less of a target for now.

Macero said he was not sure how good of a job Romney did to portray Finneran as a villain. He said there were merely "a lot of business-like differences between the two," referring to Finneran and DiMasi.

According to Macero, many people had viewed DiMasi as the enforcer of Finneran's seats, making sure people were in attendance. However, he did point out some major difference in philosophy between the two. For example, he said that DiMasi "single-handedly steered" the Jane Doe Program for Women through the state's complicated budget process.

He also said that Finneran's fiscal conservatism is probably gone with the appointment of DiMasi, who he thinks will create more programs for constituents.

Vennochi pointed out that DiMasi has received good press during his change in power.

"[DiMasi has] received a clean slate from the media," she said. She also mentioned that citizens are more likely to give him a chance due to the positive press coverage.

Another topic of discussion included Governor Romney's possible presidential campaign. The general consensus regarding Governor Romney was that he has not made a big enough impact as governor to be presidential material.

Sandler explained it has been hard for Romney to accomplish anything due to the large numbers of Democrats currently holding seats in the State House. He drew an outline on the chalkboard that said there are 22 Republicans and 137 Democrats in the House and 6 Republicans and 34 Democrats in the Senate.

"If enough people vote Republican and the Republican numbers go into double digits, then Romney's big ideas can have some impact," Sandler said.

Prosecution put to rest the murder case against Peterson on trial for wife's murder

By Kim Curtis
Associated Press

REDWOOD CITY, Calif. — Prosecutors rested their murder case against Scott Peterson on Tuesday, having presented 174 witnesses trying to convince jurors he was a cheating husband who killed his pregnant wife and lied to police and family alike to cover his tracks.

The prosecution ended its 19-week case by portraying the defendant as a man on the run. Modesto Police Detective Jon Buehler said Peterson had a load of new camping gear and nearly $15,000 in cash when he was arrested April 19, 2003, near San Diego.

Peterson was arrested soon after the remains of Laci Peterson and her fetus washed ashore not far from the marina where Peterson launched his boat the previous Christmas Eve. He could face the death penalty if convicted.

Prosecutors allege Peterson killed his eight-months-pregnant wife in their Modesto home on or around Dec. 24, 2002, then dumped her body into the bay. Defense lawyers maintain someone else abducted and killed Laci.

Prosecutors have put together a detailed web of circumstantial evidence to cast suspicion on Peterson. The prosecution couldn't point to a murder weapon, a crime scene or even a cause of death, but legal experts said a detailed narrative from Modesto Detective Craig Grogan helped improve the prospects for their case.

On Tuesday, Buehler testified that when Peterson, 31, was arrested, he had a backpack and an overnight bag stuffed with everything from hunting knives and a water purifier to snorkeling and fishing equipment, a shovel and duct tape. Much of the camping equipment had been purchased a month earlier, Buehler said.

The camping equipment was found in a used, red Mercedes he had bought using his mother's name, Jacqueline. Peterson also had several changes of clothes, four cell phones, two driver's licenses — his and his brother's — and six credit cards, including one in girlfriend Amber Frey's name.

But defense lawyer Mark Geragos showed photos of similar clothes and equipment found in Peterson's truck months earlier, portraying him as a man who simply lived out of his vehicle.

On the day he was arrested, Peterson drove a circuitous nearly 170-mile route in Southern California in what prosecutors suggested was an attempt to evade police. Defense lawyers have maintained Peterson was trying to elude media scrutiny.

In the trunk of Peterson's car were several flyers advertising a reward for Laci Peterson's safe return, Buehler said. Peterson had also packed "The Purpose Driven Life: What on Earth Am I Here For?"

Frey had given him the book, along with a card dated Feb. 16, 2003. "I can only hope that this will come to an end soon," she wrote. "I wish I could go back in time. I'm praying for you and your family."

Experts disagreed on whether the last day of testimony was as dramatic as it needed to be to stick in jurors' minds. Chuck Smith, a former San Mateo County prosecutor, said the prosecution's case "ended with more of a whimper than a bang."

But Paula Canny, a defense lawyer and former prosecutor who has been watching the trial, said the prosecution showed that Peterson "lied to everybody."

"The strongest evidence the prosecution has is what Scott Peterson said and what Scott Peterson did," she said.

Geragos will begin calling witnesses when court resumes next Tuesday. Observers expect him to present experts who will contradict scientific evidence like the age of the fetus and law enforcement officers who will shore up the defense's accusation that police targeted Peterson and failed to look at other possible suspects.

UMass professor currently working at Columbia University in Paris

Brian W. Ogilvie, Associate Professor of History, has been conducting research in Europe on a $40,000 Fellowship for University Teachers from the National Endowment for the Humanities and a fellowship at the Columbia University Institute for Scholars at Reid Hall in Paris.

His work centers on his hypothesis that the culture of 17th-century diplomacy encouraged reconciliation between erudition and polite society.

"In a nutshell, diplomats were not professionals in the 17th century. That is, there were no schools that trained diplomats, no civil service in the modern sense, and the like. They were often recruited from the ranks of scholars, because Latin was still the language of international law and it was also still used for negotiation. So there were a lot of diplomats who were scholars."

More specifically, Ogilvie is gathering information on Ezechiel Spanheim, a numismatist (coin studier), scholar and diplomat. Ogilvie believes that Spanheim's unique role in European culture will offer a glimpse into the changing nature of the era (and validate his hypothesis). An obstacle in this is the fact that although he was famous in his day, he is now almost forgotten.

"I have asked a few dozen historians who are specialists on early modern European history whether they have heard of Ezechiel Spanheim and almost always, the answer is no."

Ogilvie describes his stay in Paris as very helpful to this end.

"Paris is a great place to do my research. The city has a wide range of libraries, with all of Spanheim's works and a wide range of his contemporaries' writings. Some Parisian archives will be useful for my research. And Spanheim spent, in total, more than twelve years of his life in Paris."

He will be returning spring semester 2006 and can be contacted at ogilvie@history.umass.edu.

Krajeski withdrew from UMass to study the Yemenis culture admitted that the U.S. State Department warns Americans to consider carefully the risks of traveling to Yemen. Yet he insists that Yemenis are not "terrorists who support Osama Bin Laden."

"Yemenis want a normal life. They want to preserve their culture and traditions while moving forward into the modern world." As for aiding that goal, Krajeski says that the challenge is "helping Yemenis build a viable, strong economy that can offer job opportunities, raise standards of living, and offer a future to young people."

When asked how he proposes to bring harmony to the whole Middle East (Krajeski reported on the Gaza-Jericho agreement in which Israel handed over control of parts of Gaza and the entire city of Jericho to the Palestinian Authority), the ambassador was wary about using the United States as a model. He does not necessarily agree with the notion that America is a country where the population lives in harmony with people of all backgrounds.

"Frankly, I'm not sure a poor African-American kid in the South Bronx or a new Cambodian refugee in New Orleans would agree with that assertion.

America is without doubt the best place to live on earth. Hundreds of thousands of people testify to that with their feet standing in long lines all over the world hoping to get visas, but I try not to impose the U.S. as a 'model nation' on the rest of the world."

The ambassador has noticed that people everywhere want to adapt some successful American institutions, but that the U.S. cannot impose their culture on others. His philosophy is that a movement towards the goal of a freer region must come from within each country.

However, Krajeski is "confident and even optimistic that many of the countries in this difficult and dangerous part of the world are changing. Once democracy, free markets, and respect for individual rights take hold, there's no stopping them."

Krajeski proudly proclaims that, "I have loved nearly every minute of my career, and can't imagine doing anything else."

However, the ambassador said that his journey has not been easy, and he encountered many obstacles along the way.

For example, Krajeski refers to "the mysteries of governmental bureaucracy," pointing out that, "I entered the Foreign Service in 1979 with strong Russian and German, and was immediately assigned study the Nepali language and go to Kathmandu. I still haven't figured that out."

charges on the war. Cheney repeatedly criticized the Democratic presidential nominee, Sen. John Kerry, for shifting positions on the conflict.

Referring to Kerry's debate with President Bush last week, Cheney said the four-term Massachusetts senator had declared he would submit American military commitments overseas to a global test.

He said that was part of a record that led Kerry to oppose the first Persian Gulf War in 1991 and "always being on the wrong side" of defense issues.

On domestic issues, Edwards said Bush has presided over a loss of jobs during his administration — the first president to do so since Herbert Hoover sat in the White House.

The awful truth: a note from the outside

Peter Lothian

My time at U-Mass as the Aussie exchange kid was like living on every American movie set I could have imagined. From the frat basses to the hockey games, from the Southwest riots to "club sidewalk," it often felt as though I were living in a Tarantino-scripted Road Trip meets Animal House. It was clear from these experiences, and the way in which I was welcomed into peoples' homes and lives, that many labels and stereotypes attached to Americans abroad are unsubstantiated.

The U.S. as a "tall poppy" in the international arena is destined to gain scrutiny for its actions. However, because of the War on Terrorism in Iraq, most individuals throughout the world do not acknowledge the vast cultural and intellectual contributions of the U.S. such as Noam Chomsky, the splitting of the genome and the creation of the Internet, to name just a few. But rather, individuals lay blame upon the U.S. for a myriad of world issues, and this has a trickle-down effect on individual Americans the world over.

Some of my best memories come from living in the night-club community of Southwest and living an American college life, which is why the following is hard to say. On my wayward journey home, I stumbled into a restaurant in Bangkok to see one of the most disturbing sights I've experienced on my travels. The street was bare except for this one overcrowded bar, full of solemn faces gazing at the screens.

It was Fahrenheit 9/11.

People from Sweden, Australia, England, California and all other remote corners of the world were gazing at the leader of the free world's galactic stupidity. A look of shock and awe on all of these well-travelled souls' faces was the only consistency amongst their ethnically diverse demeanours, where nobody knew better than the implications made by Moore was the possibility that we would have to endure four more years of this. Say what you will of Michael Moore's motives or methods, the man has a point.

Up until this point, the rest of the world has enjoyed the reality TV that comes out of the U.S. We've laughed at William Hung and toy cars going were the "sun don't shine," but the "reality" of Bush and his golf buddies on TV is a little too much. Having extensively travelled within Bush's term and since, by chance, living in Washington, D.C. for Sept. 11, I have seen America become more isolationist. As a consequence, the world generally turned against Americans abroad. I've seen Americans viewed with harsh looks in hostels in Paris, Barcelona and Bali; I've also met many Americans on the streets and cafes in Bangkok, Bali or London who were embarrassed by the way their country is acting. For the first time, they were learning of the effects of their country's actions over dinner table discussions with people from the outside world. I've even seen Americans posing as Canadians so as not to be harshly stereotyped.

One way the image of the U.S. can improve is for students like you to go abroad and show the world the type of compassion and friendship that all of last year's exchange students and I enjoyed.

Despite the realities of this message, do not take this as a message not to travel. One way the image of the U.S. can improve is for students like you to go abroad and show the world the type of compassion and friendship that all of last year's exchange students and I enjoyed.

This is a call to make a difference. America is scrutinized all over the world for the way it acts and interacts and really, it doesn't bother me whether you vote for a war-mongering oil baron or a liberal Boston war hero. If anything, take from this article the effects your nation's government has on the world and the effect this has on you as an American.

Martin Luther King, Jr. once said, "Our lives begin to end the day we become silent about things that matter." I can only hope that the next generation of America's leaders don't make that day November 2. Above all, remember that we are all in this together.

Peter Lothian is a former UMass student.

15 years of correspondence

S.J. Port

Amidst the cornfields at the northern end of Marshall County's German township, between the silo and the water tower, the Hoosier rattle and hum sputters along.

Take Route 31 south from South Bend to Route 331 to Plymouth Street. Pass the Sunoco station and an Arby's and merge onto Center Street. Motor past the old mint distillery and Woodie's supermarket to a small, white ranch house on the corner of South Center Street and East Sherman.

Once upon a time that house was yellow, to match the yellow-and-rose wallpaper in Grandma's kitchen. The porch wasn't walled in then, and the groans of Grandpa's porch swing gave bass to the rustle of his rainbow-colored windsocks hung all along the porch railing. Next door was another home, and on their back deck was an aboveground swimming pool.

Clambering onto the sink countertop in the bathroom at the back of the house a view onto the neighbor's deck could be found.

One day, when adults and children alike were miserable in the sweltering mid-July heat, Grandma found me staring out the window and gave me a choice: shuck sweet corn with Whistle and her, or run back and introduce myself to the neighbors.

The cigarette was barely back at her lips before I'd grabbed her round middle, sinking tightly into the soft familiar flesh, and quickly fled to the backyard.

Once there I strutted between clotheslines for a moment; for the first time in my life I was timid, unsure whether this cool 9-year-old girl from Indiana would accept a punkish 7-year-old from out east.

I dawdled around the yard until Grandma and Whistle came out onto the back steps to shuck the corn. Seeing my hesitancy, Grandma took my hand in hers and led me to the neighbor's front door. Ten minutes later I ran home for my swimsuit. Grandma had brought the suit down from my bedroom and after a quick strip down and a one-legged, naked stumble through the kitchen and into the suit, I was out the back door, through Jamie's front door, out to her back deck, up into a cannonball and down under the cool water.

When I resurfaced Jamie was sitting on the edge of the pool. What we talked about has left my memory, but after that summer letters began to fly back and forth between Bremen, Indiana, and Massachusetts.

Grandma died two years later, when I was nine. She was the most illuminating person in my life, and when they buried her I wanted badly to crawl inside the casket and go with her.

Grandpa died when I was 11. It was after that that we sold their house, and stopped coming home to Bremen.

My visits became less and less frequent, but the letters more regular and more urgent. As our teen years passed, and our adult lives took divergent paths, we clung to our friendship. It may have began as a neighborly need to cool off, but in fifteen years of correspondence Jamie has grown to be my oldest and dearest friend.

In a world fraught with insincerity and perishables, we've fought to keep communication lines open even if we weren't sure why we remained so important to one another.

We come from different cultures (Midwestern v. New Englander), different classes (blue collar v. white collar), different religious backgrounds (Christian v. mixed-family), and will most likely oppose one another's votes in the upcoming presidential election.

Our experiences as modern women have been radically different as she went to cheerleading competitions and I battled off derogatory remarks as a female ice hockey player.

Despite the developments — and highly questionable phases of our youth, our friendship has endured through parents' divorces and remarriages; rape; cancer; boyfriend after boyfriend; academic and personal accolades; miscarriages; my battles with atheism and her religious, right-wing dabbling; differing views on homosexuality, race, racism, and feminism; Jamie's wedding and divorce; family feuds; depression; chronic illness; the births of nieces and nephews; and the deaths of loved ones. We've had our fights, cut at one another, and spent months steaming off harsh words and honest answers to rhetorical questions in our different parts of the country. The different planes of our lives, however, remain parallel because of the heavy-duty bungee cords we lassoed between the two tracks.

The letters today, now footnoted by emails and phone calls, are no less numerous or important. However, the additional benefit of our fifteen years of snail-mail correspondence is that we both have developed strong writing, reading and interpretation skills.

In a world fraught with insincerity and perishables, we've fought to keep communication lines open even if we weren't sure why we remained so important to one another. Consumerism is so deeply ingrained in our habits that it has penetrated even that which is most innate to human nature: interpersonal relationships. When the going gets tough, if we disagree, or if we haven't seen each other in ages, we find new friends.

The majority of our relationships are due to convenience; nothing about my friendship with Jamie is convenient. The most rewarding remains the most difficult and often, that means sticking by in tough times. Friends, family and lovers are thrown to the curbside too often today. We're young; we have time to build these relationships. Why worry about it now? Because we share history, and I want her in my future. That means work now, in the present.

This weekend, I returned to Indiana and saw Jamie for the first time in three years. During our short time together, Jamie did something nobody else has ever done for me: allowed me time to grieve graveside. Stopping at Woodie's supermarket, we bought a dozen yellow roses. Then she took me to the cemetery, helped me lay the flowers across my grandparents' graves, and waited — with tissues in hand — beneath the pale blue water tower, as I said goodbye.

Thank you, Jamie, may our rattle and hum motor on.

Where have all the voters gone?

Lindsey Ferris

As I watched the first presidential debate on Thursday night in my dorm room, I could hear the commotion of music and students getting ready and making plans for the night. There was an important political event taking place, and all many students were concerned about was what they were going to wear and where they were going to party. The results of the 2004 presidential election will have a significant effect on our country, so why are so many students not interested?

When I ask this question to students, I hear many of the same answers: "I don't know the issues," "I think politics are boring," and "Why should I register or vote?" Well, politicians do not pay much attention to the youth, and it's because we don't pay much attention to them.

I think it's about time we do.

I had the response two years ago that most students do when asked about politics. Then I was assigned to do a speech in my class on something we felt strongly about. As I was researching I came across the subject of partial birth abortion. I was intrigued by it and horrified to learn that it was legal. After presenting the speech to my class, I felt so strongly about this one issue, it inspired me to register. I thought maybe I could give these helpless babies a voice.

That is what every student can be, a voice. Even if there is one issue you feel strongly about, it's worth voting for. And even if there are no issues you care about, there more likely than not will be some in the future. That possibility is worth registering for.

This is what every student can be, a voice. Even if there is one issue you feel strongly about, it's worth voting for.

The issues involved in this year's election are so important to our future that it is vital all students become educated, become involved and most importantly, vote. The war in Iraq will affect so many people that are our age in so many ways; it is important we know the significant difference of opinions both candidates have on this issue.

There are places you can find information on the presidential race other than Saturday Night Live and the Daily Show. There are official Web sites you can visit to learn more about the candidates and what they stand for. There are also Web sites that describe how you can get involved, such as Rockthevote.com. There are two more presidential debates before the election. One is on Friday, October 8, and the other is on Wednesday, October 13. Election Day is Tuesday, November 2, and you must be registered 20 days before Election Day to be able to vote.

I am not telling you which candidate to vote for. I am not even telling you to vote. You have the freedom to vote for whom you want or not vote at all, but you also have a privilege. You have the privilege to vote and choose where your country will be led next.

I am asking you to please just take the time to educate yourself and consider the issues. I am asking you to register, so if an issue comes up that you care about, you can make a difference and vote. I am asking you to have a voice on November 2.

WALK TO STOP VIOLENCE

This Friday, wonderful people are going to join together to stand against abuse. Every 12 seconds there is someone victimized by abuse. Only 12 seconds; that is something I want everybody to think about. The next time you heat a Pop Tart or watch the commercials in between your favorite show, there were five to 10 people abused.

We as a community need to show how we feel about this. We need to send a message to as many people as possible saying that abuse is something that has to stop. Awareness and education will help to increase the 12-second span. That is why I am asking for everyone who reads this or hears of this Friday's Men's Walk to End Abuse to join us in our stand.

I understand that people are leaving for home this long weekend, and for those, this message is only a reminder of the harsh truth out there today. However, this message is designed specifically to those who are without obligation this Friday from 2 p.m. until 3:30 p.m.; show your belief.

Many others and I have already committed to this necessary statement of Anti-Abuse by planning on walking from the Amherst Common to the UMass campus, but we are looking for others who believe that what is happening every 12 seconds is wrong. Those who do not join but could have can only be expressing that they do not believe ending abuse is essential; they might be the very ones who not only encourage but practice the act of victimizing others.

So join me, and others, who, on Friday afternoon, will stand tall and walk with a message: Abuse is wrong and 12 seconds is too short.

CONSERVATIVES HAVE A CAMPUS VOICE TOO

I just wanted to say that it was very refreshing to read the editorial written by Dan McDonnell on Oct. 5. In this state, and especially at this school, having a negative opinion of John Kerry is not the popular thing.

I support President Bush proudly, for reasons and issues not widely discussed during this election. When I had shown my support with "W '04" stickers, I had them written on and then ripped down. I have since replaced them because I am not ashamed to support Bush. It was nice to see somebody else was not ashamed to express his opinion even if it went against the grain.

Thank you for writing and publishing the editorial. Not everyone at UMass is for Kerry.

TVS IN DCS ARE STUDENT REQUESTED

I would like to respond to the editorial article published on Tuesday, Oct. 5, 2004 titled "Televisions impractical in the dining commons".

Since we installed four TVs one week ago, we received a lot of positive feedback from students on our initiative. The idea of having television installed at DCs was based on the past surveys when we asked the question, "What would you like to see to enhance your dining experience?" Having TV in the DC far outweighed soft music, or live bands and live plays, according to the students' responses.

The students told us that they like to keep updated on the news, sports events and most of all, socially, they like to watch the TV with their friends, including the upcoming Red Sox baseball games.

Yesterday we conducted two surveys during the breakfast and lunch period and asked the question, "Do you like TV playing at the Worcester DC?" The result was that close to 90 percent said yes and only 10 percent said no based on 594 responses.

Dining Services continually interacts with its students and we will continue to seek their input in further improving our service to them. The TVs are just one of many initiatives which we have implemented because of our student feedback.

First daughter finishes last

By Ryan Aubert
Collegian Correspondent

It seems like only yesterday that "Chasing Liberty" arrived in the theaters to mixed applause. The film followed Mandy Moore as the president's daughter who was hung up on finding her man by being a regular teenager. Of course, being a real teenager involves romping around Europe with all expenses paid and magically finding a British love interest.

Now nine months later, "First Daughter" follows in its predecessor's footsteps as a sloppily put-together hodgepodge of mushy, unrealistic scenes that depend on the viewer having an IQ of a 9-year-old. The movie not only embraces every cliché of the chick flick genre, but relishes in it and overstays its welcome.

'First Daughter'
Directed by Forest Whitaker
Starring Katie Holmes, Marc Blucas
20th Century Fox
Rated PG
105 mins.
Grade D+

Katie Holmes stars as Samantha Mackenzie, the only child of the president (Michael Keaton) and the first lady (Margaret Colin). At 18, she decides she wants to go to college and at least try to be a regular teenager. Unsurprisingly, attempting to be a regular teenager and have fun is not possible because of the plethora of Secret Service agents surrounding her.

Of course, the increased security is absolutely necessary because as the president points out, we live in a different world since September 11. Sounds like they got a hold of Bush's talking points.

Eventually, Mackenzie falls in love with her typically hot RA, who strangely looks about 30 years old. Don't fret, though, because that feature is explained in the main plot twist that can be guessed very early on. James Lansome (Marc Blucas) woos her in cliche, chick-flick dates such as a boat ride, complete with umbrella for the girl, and a dark movie theater showing an old film. How romantic.

Each scene seems to stand on its own with a beginning, middle, and an end. The transitions from scene to scene are very awkward because of this. In addition, random scenes are placed in for comedic effect that has absolutely no bearing on what's going on at all. The viewer is harraged by imagery of both cliché and random sights that do not mesh together. Random events include shopping with a cameo of Vera Wang and a scene in which Mackenzie and her roommate meet a fellow floormate who plays the trombone.

The dialogue is equally as bad. It is as if the filmmakers made a list of everything that has been said before in these types of movies and put it into a script. The words are forced, and the love is lost.

Katie Holmes, however, is indeed watchable because she has a certain charm. Her acting is not great, but it is better than other twenty-something women playing teenagers in chick flicks. She has an aura that is invoked on-screen and is very likeable, making the torturous scenes bearable.

"First Daughter" is Forest Whitaker's fifth outing as director, but his style (or lack thereof) in this film leaves much to be desired. Whitaker makes the film a direct rehash of typical conventions in this genre without introducing bringing new. Perhaps he should just stick to the acting part of his career.

Katie Holmes plays the daughter of the president of the United States of America in a teen movie flop.

A legend honored

NEW YORK — Friends of Tony Randall, many of whom have graced the Great White Way numerous times, filled the Majestic Theatre to pay tribute to the actor and Broadway producer who died last May.

The theater, home of 'The Phantom of the Opera,' was instilled more with spirit and laughter Tuesday than sadness. Speakers — including Harry Belafonte, Garry Marshall and Eli Wallach — shared personal stories with the audience.

Broadway actor James Naughton hosted the affair. Naughton began the ceremony by reading snippets from the official Tony Randall Day proclamation, issued earlier by Mayor Michael Bloomberg.

"I'm going to skip through the whereases and so forths," he joked with the audience before reciting highlights. Naughton's wit and poise set the tone for the afternoon event, which was seasoned with songs from Randall's performing friends.

Ben Vereen crooned 'Life Is Just a Bowl of Cherries' to the audience. Before he began, the 'Roots' star said that the song's title was a motto by which Randall lived each day. When mezzo-soprano Marilyn Horne strolled onto the stage, she warned the crowd she wasn't going to perform opera — she now teaches it — but did sing 'At the River,' a song she believed meant passing on to the other side was like meeting your friends on the other side of a river.

Naughton also apologized for not performing opera — albeit jokingly — because he's not an opera singer. Naughton performed 'Razzle Dazzle' from 'Chicago,' a song he said Randall's wife, Heather Harlan, told him that Randall would perform for her during cocktail hour in their home.

The crowd welcomed Tony-winning Julie Harris, accompanied by Maria Tucci, with boisterous applause. Tucci, Randall's last co-star in 'Right You Are,' was brought to tears when speaking about the last time she saw Randall. Harris patted Tucci on the cheek when the tears arrived. "He said, 'See you Tuesday,'" Tucci told the crowd.

Many of the speakers touched upon how happy Randall was during the last years of his life, commenting on how he was a devoted family man. Randall and Harlan had two children, Julia and Jefferson.

Others spoke about his commitment to the theater. In 1991, Randall founded the National Actors Theatre with the intent of bringing serious theater with serious actors to the masses. 'The Crucible,' NAT's first production, starred Martin Sheen and Michael York. Under Randall's artistic direction, NAT produced 19 plays including, 'The Gin Game,' 'Inherit the Wind' and 'The Persians.'

The tribute ended appropriately with Jack Klugman, who starred with Randall on stage and on television in 'The Odd Couple' — Randall's most well-known work — as well as other theatrical productions such as 'The Sunshine Boys' and 'Three Men on a Horse.'

Klugman said he hoped in the near future there would be a theater in New York called the Tony Randall Theater.

Nielsen report: 'desperate' does it

NEW YORK — Until the premiere of 'Desperate Housewives,' the last time ABC scaled the television ratings summit with a scripted series, it was with a show that no longer exists.

The dark suburban comedy was seen by 21.6 million viewers on Sunday, making it the most popular show of the week. The last ABC series at the top was 'The Practice' three years ago, according to Nielsen Media Research.

The second episode of ABC's 'Lost' was seen by 17 million viewers on Wednesday, then another 8.8 million when the network repeated the first two episodes on Saturday.

Although CBS was the most popular network again, ABC won among the 18-to-49-year-old demographic, the most craved demographic among advertisers. The last time ABC won in that category this early in a TV season was 10 years ago.

"There are surprises in every television season, and we're happy to be on the upside of a couple of them," said Steve McPherson, ABC entertainment president.

McPherson got this job last spring and is now benefiting from the unexpected success of shows developed by former ABC executives Lloyd Braun and Susan Lyne.

ABC can thank George Bush and John Kerry for some of its success last week. Chances are that 'Desperate Housewives' would not have been the week's No. 1 show if the presidential debate hadn't wiped out part of strong Thursday lineups on CBS and NBC.

NBC finished a disappointing third for the week, with no show reaching higher than No. 13 in the rankings. The show that did reach No. 13 was 'The Apprentice 2,' which drew a below-average audience of 14.7 million viewers because it had to be switched to Wednesday because of the debate.

The return of 'American Idol' in January can't come soon enough for Fox. Not a single Fox show was seen by more than 8 million viewers, Nielsen said. Its most popular program, 'Trading Spouses,' ranked No. 53 for the week.

The poor start has already claimed one casualty: Fox announced that its boxing reality series, 'The Next Great Champ,' was being shuffled off to Fox Sports Net. Last week's edition had only 4.4 million viewers.

On cable's Comedy Central, 'The Daily Show' with Jon Stewart had its biggest audience ever the night of the Bush-Kerry debate. The 2.4 million viewers were a half-million more than the series' previous record, Nielsen said.

For the week, CBS averaged 12.5 million viewers (8.2 rating, 13 share), ABC had 10.8 million (7.1, 12), NBC had 9.7 million (6.5, 11), Fox had 5 million (3.4, 5), the WB had 4 million (2.7, 4), UPN had 3.1 million (2.2, 4) and Pax TV had 860,000 (0.5, 1).

ABC's "Desperate Housewives" ranks among top shows of last week, according to Nielsen ratings.

'Friday Night' lights it up

Billy Bob Thornton plays a Texas football coach in Peter Berg's adaptation of "Friday Night Lights".

By Christy Lemire
Associated Press

The rhapsodic hyperbole, the media scrutiny, the fan obsession. No, we're not talking about the Boston Red Sox at playoff time. This is Texas high school football, and exaggeration is impossible.

From the big cities to the smallest wind-swept towns, it really is a way of life. H.G. 'Buzz' Bissinger captured it with eloquence and evocative detail in his 1990 bestseller, 'Friday Night Lights' — and director Peter Berg does it again in his film of the same name.

It's easy to overdramatize the heroism and heartache of a sports movie, but Berg, who adapted Bissinger's book with screenwriter David Aaron Cohen, resists the urge and goes in the opposite direction.

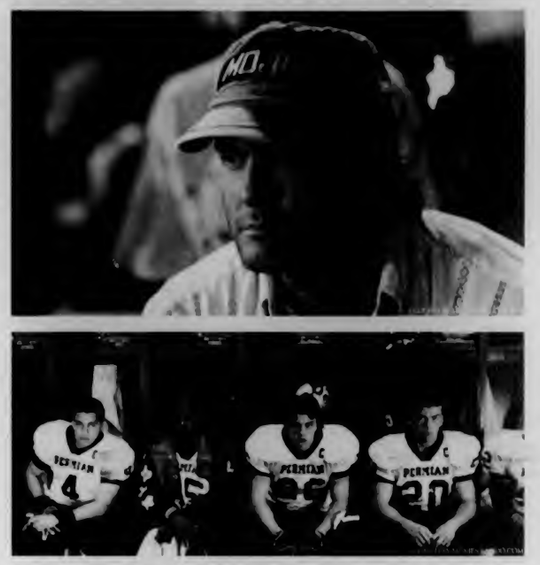
The focus is on Permian High School football in the West Texas city of Odessa, both on the field and in the locker room. The look is stripped down and bleached out, making the already parched landscape of oil fields and scrub brush seem even bleaker, though in a strikingly beautiful way. The soundtrack is an eclectic mix of old-school rap, rock and punk, including the truly inspired use of 'The Stooges' 'I Wanna Be Your Dog' during the Permian Panthers' gutsy second half in the 1988 state championship.

There is an awful lot of action, though — the football scenes have a bone-jarring realism thanks to stunt coordinator Allan Graf, a former USC offensive lineman who also choreographed the plays in 'Any Given Sunday' and 'Jerry Maguire' — but sometimes at the expense of character development.

For example, the book focused more on Brian Chavez, Permian's star tight end who went on to Harvard and is now a lawyer in Odessa. Here, he's a barely fleshed-out supporting character played by 'Crazy/Beautiful' co-star Jay Hernandez.

Bissinger, who happens to be Berg's second cousin, also spent more time exploring the racial and socio-economic rifts that existed both within Odessa in the late 1980s and between Odessa and rival Midland, a wealthier, whiter town 20 miles east.

But Berg does faithfully depict the be-all, end-all element of high school football in places like this, where literally every store shuts down on Friday nights and the 20,000 people packing the stadium all have some opinion on how the coach should run the team.



As the under-pressure Coach Gaines, Billy Bob Thornton continues to show he can bring nuance to any role. Thornton doesn't turn the character into a cliche, barking out orders like a drill sergeant. Instead, he shows the seething anxiety of living under the constant possibility of being fired (after a huge Permian loss, Gaines comes home to a sea of 'For Sale' signs sprouting from his front lawn) as well as the genuine desire to develop strong players and even stronger men.

'Friday Night Lights'
Directed by Peter Berg
Starring Billy Bob Thornton, Tim McGraw Universal Pictures
Grade A

Among the stars of his squad are shy quarterback Mike Winchell (Lucas Black, who played opposite Thornton as a boy in 'Sling Blade'), who's not really sure why he's playing football, and party-boy tailback Don Billingsley (Garrett Hedlund), who's living in the shadow of his alcoholic father (Tim McGraw), who was a star at Permian 20 years earlier. McGraw, the country music stud, gives a surprisingly convincing performance in his film debut, one that's reminiscent of Dwight Yoakam's turn in 'Sling Blade.'

The showiest role of all, and the one that offers the greatest range, is that of Boobie Miles (Derek Luke), the showboating running back who helps the Panthers light up the scoreboard in their first game, only to suffer a serious injury at the end that sidelines him for the rest of the season. Luke, the 'Antwone Fisher' star, is magnetic at his character's high point then furious and fearful as he realizes his dreams of playing college and pro football have been destroyed.

His performance vividly conveys how high school football can be more than a religion — it can represent life itself, for better or worse. Berg, as Bissinger did before him, lets us decide for ourselves.

Cake offers nothing fresh with 'Pressure Chief'

The rock band Cake fails to reclaim their earlier album's success.

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — Some think that in order to appreciate a piece of art, it must be fully divorced from its context. One's personal feelings and past experience with the artist must be suspended, as the appraisal's objectivity is of critical importance. The perspective with objectivity, it is argued, is the only perspective with any value.

Considering Cake's 'Pressure Chief' album in such a manner would have yielded a significantly higher rating. The group's lackadaisical brand of guitar pop with minimalist accentuation is certainly not stridently disagreeable, and it is vastly preferable to the legions of mall-punk bands emoting their way into the hearts of sixth-graders everywhere (read: Good Charlotte).

Objectively, Cake blends a carefree attitude, catchy guitar hooks and some pleasing embellishments with trumpets, synthesizers and assorted found-sound noisemakers into condensed songs that are easy to digest. Admittedly, the group's sound wears a bit thin over the course of a 55-minute album, but Cake seems to be taking itself lightheartedly enough, so it's not too grating.

Unfortunately for Cake, the notion of objectivity is b.s. All of Cake's albums before this one sound exactly the same. Yes, John McCrea's low-key, speak-sing delivery and Vince Di Fiore's occasional trumpet bursts are interesting and enjoyable at first, but over the course of five albums and 10 years, Cake is in dire need of either innovation or an indefinite hiatus. Cake's sound still isn't disagreeable per se, but it's so damn boring by now that getting excited about the group is quite difficult.

Fortunately, 'Pressure Chief' doesn't completely recycle Cake's previous efforts. For example, McCrea has adopted the role of a social commentator in a few of the album's songs. Unfortunately, most of his statements are of such bland and general nature that they border on being wholly impotent. 'No Phone' deals with predictably, the proliferation of cell phones and other such technology that has permeated American society in recent years. 'Carbon Monoxide' focuses on — you guessed it — the unhealthy state of the earth's atmosphere.

The instrumentation on this album remains standard Cake fare — the aforementioned guitar hooks, synthesizers, trumpet and McCrea's trademark delivery style have all remained intact.

Ultimately, 'Pressure Chief' is not going to win over any new Cake fans, nor will it divide their existing ones. Some will rush to buy this album, but the rest of us will just occasionally listen to the copies of 'Fashion Nugget' we bought in junior high.

from cigarette-maker R.J. Reynold's Winston brand to telecommunications giant Nextel.

As part of the whole scrubbing-up process, NASCAR president Mike Helton told drivers in February to watch their language on radio and television. Less than a month later, he showed he meant it: Johnny Sauter lost 25 points for swearing during a radio interview after a Busch Series race in Las Vegas.

Ron Hornaday, Jr. was also fined and lost 25 points for cursing during a live radio interview in June during a Busch race in Dover, Del.

"Helton made it clear ... that we, as a family sport, were taking this very seriously and adhering to FCC guidelines," NASCAR spokesman Mike Zizzo said. "The timing is unfortunate for Dale, Jr., but NASCAR also made it clear to the competitors that we would police the last 10 races just like we did the first 26."

It's also part of an overall trend in sports and media, the most talked-about example being Janet Jackson's "wardrobe malfunction" during her halftime performance at the Super Bowl. CBS was fined a record $550,000 by the FCC for Jackson's breast-baring, and federal regulators cracked down on other objectionable content on TV and radio.

"I know the FCC has been hard on everybody since the Super Bowl mess, and we should have clean language. Mike Helton tells us to act like there are people from 8 to 80 that are watching us, but it's tough," driver Elliott Sadler said. "I can understand if we do something stupid on the race track to get penalized for it, because it might be putting somebody's life in danger for doing something stupid. But as far as cussing or saying a bad word, maybe they should be a little lenient on that."

Networks have installed delays of up to 10 seconds for some programming, and ABC's "Monday Night Football" is using a 5-second delay this season. NBC does not give itself a chance to censor its NASCAR telecasts, though.

That's why viewers in nearly 7 million homes were able to hear Earnhardt use a vulgarity when he was asked about the significance of his fifth victory at Talladega. Earnhardt told NBC, "It don't mean s— right now. Daddy's won here 10 times."

Earnhardt's father, easily the most popular driver of his era, was killed in a last-lap crash at the Daytona 500 in 2001.

Father and son won the adoration of millions in part because they built reputations for saying whatever they're thinking.

Cardinals peck Dodgers

ST. LOUIS — Larry Walker homered twice and the St. Louis Cardinals tied a postseason record by hitting five home runs, overwhelming Odalis Perez and the Los Angeles Dodgers in an 8-3 blowout Tuesday in the opener of their NL playoff series.

Cardinals	8
Dodgers	3

Albert Pujols, Jim Edmonds and Mike Matheny also connected. Add in a strong six-inning performance from Woody Williams and the Cardinals looked every bit as dominating as they did in leading the majors with 105 wins.

Game 2 of the best-of-five series is Thursday night at Busch Stadium. Jason Marquis pitches for St. Louis against Jeff Weaver. The Cardinals are one of four teams to hit five homers in a postseason game, joining the 1984 Cubs (NLCS), the 1928 Yankees (World Series) and the 1989 Athletics (World Series).

Edgar Renteria had a two-run double in the five-run third that broke open the game. Edmonds followed with a two-run homer to chase Perez.

Walker, who was 1-for-15 against Perez in the regular season, got the two-out, third-inning rally started with his two-out homer on the first pitch. Edmonds also connected on the first pitch.

Perez, making his first career postseason start, gave up six runs on five hits — three homers — in 2 2-3 innings.

Matheny connected off Elmer Dessens in the fourth to make it 7-0. After the Dodgers cut the deficit to 7-2, Walker homered again off Giovanni Carrara in the seventh.

Williams, a compromise pick as St. Louis' Game 1 starter after an injury to 15-game winner Chris Carpenter, labored somewhat and threw 116 pitches with two strikeouts and one walk. The Dodgers scored in the fifth on consecutive doubles by Cesar Izturis and Jayson Werth, and added a run in the sixth on Adrian Beltre's leadoff single and Alex Cora's two-out triple.

Tom Wilson hit a two-out homer in the ninth for Los Angeles.

Shaq's training camp is a full media frenzy

By Israel Gutierrez
Knight Ridder Newspapers

MIAMI, Flor. — In some ways, training camp will be a lot easier than this part of Shaquille O'Neal's Miami experience.

In training camp, he won't be asked to stand wearing his Heat uniform and fur-lined slippers under the scalding sun while a photographer and his assistants poke and pose him for more than 30 minutes.

In training camp, he won't be asked to step into a pool in full uniform, submerge his head in the water about 15 times and then smile wide each time as if the chlorine wasn't stinging his eyes.

In training camp, he won't conduct interviews poolside while hotel workers from the Mandarin Oriental come by with towels to wipe the sweat collecting on his face.

No, this is nothing like camp. This is a Sports Illustrated cover shoot — one of the final distractions O'Neal has to deal with before his true Miami Heat experience begins Tuesday with the opening of camp.

Sitting poolside after all the camera shutters have stopped clicking and the photographer has stopped barking childish instructions such as, 'Let's see those big eyes,' O'Neal, with his feet dangling in the water, has plenty on his mind.

He's about to embark on a journey with his third team, and he can't help but be excited about the prospects. He's practically giddy about being back in Florida, this time in a city that he calls the perfect mixture of Orlando and Los Angeles. But there's also some bitterness lingering in O'Neal — bitterness toward his old Lakers organization and of course, toward his former teammate, superstar Kobe Bryant.

And when O'Neal has a lot on his mind, don't bother trying to interrupt him with silly things like questions. Just like he controls the paint, O'Neal will dominate the conversation.

O'Neal can't say enough about his new boss, Heat president Pat Riley, and the team Riley has put together.

"I had a conversation with Pat and I'm looking at the team, looking at what Dwyane Wade did last year," O'Neal said. "All they needed was one piece. I'm that piece. I need them, and they need me.

"Pat is smart. He knows what he's doing. He has given me a lot of shooters, a lot of role players and a lot of hard workers. I've got like three or four 6' 9" big guys that aren't even looking for plays being called. They're rebounding. Malik Allen can hit that wide-open jumper. We've got me, we've got Eddie Jones. We're straight.

"It's not something I'm going to talk about all year because I don't like to count my chickens before they hatch, but I was looking on paper the other day and I like it.

"I've been getting passes from dudes that I haven't seen in a while. I actually have to get used to them. Like Thursday, I was standing in the paint and Damon Jones is coming down the middle of the lane. I'm used to guys not even dropping it off, but he threw it by the rim and I said, 'Oh,' and went up and got it. I'm going to get easy buckets like that."

Get to the point.

the playoffs. Only Kareem Abdul-Jabbar with 237 has played in more post-season games than Pippen (208).

Pippen finished his career with a 16.1 scoring average to go with his 6.4 rebounds and 5.2 assists averages. He said that one of his biggest thrills was being a member of the first "Dream Team" to win a gold medal at the Olympics, as he did at Barcelona in 1992.

Pippen said his various injuries have left him unable to play a full season. Still, the Bulls will pay him the $5 million remaining on his two-year contract this season, general manager and former teammate John Paxson said.

"After 17 years, I got all the basketball out of me I possibly could," Pippen said.

And unlike Jordan, who made two comebacks after retiring, Pippen promised he's finished.

"There won't be any return for me," he added.

Although Pippen was being heralded Tuesday as a consummate teammate, there was one selfish episode during Jordan's one full season away from the game that will always be remembered.

Unhappy when a final shot was called for Toni Kukoc instead of him, Pippen sat out the final 1.8 seconds of Game 3 of the 1994 Eastern Conference semifinals. Kukoc made the shot to win the game, but the Bulls lost the series.

And the 1997-98 season had barely started when Pippen, recovering from foot surgery and unhappy with his contract, demanded a trade. He eventually returned, but his bitterness with then general manager Jerry Krause festered.

Krause, who acquired Pippen's rights in a draft-day deal for Olden Polynice in 1987 — which turned out to be one of the team's best transactions ever — has his own banner hanging from the rafters at the United Center.

Next season, the Bulls plan to retire Pippen's number, 33.

Pippen plans to stick around Chicago and be a volunteer coach of sorts, working with some of the Bulls' younger players during training camp.

"I've done all I could as a player," Pippen said on how he would be remembered. "I kind of leave that up to the fans and individuals to judge me on how I was as a player and a person.

Shula thinks Pats could go unbeaten

By Steven Wine
Associated Press

MIAMI — Don Shula knows what it takes to achieve a perfect season, and he says the New England Patriots have a chance to do it.

On the other hand, Shula says, the winless Miami Dolphins have a shot at an upset Sunday at New England.

The Hall of Fame coach has a vested interest for two reasons. He led the Dolphins for 26 years and still roots for them, and his 1972-73 teams won 18 consecutive games, an NFL record the Patriots hope to break Sunday.

Four other teams share the record, but only Shula's 1972 Dolphins went 17-0. The Patriots need 16 more wins in a row for the second perfect season in league history, which would be 19-0.

"They've got a real shot at it," Shula said Tuesday. "They've got to win a lot of games to do it, and tough teams down the road. But they certainly are a legitimate threat to do it. They're a team that's solid in every way, from ownership to coaching to the players."

That's in contrast to the 2004 Dolphins, off to their worst start since their expansion season in 1966 with four consecutive losses.

It's a level of failure foreign to Shula, who holds the NFL record with 328 coaching victories. He never endured an 0-4 start in 33 years as a coach, and 16 times he had four losses or less the entire season.

"Obviously the Dolphins are 0-4 and not happy about that," he said. "They haven't been able to put together any drives offensively. If they can get something together offensively, with the great defense they play, they've got a chance to win some games this year, and they've got a chance against New England have contributions to Miami's woes.

defense that shut out six of their first nine opponents.

On the offensive, St. Bonaventure must find someone other than Heather MacDougal to provide some offense. The A-10 leader in both goals and points, MacDougal has scored all three of the team's goals in the last four games. Even more damaging is the loss of sophomore forward Kelly O'Malley.

O'Malley, who shares the A-10 lead in points with MacDougal, suffered a season-ending knee injury just three minutes into their A-10 opener against Duquesne on Sept. 26.

Dayton Continues to Surge

Coaches around the A-10 knew that Dayton was going to be good, but nobody thought they'd be this good. After dropping a 3-2 decision to No. 12 Florida, the Flyers have won ten in a row and sit atop the A-10 standings at 3-0. So far, the offense has been relatively consistent averaging two goals per game, good for third in the Atlantic 10. It's the defense however that's been dominant.

The Flyer D ranks first in fewest goals allowed with 6 and has a .55 goals against average. It hasn't just been a matter of tremendous goaltending either.

While keeper Stacey DeLuca leads the league in shut outs and is second in goals against average, she doesn't even place in the top 10 for saves. Bottom line, the Dayton backs and midfielders are preventing opponents from getting shots off. If the Flyers keep this up, they'll be well on their way to yet another A-10 title and possibly a national ranking.

Double Trouble

Several A-10 teams have sets of twins making large contributions this season. As mentioned before, the Rhody Rams have been fortunate enough to have not one, but two very talented Kaspareks. Not only has Melanie been producing for Rhody, sister Megan has been excellent on offense, scoring five goals and dishing out assists on three others.

Temple is another team with a dynamic offensive duo, Santantta and Stephanie Vietry. The Cranston, RI natives share the team's lead for goals with two apiece. Samantha is also second on the team in assists with two.

The Musketeers of Xavier are also beneficiaries of a dynamic twin billing. Amber Silvis, a 2003 All-Rookie team member is having a successful sophomore campaign, having scored two goals this season while appearing in all 11 Xavier games. Her sister Ashley, a defender, has played well for the Musketeers this season. She too has appeared in 11 games and has started in 10 of them.

the bottom third. Northeastern came in at No. 7 despite missing the playoffs after a meager season that ended in a race to the bottom with Merrimack. The Warriors were picked to finish last for the fifth time in six years, one spot behind Providence.

Early birds

Giving even more credence to Jack Parker's annual gripe that the Hockey East teams play too long a season, four HEA teams played games last weekend, including one matchup between a current conference stalwart (Maine), and next year's newcomers (Vermont).

Merrimack also played a pair of early games, earning a win and a tie in two exhibitions against St. Thomas University of New Brunswick. Providence and UMass each played St. Francis Xavier of Nova Scotia last weekend, and both squads earned exhibition wins against the X-Men.

Friday Night's all right for fightin'

In a move that is sure to improve Hockey East's television coverage over last year's flighty plan, the New England Sports Network (NESN) will broadcast 13 regular season games, including 10 as part of its "Friday Night Ice" package, which begins at the turn of the new year. BU, who signed a new deal to call NESN its broadcast home, made out as the biggest winner in the deal, with four games on the network's Friday package, and 10 games overall, including the always-enticing January battle with Boston College.

UMass also got in on the deal, with three games scheduled for broadcast.

Bullen and Charest pace offense

scored one goal last year would be carrying a significant portion of the Minutemen's goal scoring. As a freshman, Charest was relegated to the bench for much of the year and only started twice in 17 games.

Koch, however, isn't shocked by the way Charest has responded to more playing time. He mentioned that he is a hard worker on and off the field, and every goal he scores is well earned.

"I'm not surprised; I think he's one of our better players," Koch said. "To have live at this point in the season is maybe a few more than I thought, but I'm not really surprised because I know he can put the ball in the back of the net."

Bullen, however, started the season with much higher expectations. As the captain and the returning starter with the most goals from last year, Bullen was the focal point of the UMass offense.

Although he has not had any golden goals, Bullen is still opening up chances and putting the ball away for the Minutemen. He and Charest have been staples in an offense that has gone through several changes this season, all in hopes of finding a unit that clicks.

"I think the tough thing for him is that he's the one frontrunner that everybody knows about," Koch said on Bullen. "When he goes into a game, the other team tries to stop him."

After completing nearly half its season, UMass has a couple more frontrunners that opposing coaches are on the lookout for. Charest and Bullen have been more than sufficient for the Minutemen this year, but freshman Matt Lemire has also been a threat with two goals and two assists in the season.

"Matt Lemire has definitely helped, because now the other team has to worry about him," Koch said. "This gives Oral [Bullen] a little more space to run. Now all three of them are helping each other."

Pippen hangs them up

By Rick Gano
Associated Press

DEERFIELD, Ill. — Scottie Pippen played the sidekick to basketball's greatest star, Michael Jordan, creating a partnership the Chicago Bulls parlayed into an NBA dynasty with six titles in the 1990s.

Pippen's career came to an end Tuesday as he announced his retirement following 17 years in the league. He made the announcement while standing in front of the six championship trophies he helped the Bulls win.

"As I stand here and as I look back, I don't think Michael [Jordan] had any championship trophies without me," Pippen said of a basketball relationship that was mutually beneficial.

Jordan already was a star when Pippen arrived in 1987. Four seasons later, they brought the Bulls their first title.

"It was a taste for us we had never had before," Pippen said, looking back on the five-game victory over the Lakers.

There were two "three-peat" championships interrupted by Jordan's unsuccessful foray into baseball and a 72-10 regular season that may never be surpassed.

"He was playing with the best of all time," Bulls coach Scott Skiles said. "I don't know, maybe Michael wouldn't have gotten them without Scottie, either. You could make a case for that, for sure."

Pippen, 39, chosen as one of the NBA's 50 greatest players in 1996 for the league's 50th anniversary, was known for his all-around play — especially his long-armed defense at 6-foot-7 against some of the league's best scorers. The seven-time All-Star directed the Bulls' famed triangle offense with his ball-handling skills.

"Michael was here seven years before they started winning championships," said former Bull Bill Wennington.

"What was the problem? He needed someone who agreed that you needed to go up the court and work your backside off to get it done. And Scottie was that guy who came in and said, 'Yeah I will do that and you know what? If I'm the second man, that's OK.'"

After 11 years with the Bulls, Pippen left after the 1999 lockout and played one year in Houston and four more in Portland.

Looking for some leadership, the Bulls brought Pippen back last season to work with their young team. But he had knee surgery in December and played in only 23 games as the Bulls went 23-59.

It was the first time in his career Pippen missed

Earnhardt punished for profanity

By Mike Harris
Associated Press

A slip of the tongue on TV cost Dale Earnhardt, Jr. first place and $10,000, penalties imposed by an increasingly image-conscious NASCAR.

Earnhardt was docked 25 points Tuesday in the Nextel Cup standings for using vulgarity in an NBC interview after his victory at Talladega Superspeedway, dropping him to second place with seven races left in the season. He will appeal the point penalty.

Earnhardt still gets credit for the 14th victory of his career Sunday, and he has plenty of time to make up the deficit on new leader Kurt Busch, with up to 190 points available at each race.

Nonetheless, the punishment was criticized by Earnhardt's team as being too harsh, and it served as another example of how NASCAR is trying to shed its image as a sport that traces its roots to Good Ol' Boys running moonshine through the hills of Georgia and the Carolinas.

"The popularity of this sport is based on colorful personalities and the fact that everyone can relate to these drivers and their emotions," said Richie Gilmore, director of competition for Dale Earnhardt, Inc. "Now it seems like that's a detriment."

Enjoying tremendous growth in mainstream popularity lately, the racing league landed a $2.8 billion television contract with NBC and Fox that began in 2001. Also, this season switched the sponsorship of its top division

Minutemen use scoring duo

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Sometimes it takes a few snags in the road before a team begins to understand its offense. Junior captain Oral Bullen and sophomore Rob Charest have figured out this problem and are helping the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team turn a preseason weakness into a midseason strength.

Going into the 2004 campaign, the Minutemen were looking at one of the finest defensive units in the Atlantic 10. UMass shut out Notre Dame, who was then ranked No. 9 in the country, in a preseason exhibition and came storming into the season with a defense peaking and an offense looking for some answers.

Then, once the Minutemen gave up 13 goals in their first five games, it was uncertain where the team's strength would lie. It was then that Charest and Bullen showed that they were ready to bear the brunt of the offensive load.

"They have done very well," UMass head coach Sam Koch said. "Now that we're in conference, every goal means that much more. I think they are doing a good job with that responsibility."

Part of Charest's job has apparently been winning games for the Minutemen. So far Charest has netted two game-winning goals for UMass, one against Hartford on September 14th, and another against the Wildcats of New Hampshire on September 22nd.

Charest, who is typically a quiet player, has been a spark plug for the Minutemen this year and is currently tied with Bullen for most goals on the team with five.

"He's so quiet the other team doesn't know where he is, and he sneaks behind them," Koch said jokingly. "He has a very good eye for the goal. He sees situations, he sees what's there, and he's been able to capitalize on it."

It seems odd that a player that only

Sophomore wing Rob Charest darts by a New Hampshire defender on September 22 at Rudd Field. Charest would score the eventual golden goal in overtime. The goal was his second game winner of the season, with is first coming against BU.

Kasparek keeps on top of game

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Staff

Kasparek Heating Up

It was a quiet opening of the 2004 season for returning A-10 Player of the Year Melanie Kasparek. Through her first seven games, the junior midfielder produced just one goal and one assist. However, much to the delight of Rhode Island coach Lisa Cole and much to the chagrin of many coaches around the A-10, Kasparek caught fire this weekend. On Oct. 1, Kasparek torched Temple for three goals, en route to a 5-0 win over Temple. Incidentally, it was Kasparek's twin sister Megan who provided the other two goals for the Rhody win. Then, on Oct. 3, Kasparek picked up right where she left off against Temple as she got the Rams on the board just six minutes into the game against St. Joe's. Rhody would go on to win the game 2-1 in OT. This weekend put her season totals up to seven goals and two assists. Currently Kasparek ranks third in the league for goals and sixth in overall points with 16.

A-10 Notebook

St. Bonaventure Struggling

After opening the season at 7-2, St. Bonaventure has fallen on tough times, dropping their last three contests. Even more damaging is that the three losses were against A-10 foes, so the Bonnies have found themselves in the cellar of the conference. The problems for St. Bonaventure appear to be two-fold. Goals seem to be at a premium as the Bonnies have produced just two in their last three games. In their first nine contests they averaged more than three goals per game. The defense has also been suspect as of late. Opponents have scored four goals in each of the last three games against a

Sox route Anaheim

By John Nadel
Associated Press

ANAHEIM, Calif. — Curt Schilling and the Boston Red Sox got the jump on Anaheim in the AL playoffs. Perhaps that's how the Angels prefer it.

Schilling pitched 6 2-3 effective innings, Manny Ramirez and Kevin Millar homered during a seven-run burst, and the Red Sox beat the Angels 9-3 Tuesday in Game 1.

Pedro Martinez will pitch against Anaheim's Bartolo Colon in Game 2 on Wednesday night before the best-of-five series moves to Boston.

Red Sox	9
Angels	3

Two years ago the Angels lost the openers to the Yankees. Twins and Giants before bouncing back to win all three series en route to the championship.

Just like the 2002 postseason, most of the fans at Angel Stadium wore red and made it noisy by hanging ThunderStix. The volume level decreased significantly after the Red Sox's big fourth inning gave them an 8-0 lead, and not even stuffed Rally Monkeys could spur the Angels.

The seven runs were the most ever scored by the Red Sox in an inning in the postseason and the most ever allowed by the Angels. Five of the runs were unearned because of a throwing error by third baseman Chone Figgins.

An eight-run lead was more than enough for Schilling, who entered with a 5-1 record and a 1.06 ERA in 11 previous postseason appearances.

He wasn't at his best, allowing nine hits and three runs, two earned, while walking two and striking out four. But that was good enough.

Schilling, who allowed at least one baserunner in every inning, was relieved by Alan Embree with a runner at second, two outs in the seventh and the Red Sox leading 8-3. Embree retired pinch hitter Adam Riggs on foul popup to end the inning.

Boston went ahead for good off Jarrod Washburn in the first on a two-out double by Ramirez and a broken-bat single by David Ortiz.

Ortiz walked to begin the fourth and Millar hit an 0-1 offspeed pitch into the left-field bullpen, making it 3-0. The Red Sox then loaded the bases with one out, and two runs scored when Figgins fielded Johnny Damon's grounder but was far off target with his throw home as he went for the force.

Scot Shields relieved and struck out Mark Bellhorn, but Ramirez capped the inning with a three-run homer over the left-center field fence.

Troy Glaus, MVP of the 2002 World Series, hit Schilling's second pitch in the bottom half for a long home run.

Darin Erstad added a solo homer in the seventh, and the Angels got another run on Schilling's throwing error and an RBI double by Glaus. Schilling grabbed at his right ankle after watching his throw to first bounce down the right-field line, and stayed in for one more batter.

Many in the crowd began waving Rally Monkeys during the seventh. They were all over the place during the Angels' postseason run two years ago.

The Red Sox got a run back in the eighth on Doug Mientkiewicz's two-out bunt single off Ramon Ortiz.

Slow-footed Bengie Molina lined a single with two outs and a runner at first in the Angels' sixth. Right fielder Gabe Kapler threw to first, with the ball sailing over first baseman Millar's head. The play prompted laughter in the Boston dugout and would have been close had the throw been accurate.

Red Sox Johnny Damon watches his 7th inning homer against the New York Yankees at Fenway Park in Boston on September 24.

BC on top of preseason poll

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

In 20 full years of Hockey East competition, one thing is unequivocally true about the Northeast's premier college hockey league: there are very few surprises to start the season.

Despite the fact that it didn't make it to the conference final last year, Boston College once again found itself atop the league's preseason coaches' poll. The Eagles, who were the unanimous pick to win the league title last year at this time, received five first-place votes, two more than second-place Maine, and four more than third-place Boston University, which finished the 2003-04 regular season with just enough points to edge Northeastern for the last playoff spot.

Hockey East Notebook

More than anything, the No. 1 league ranking speaks to the Eagles' consistently top-shelf offense, which averaged 3.67 goals per game last year, the best in the league. There's no arguing that BC is one of the top teams in the nation, at least on paper, so it's justifiable that the Eagles would once again be the team to beat in the preseason poll. Rounding out the rankings, New Hampshire was picked fourth, a testament to the Wildcats' depth despite the considerable losses of all-world goaltender Mike Ayers and Player of the Year Steve Saviano.

Ayers, who established himself as the league's most dependable goalie during a stellar career between the pipes, was a sixth-round NHL draft pick by Chicago in 2000, but opted to join the Charlotte Checkers, the New York Rangers' ECHL affiliate. Saviano stayed in New England, joining the AHL's Lowell Lock

Pierce ready to avenge shaky season

BURLINGTON, Vt. — For Paul Pierce, last year was a low point.

Before the start of his sixth professional season, the Celtics swingman saw his co-star, Antoine Walker, traded to the Dallas Mavericks. Coach Jim O'Brien resigned in January, and Pierce seemed to lose interest as the team limped to a 36-win season under interim coach John Carroll and was swept from the first round of the playoffs by the Indiana Pacers.

Pierce averaged 23 points, his lowest since 1999-2000. His 40 percent field goal percentage and 30 percent shooting from behind the three-point arc were both career lows.

The Celtics began training camp Tuesday at the University of Vermont with the expectation that if the team is going to turn things around, Pierce must do better. With a new coach and a new supporting cast, he may now have the tools to do so.

"You can't leave everything on Paul," said point guard Gary Payton, perhaps the biggest offseason acquisition for the Celtics after Coach Glenn "Doc" Rivers.

"He's been trying to do it for years here," Payton said. "He needs some help and needs to be able to go out and play basketball instead of trying to dictate what everyone else does. He needs a veteran like me to take some pressure off, and that's what's going to happen."

Despite his struggles, Pierce ranked fifth in the league in points last season. But without Walker to shoulder some of the load, he seemed impatient at times and often rushed his shots.

Rivers thinks the team has been molded in a way that can help Pierce to succeed this season.

"Gary has the ability to get Paul the ball in the spot he should get it. And I think with Jiri (Welch) and Ricky (Davis) back, and Paul more comfortable with them I don't think Paul will feel the need to force shots now," Rivers said.

Pierce's sees the new season as a chance to start over. Despite being a veteran on a team that includes five players with a year or less of NBA experience, he sees the tools to succeed and seems at comfort with the situation.

"I look at this camp as something refreshing for me," he said. "It's like a new start I feel. You got a whole new staff, a whole new system, a whole new set of players, it's almost like starting over, but I'm already seven years in."

Playing with veterans like Pierce and Payton should help rookies Tony Allen, Al Jefferson, and Delonte West adjust to NBA life. Add in veterans Mark Blount, Davis, Raef LaFrenz, Walter McCarty and Welsh, and Rivers has something to work with.

ALEX SAGE/COLLEGIAN

Hundreds of UMass students swarm the Student Union during a rally for racial diversity held by ALANA and concerned students yesterday. Speakers included faculty and staff, as well as students.

By Brian Duffey

Several hundred people gathered outside of the Student Union yesterday at noon to rally against racial inequalities and injustices on the University of Massachusetts campus.

"It was a great turnout with great student support," said Student Government Association President Eduardo Bustamante. The crowd continued to grow as the event progressed, including students, faculty, and members of the Amherst community.

"We're here for the development of diversity that does not exist on this campus," said junior Nicole Thompson. Thompson, who is a member of ALANA and Take Back UMass, said that issues of race affect everyone on campus.

The rally's first speaker, Aziaro Elizarov, urged the crowd to "break the silence." In reference to the University's handling of the infamous "KKK-9" photos showing members of the SGA posing behind a drawing of a student leader dressed as the Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan.

"University inaction towards the students who committed this inexplicable act of hatred is indicative of this administration's lack of interest in fostering diversity," said Elizarov. A graduate student of Mexican, Russian, and Armenian descent, Elizarov asked for the immediate expulsion of the student leaders shown in the photos.

Speaker Jacqui Pinn encouraged the crowd to vote and demand moral and ethical leadership.

Andres Gomez, a member of Take Back UMass demanded "less blah, blah, blah and more cha cha cha." The crowd laughed and cheered in response.

Gomez and other members of Take Back UMass have begun a judicial process to have the student leaders involved in the photographs expelled. Gomez pointed out that neither Chancellor John Lombardi, nor Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Mike Gargano were in attendance at the rally.

"Lombardi doesn't care," said Professor John Brayce of the Afro-American Studies department. Brayce held up a blank piece of paper and said it symbolized Lombardi's stance on diver-

Students divided on ballot questions

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students are currently in the midst of student government elections, which were held yesterday and will continue to be held today.

Polling times and locations are as follows: 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. at Hampshire, Worcester and Franklin Dinning Commons and the Campus Center. 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. at the Berkshire, Worcester and Franklin Dinning Commons and the Campus Center.

Students who live in Orchard Hill or Central residential areas may vote at the Franklin Dinning Hall. Northeast and Sylvan residents may vote at the Worcester Dinning Hall. Southwest-North residents may vote at the Hampshire Dinning Hall. Southwest-South residents may vote at the Berkshire Dinning Hall. Off-campus students may vote at the Campus Center. Those students who cannot vote in their respective polling location may vote at the location of their choice by filling out an absentee ballot at that location.

In wake of the recent scandal involving Student Government Association members posing in photographs taken at the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy office, voting attendance has not been any higher than usual, according to several people manning the polling stations.

"I was at the Worcester D.C. at 11:45 this morning," said Bibi Khadija, an undeclared sophomore who is working the polling stations. "When I walked in, there were a lot of people standing and voting."

The number of people voting around 5 p.m. in the Campus Center was relatively moderate as well. One by one, students steadily showed up to vote.

Maxine Dube, who is running to represent Central in the SGA Senate, spoke on several issues surrounding this election including the proposed student run textbook rental service.

"The administration and university's goal is to make revenue either way. If it's student-run then obviously that component would be gone," Dube said.

"I think it's a great idea. I don't think anyone's losing money, especially if it's student run," she said.

Sophomore Peter Joseph agreed that the textbook rental system is a good idea.

"You have to be for it. Anything that will let kids spend less than $300 a semester is a good thing," Joseph said.

Mac Chevrette, a freshman student also said she liked the idea.

"I think it's awesome because I paid $600 for textbooks and now that I took the shrink wrap off I can't return some of them," Chevrette said.

Former Attorney General to visit UMass community

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Former U.S. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach will speak at the University of Massachusetts this evening as part of a semester-long commemoration the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark decision in 1954 that banned segregation in public schools. The event takes place at 7:30 p.m. in Mahar.

Katzenbach's topic will be "Brown and the Civil Rights Movement: A View from Washington." His is the second part of the Feinberg Family Distinguished Lecture Series presented by the History Department. The series is made possible by Kenneth Feinberg, his family, and friends, who have established a Distinguished Visiting Professorship in History to broaden awareness of the past and its importance to the present and future.

"You can learn from history — we don't often do it, but if you have some understanding of what happened and why it happened it may affect your actions today," Katzenbach said. "We still have an awful lot of social segregation in our society today. It's better today, but there are still too few whites that have black friends and too few blacks that have white friends."

First serving as Deputy Attorney General under Robert F. Kennedy, Katzenbach directed the Justice Department's field operations in the struggle to desegregate the University of Mississippi in 1962 and the University of Alabama in 1963.

"The study of history can enlighten people about contemporary events," said Gerald W. McFarland, professor of history and director of undergraduate studies. "Certainly race in America is still a significant public topic and since this happens to be the 50th anniversary of the Supreme Court desegregation case, it seemed timely to review where we have come in 50 years."

McFarland said the department is delighted to have Mr. Katzenbach visit the university since he was a distinguished eyewitness in an inside position during the 1960s.

Influential in the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Katzenbach drafted the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and helped to see it through Congress.

After being named acting Attorney General when Kennedy left that post to run for president, Katzenbach became Attorney General in 1965 and served in that capacity until a dispute with J. Edgar Hoover over the FBI's unauthorized wiretaps of Martin Luther King, Jr. and others led him to resign.

President John-son then named him Under Secretary of State. In 1968 he returned to private practice in Princeton, N.J.

According to Katzenbach, it is important to understand what happened in our country during those years since racism is still an issue that remains unsolved.

"It has mostly gone underground today," Katzenbach said. "It used to be very overt, particularly in the South. There was a good deal of violence and many people were hurt in the process. We've made progress, but 50 years is a long time and I'm sorry we haven't made more progress."

Officials say Iran is moving closer to nuclear enrichment

By Ali Akbar Dareini
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran said Wednesday it has processed several tons of raw "yellowcake" uranium to prepare it for enrichment — a key step in developing atomic weapons — in defiance of the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency.

Converting raw uranium into hexafluoride gas does not violate any agreements Iran has made regarding its nuclear program and was done with the full knowledge of the International Atomic Energy Agency. However, it draws Iran and the United States — which quickly voiced its disapproval — closer to a showdown before the U.N. Security Council.

The IAEA board of governors specifically demanded last month that Iran stop all enrichment-related activities, and cited the plans to convert raw uranium into hexafluoride gas as particularly alarming. Iran has refused to back down, and its parliament is studying a bill that would require the government to proceed with the enrichment process over any objections.

Hossein Mousavian, Iran's chief delegate to the IAEA, would not specify how much hexafluoride gas had been produced, but he told The Associated Press in an interview that a few tons of raw uranium — also known as yellowcake — had been converted.

The conversion process yields nearly the same amount of gas, meaning a few tons would have been produced.

"We have used part of the raw uranium we had. A few tons of yellowcake has been converted," Mousavian told the AP.

"We are not in a hurry to do it," he added. "The amount we've produced is [for] an experimental process, not industrial production."

It also is less than what experts estimate would be required to make a single bomb — something Iran insists it has no intention of doing.

A diplomat close to the agency told the AP in Vienna that although the conversion does not contradict Iran's obligations, it will be viewed by some countries as a provocation.

In the United States, the White House quickly disapproved, with spokesman Scott McClellan again accusing Iran of pursuing nuclear weapons and saying it must give up the quest.

Wind turbine dismantled for future display in Smithsonian

ANDY ROBERTS/DAILY HAMPSHIRE REPORTER/COLLEGIAN

The original wind turbine stands behind Orchard Hill residential area earlier this fall, left. Right, the wind turbine is shown proped on its side after being deconstructed yesterday morning.

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Correspondent

The historic wind turbine behind Orchard Hill on the University of Massachusetts campus was dismantled at 8 a.m. yesterday by the engineering group that originally constructed it — the UMass Mafia.

The wind turbine, which stands 60 feet tall and has a four-to-five meter blade length, will be going to the Smithsonian Museum in Washington, D.C. as part of a renewable energy display in the next three years. It is currently being stored in the Astronomy Research Facility on campus.

Members of the UMass Mafia and Deerfield Valley contractors began disassembly of the wind turbine at approximately 8 a.m. The contractors, who couldn't use blowtorches because of the wooden roofing nearby, had to grind down triangular-metal pieces.

The pieces had been used as a ladder, but were in the way of the clamp that needed to be placed directly beneath the cell of the turbine. Once the clamp was in place, the contractors brought in a large crane and workers undid the three steel suspension cords. Around midday, the entire 7,000 pound wind turbine was lifted out of its ball-and-socket joint and gently lowered onto a wooden crate, where the blades were removed.

Once the blades were removed, members of Environmental Safety and Health came in to clean the wind turbine of bird waste, which is considered toxic.

According to Woody Stoddard, Mafia member and distinguished graduate, the wind turbine and the Mafia first came into existence due to UMass civil engineering professor Bill Heronemus. Heronemus predicted the energy crisis of the 1970s in the 1960s, and decided he would attempt to build one of the first working wind turbines in the United States.

He recruited a group of eight UMass students to begin research and design for wind energy in 1971. They later became the original members of the self-proclaimed UMass Mafia.

According to Stoddard, the Mafia currently includes hundreds of graduates. "We're like spies, only we're highly respected," Stoddard joked.

The members are respected because at the time of their recruitment, there was little previous wind turbine research, Stoddard said. The most recent research at the time was done in England and Germany and dated from the 1930s.

The students' creativity is apparent in the design of the turbine.

"They used a differential [gear] from an old truck or something like that as part of the drivetrain," said Tony Ellis, a graduate research fellow for the UMass Department of Renewable Energy Research and current Mafia member. "The pitching mechanism with sprockets looks like it came out of a bike shop," he said. "But essentially it was made and designed by the students here."

Students also took design ideas from classes and past experience. The cell of the wind turbine is shaped like a submarine, because at the time Mafia member Louis Manfredi was

Four arrested for breaking into cars in Lot 22

TuesdaySeptember 26

4:49 a.m. Outside of McNamara dormitory a party reported three subjects tearing the letters off the front side of the building. The officer could not locate subjects.

8:28 a.m. A caller stated that a parked vehicle has rear window smashed out in lot 63. The officer attempted to locate vehicle's owner.

11:11 a.m. A caller stated that student lost their saxophone with an approximate value is $2800. An incident report was taken.

12:53 p.m. A caller stated the doors look to have broken into in South College. Party notified doors were damaged by AFD due to an earlier fire alarm.

WednesdaySeptember29

7:59 p.m. A caller stated that subject broke into a room and stayed the night in Middlesex House. An officer investigated but no subject was found.

ThursdaySeptember30

1:26 a.m. Subjects found checking door handles of vehicles, looking into vehicle windows and attempted to smash windshield of one vehicle in lot 22. Four arrests were made:

Shawn David Stebbins of Granby was charged with destruction of property exceeding $250.

Luke Peter Harvey of Granby was charged with destruction of property exceeding $250.

Angel Gomez of Granby was charged with destruction of property exceeding $250.

Stephen Dick Henry of Newport, Mich. is charged with carrying a firearm on school grounds and destruction of property exceeding $250.

FridayOctober1

11:54 p.m. Officers investigated a pedestrian hit by a vehicle on University Drive. An ambulance transported the subjects to the hospital. Photos and statements were taken from witnesses, and a summons will be issued for assault and battery and disorderly conduct.

SaturdayOctober2

6:27 a.m. A caller stated that there was a light pole down with wires exposed on Campus Center Way but there was no vehicle in the area.

11:54 a.m. A caller stated that their vehicle was broken into in lot 32 and riding equipment was stolen. Approximate value $480.

2:57 p.m. A caller stated that their sunroof was shattered and scratches were on the hood of the vehicle in lot 13. An incident report was taken.

SundayOctober3

12:47 a.m. An officer stated that a subject was having a large party in the Southwest Mall and partiers were urinating off the balcony. The subjects told the officer that it would not happen again.

8:02 p.m. A caller stated that their vehicle was broken into in lot 22 and stereo equipment was stolen valued at $500. An incident report was taken.

11:42 p.m. A caller reported students throwing firecrackers out the windows of McNamara dormitory. Police are working with Housing Services to locate the room with the fireworks.

Turbine blades' shape designed after helicopter taking a course on submarine design. The blades of the turbine resemble those found on helicopters, as Stoddard had previously worked in the air force as a helicopter designer.

The turbine was largely successfully once completed. It was first used in a research project to generate "AC," or alternating current, which was used to heat a 3,000 gallon tank of water in the basement, Ellis said. Stoddard said that the hot water was used to heat the building.

The members of the Mafia also found a way to use the turbine to run an electricity meter backwards, effectively creating a live-discount for wind power. The invention could have created a large incentive to use wind energy in addition to fossil energy, but according to Stoddard, the utility companies didn't approve the idea.

Once the energy crisis began, the UMass Renewable Energy Research Department received a lot of attention from surrounding schools.

"I think the biggest result is that today, the UMass engineering graduates are of the highest demand in the recruiting force, ever," said Stoddard.

Stoddard also said that everyone who has been a part of the UMass Mafia currently has highly respected jobs dealing with wind energy or other types of renewable energy.

According to Stoddard, the UMass Mafia is better known in Europe. "They're so much more positive about wind power," he said. Stoddard, who wrote a textbook on wind power in 1987, said the book did very well in Europe but not in the United States.

"If you go over to Europe and they find out you're from UMass, they all start asking questions about different wind-turbine related problems," he said.

The disassembly project was financed by alumni and the Electrical Engineering Department.

Brennan says he will not resign as Associate Speaker

Students' and candidates' opinions differed when asked about the proposed bill that would reduce the number of credits required for graduation from 60 to 48.

"I agree with it," said Dube. "I'm a biology major and I'm also in Commonwealth College. There are requirements for the University, Commonwealth College and my major and they don't necessarily overlap ... This system could keep a better balance of people graduating within four years."

Jont Fredette, a junior Biology major agreed.

"I'm very in favor of that ... I already have a hard enough time studying for four classes as it is," Fredette said.

"I don't like that idea very much. I currently take six classes a semester and that's not unmanageable," said Brian Benoit, a junior Mechanical Engineering major.

Robin Drew, a sophomore S.O.M. major explained she does not like the idea either.

"If you don't know what your major is going to be, you can take a wide variety of classes to help you decide," Drew said.

Associate Speaker Seamus Brennan and SCERA member and SGA nominee Michael Sheridan, both of whom were pictured in the controversial SGA photos, were handing out campaign fliers in front of Berkshire Dining Commons last night.

Brennan said he will become Speaker and said he has no intention to resign from his position.

Sheridan said he is "most definitely" not resigning.

"It was a vicious attack by the cowards who did that," said Sheridan, referring to the unidentified person who released the photos to an anonymous ALANA (African Latino Asian/Pacific Islander and Native American) Caucus member.

Georgia Kelly, a sophomore Senate candidate for Southwest-South said Brennan's decision not to resign should be left up to him.

"I think it's Seamus' choice. I think he'll do the right thing if he is honest with himself," Kelly said, adding that she has known him for a year and said he is "a good kid."

Kelly thinks the consequences of the photos on the campus community have been unfortunate. She said that any racial tensions on campus make for a sad situation.

"I think it's unfortunate that it has to be prevalent all of the sudden. It's sad," she said. "I worked with them last year and the pictures just came as a shock."

U.S. says Iran must stop quest for nuclear weapons

"The international community is speaking very clearly to Iran: If they continue in the direction they are going we will have to look at what additional action may need to be taken, including looking to the U.N. Security Council," he said.

Last month, the IAEA's board of governors unanimously passed a resolution demanding for the first time that Iran freeze all work on uranium enrichment, including conversion. The board suggested Iran could ultimately face U.N. sanctions if it defied the demands.

Mousavian, who also heads the Foreign Policy Committee at Iran's Supreme National Security Council, said the IAEA "knows of every milligram of uranium converted."

In Vienna, IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming agreed the process was "being done fully under IAEA's watch," but said she could not immediately confirm how far the Iranians had gotten.

"Inspectors are visiting that facility and we have other verification tools that are providing us with constant information about the operation of that facility," Fleming said.

Uranium hexafluoride gas is the material that, in the next stage, is fed into centrifuges used to enrich uranium. Uranium enriched to a low level is used to produce nuclear fuel to generate electricity and enriched further can be used to manufacture atomic bombs.

Iran said last month that it had started converting about 40 tons of raw uranium being mined for enrichment, but Wednesday's remarks were the first confirmation Iran had gone beyond creating precursors to the gas.

Thus far, Iran has said it is honoring a pledge not to put uranium hexafluoride gas into centrifuges, spin it and make enriched uranium. That, however, could change soon.

In Iran, the nuclear program is a matter of national pride — an area where the conservative parliament and reformist government of President Mohammad Khatami agree. Legislation being drafted by conservative lawmakers to force the government to resume uranium enrichment ultimately is expected to be approved.

Mousavian said, however, that Iran is ready to guarantee that its nuclear program will not be diverted to military use and to take steps to eliminate concerns.

"IAEA is the responsible body for nonproliferation. Iran is prepared to consider any IAEA proposal to take specific measures that its nuclear program will not be diverted toward weapons in the future. The specific measures should be defined by the IAEA," he said.

sity, or lack there of. He described the University's pamphlets and flyers as "dishonest."

He said that these advertisements exaggerate the number of non-white students on campus, saying that it is possible to walk through campus and not see a single minority student.

"You can't be educated in an all-white racist institution and expect to succeed in the 21st Century," Brayce said. He said he fears that UMass is fast approaching the homogeny of the University of New Hampshire and the University of Vermont.

"An injustice anywhere is an injustice everywhere," she said

"I'm proud of this moment," Bustamante said to the crowd. "Anything we get as students is what we stand up for. We're not going to be given anything."

He urged the crowd to act as grown-ups, discontinue reliance on their parents, and march towards Whitmore as adult members of the University of Massachusetts. "I am hopeful that things are going to change around here," Bustamante finished.

"Be disrespectful, because they disrespect us," doctoral student Anthony Ratcliff, advised the noisy and motivated crowd that began their procession towards Whitmore.

He said he supports the removal of Charles Dimare, an on-campus attorney, whom Ratcliff says has defended the student leaders.

The crowd chanted, "Hey ho, hey ho, racism has got to go," in solidarity as they marched toward the headquarters of the UMass administration. "I'm really happy with the turnout, it's a very diverse crowd," said Ratcliff.

Without hesitation, the crowd went through the front doors of Whitmore and up the stairs towards the Chancellor's offices on the third floor. Once on the third floor, the hundreds of protesters began to chant for the dismissal of Mike Gargano. Neither Gargano, nor Lombardi emerged to speak with the crowd. The crowd circled the third floor, loudly voicing their intentions.

Following the rally, Bustamante said, "they expressed their feelings, it's the purest form of the student voice." The demonstration was organized by ALANA and other UMass students.

Flu vaccine message delay is harmful

With the weather getting colder and more students staying inside in close quarters, the increase of sickness is becoming a more serious threat. As winter approaches, the flu is vastly becoming the biggest concern among people throughout the nation. However, the amount of flu vaccines that will be available to Americans this season has been decreased by half, making the illness that much larger of a danger.

According to the New York Times, the British government has suspended the manufacturing license of American-owned Chiron Corporation's factory in Liverpool. The reason for the three-month suspension is because an issue of contamination was raised. The bacteria that was uncovered, known as serratia, was first found back in August and is "not normally harmful to humans but can cause problems." The fact that this was first realized in August and is being brought to our nation's attention now, with the flu season fast approaching, is not acceptable and threatens to place the nation in a very dangerous situation.

As a direct consequence of the late notice given to American government officials of the contamination problems, it now puts America in a very difficult situation of having to scramble at the last minute to find other companies who would be able to ship flu vaccines to the United States. Unfortunately, this is a very difficult thing to be doing so last minute because flu vaccines have to be grown and take a very long time to produce.

The factory in Liverpool whose license was suspended produces 90 percent of the flu vaccines shipped to the United States. Reason being, the Liverpool factory is the only factory approved by the Food and Drug Administration. This not only puts great strain on America, but it also puts a lot of pressure on all other companies who produce the flu vaccine, having to quickly try and satisfy those suppliers who were let down by Chiron.

Dr. William Schaffner, a member of the National Vaccine Advisory Committee, stated "Everybody who's involved with Chiron vaccine wishes we had been told three weeks ago, a month ago, that you may have to change your plan, because we could have been working on it," according to the New York Times. With a product that is so important to the health and well being of so many people around the world, Chiron should have notified its clients of the problem with the vaccines as early as possible. Having waited until now doesn't just hinder their business, but more importantly, may prove detrimental to American citizens who may not have a flu vaccine accessible when they need it this season.

Fortunately, on a college campus, influenza is not a major cause for concern. Because of the ages of most college students, their immune systems are considerably stronger than those of geriatrics or infants. However, healthy college students do not make up the majority of the United States population, and, in recent years, a lack of flu vaccines has been a cause for many deaths throughout the country. Consequently, such an illness cannot be taken lightly and, sadly, the officials who were responsible for delaying the announcement of the contaminated vaccines will not be the ones feeling the harmful effects.

Other issues worth examining

Debbie Friedman

When you look at George W. Bush, what to do you see? I see a guy in over his head, uncomfortable with his responsibilities and longing for more vacation time at the ranch. However, his campaign wants you to see a tough Texas cowboy who doesn't take no for an answer. I guess everyone is just supposed to forget his northeastern background. He's the only cowboy I know who went to Yale.

Then there is John Kerry. He's a mundane, old wealthy man who doesn't stand out from the crowd, at least until the first debate. He won the support of many solely because he is not Bush, but is not by any means the ideal candidate for the democrats. His campaign has him roll up his sleeves to appeal more to the working class, and there are even rumors that he got Botox to make himself appear younger.

All the image control going on in the campaigns got me thinking about how ridiculous it is that so much emphasis is put on the superficial aspects of this race. Unfortunately, this reality stems from the public because in every aspect of our culture we expect perfect looking people and judge based on relatively insignificant ideals. However, why does the same standard apply in the political realm?

In this day and age, each candidate has their own website with their platforms laid out for anyone to see. If you want to see their stance on anything or read any speech or bill they ever said or passed, you can pretty much do that.

Unfortunately, this useful information at our fingertips is often overlooked and overshadowed by the most shallow of reasons. There are many people who honestly are going to vote on Nov. 2 based on whom they would like to have a beer with or who throws a baseball better. Or even whom they find more attractive. That really scares me.

Don't get me wrong, I would love to sit down and have a beer with George. Who wouldn't? He's amusing even without the beer. Kerry, on the other hand, would definitely need a beer to ever be remotely fun and even then, I know I would hear way too many war stories. But to even factor that in to whom you want to run this country is ridiculous!

Perhaps I am not seeing how vital these aspects of the candidates are to running the country. Maybe the fact that John Kerry can snowboard is more important than his stance on the war. And who cares that Bush can barely construct a sentence without his speechwriters because he can throw a baseball better than Kerry!

Don't get me wrong, I would love to sit down and have a beer with George. Who wouldn't? He's amusing even without the beer. Kerry, on the other hand, would definitely need a beer to ever be remotely fun and even then, I know I would hear way too many war stories. But to even factor that in to whom you want to run this country is ridiculous!

The president of this country is supposed to be exceptional. Exceptionally smart, exceptionally good at communicating and most of all, an exceptional leader. It doesn't matter how good they can throw out the first pitch. If that were what mattered, then Derek Jeter, I mean, Pedro Martinez, would be running for president. And it doesn't matter how much fun they are to drink with because if that were the case, the crazy guy down the hall from me would be running. We all have to remember that the president is not supposed to be your best bud or the average guy. If the Bush campaign wants to argue that G.W. is an average guy, fine. But in my opinion, that is not a good thing.

The President of the United States is the highest office in the world, and if that isn't reason enough to expect someone exceptional, then I don't know what is.

Cheney picks up slack

Matthew Burke

After watching President George W. Bush fumble over his words at the hands of a veteran debater like John Kerry in Miami, I was pleased to see his message finally delivered clearly on Tuesday night at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland. The slick slogans and hollow promises that the Kerry camp has blindfolded Americans with was finally exposed to all. However, I was surprised the bearer of that message was the sometimes-enigmatic Vice-President Dick Cheney.

Despite not being a fan of Mr. Cheney, I thought he was clear, focused, amiable, unafraid of accusations (Halliburton) and honestly forthcoming with answers as he soundly defeated Senator John Edwards (D- North Carolina) in an increasingly important V.P. showdown.

Past Vice Presidential debates have not meant nearly as much, but with Kerry and Bush virtually deadlocked in the polls, it appeared going into the debate that if Edwards won, tied or even angered the easily flustered Cheney, then the momentum would swing in favor of John Kerry and the Democratic Party. There would be two fronts in this war of words: foreign and domestic issues (both won by Cheney).

Cheney set the tone and answered Edwards as if there was no one in the room and he had not been scripted. He appeared more human than ever and spoke from the heart. He demanded that Kerry and Edwards honor the sacrifices of the coalition, which Cheney said, "includes all the Iraqi soldiers, policemen, and civilians that have been killed." Their numbers are "about 50 percent of the casualties." Cheney insisted that the Iraqis want freedom and are willing to fight for it.

Cheney picked apart Kerry and Edwards' "global test" foreign policy, and their willingness to increase U.S. troop strength instead of demanding that the Iraqi's quickly take over the job. It hurt Edwards's argument that Kerry was strong, when Cheney quoted Kerry in his bid for Congress many years ago, saying, "We need U.N. approval to deploy troops."

Cheney also briefly touched on the fact that Prime Minister Allawi will not want to work with a U.S. President that has such a horrid record of support and then a subsequent lack thereof. The Kerry camp has called Allawi a puppet.

When Edwards accused the current President of going into Iraq to divert attention from Bin Laden and Afghanistan, Cheney rebounded by stating the facts about Saddam's regime and Kerry's campaign record of taking up many different positions.

Edwards seemed confused and weak in the face of Cheney's domestic rebuttals, using recycled campaign rhetoric instead of attacking current policy and speaking from the soul.

"We know Saddam was a sponsor of terror and not al Qaeda linked," Cheney said. "If I had it to recommend all over again, I would recommend exactly the same course of action."

Hussein had in fact "paid the families of suicide bombers in Palestine," "allowed training camps on Iraqi soil (like Al-Zarqawi's)," used chemical weapons on Iran and fellow Iraqi's, tortured their own, etc.

When asked to comment on Bin Laden, Cheney replied, "We'll get him." This seemed to leave Edwards with no wind left in his sails.

Edwards continued to make outrageous claims on Kerry's behalf further losing the domestic battle. He stated that they would only roll back the tax cuts of everybody who makes over $200,000 per year, implying that we could cut the deficit in half by doing so and pay for universal health coverage. This doesn't add up.

Cheney argued that 900,000 small businesses would be affected by rolling back the cuts due, in part, because they file under their own personal taxes to avoid paying the corporate rates and that seven out of 10 new jobs come from these small businesses. The economy would be weaker, not stronger.

Cheney showed a sentimental side I was not aware of when talking about supporting his lesbian daughter Mary. He went on to say that the administration understands the working class problems as he was the first in his family to graduate college, that he had formerly been a card carrying member of a labor union, that he had been laid off and that he had also been hospitalized with no health insurance. Edwards seemed confused and weak in the face of Cheney's domestic rebuttals, using recycled campaign rhetoric instead of attacking current policy and speaking from the soul.

When Cheney attacked, he caught Edwards, saying that his brief Senate career was not distinguished, and that he was a perennial no-show at votes and meetings.

The most shocking and striking thing about Edwards was his negativity. This is typical of the John Kerry campaign right now. It's all they have to run on. He said he had once lived in the "bright light that was America," and now that was "flickering." He said that both he and John Kerry see it, but Bush and Cheney don't. I guess with that point they are finally right. I don't feel it "flickering," and I'm glad our president doesn't either. I live in the best nation in the world, by far. I'm proud to be an American. I'm optimistic about the future of this country, a future that will get stronger with the reelection of President George W. Bush. Thanks Cheney, for giving the little guy a boost.

Red Sox Nation paradox

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

I would like to speak briefly about something that is equally as sacred to me as it probably is to most of my readers. The Boston Red Sox have occupied a disproportionate amount of my consciousness since April, and from many Aprils past. This summer saw me watching every single Sox game with my best friend — all day long obsessing over every play, any statement made by player or personnel in the organization. We were, in effect, emulating the ridiculous talk radio analysts on WEEI that we listened to every day at work.

I spent the last year studying abroad in Brussels, Belgium and you can bet your old Jim Rice jersey that I kept track of my beloved Sox in spite of the distance. Once the playoffs started I found an American bar whose owner was a Red Sox fan with a special military TV package that allowed him to pick up American sports networks overseas. After a bit of persuasion and promises of bringing in late-night business, he agreed to let me come and watch the games even though most of them did not start until 2 a.m. over there. On the infamous night of Game 7 of the ALCS, I stayed with my friends at the bar until six in the morning, only to drag my sagging head to the second day of my internship an hour later. Every Sox fan has a story, right?

...Red Sox fanaticism has often been likened to religious fundamentalism with its submissive devotion, super-natural belief system, and meticulous pre-game routines and prayers.

Like all of my compatriots in Red Sox Nation, I yearn for the promised night of jubilee that the glorious World Series trophy glistens under the Fenway Park lights for all of New England to see. Despite my mid-summer attempts to quell any naïve hope this time around, the streaking Sox have cast a 34-12 record since August 16 and reeled me back in hook, line and sinker. I now have that special tingling in my toes from a year ago that our long-awaited night of glory will soon be upon us. The next couple of weeks should take us for a wild ride and this time we shall emerge victorious!

Ironically, I fear that such a long-awaited conquest, far from augmenting the spirit of The Nation, would actually cause much of the fan base to rapidly erode. I speak no heresy. Please do not accuse me of treason. Think about it for a minute.

As we all know, the Red Sox have the best and most profoundly dedicated fans in all of baseball. Brought together largely by geography, our bond has been forged in pine tar and leather over 86 years of disappointment, the eventual naming of our curse and an intense and ultimately losing rivalry with our archnemesis to the south. Seeking to capitalize upon this brotherhood, new Sox owner Larry Lucchino came out and aptly referred to the Yankees as the Evil Empire, thereby increasing the strength of the Red Sox community and our individual identities as members of the Red Sox Nation. Indeed, Red Sox fanaticism has often been likened to religious fundamentalism with its submissive devotion, supernatural belief system, and meticulous pre-game routines and prayers.

Yet Red Sox Nation, regardless of the depth of its roots, is founded almost entirely upon a cult of masochism. Like it or not, the principal reason for such fervent rallying around our hometown heroes is their persistent inability to deliver us the ultimate pride that a fan can boast. With each passing year that finds Boston without a championship, with each abnormal occurrence that defeats us at the brink of success, our longing increases and the cycle of injustice deepens.

We are in solidarity because we suffer together. We feel a closer proximity to our players than most fans because they have suffered with us, even if they are not the same players as before. Consciously or not, this suffering is our rallying point and has been for some time now. So many times we have together been redeemed for our false hope and now our determination together grows to finally be delivered to the Promised Land. Or so we think.

As a cult of masochism, Red Sox Nation requires suffering to sustain itself. Our adversary surpassed, the world title gained, the raison d'être of our beloved fraternity would be undermined. Our fanaticism would be reduced to mere admiration of our players and lukewarm satisfaction at having achieved a long-awaited goal. Does that sound like Sox fans to you? The baseball gods willing, with nothing left to look forward to and no further chance of suffering, most of the fun of being a Sox fan would dissipate and the fire of our movement be pacified.

I still long for the Red Sox to win it all this year. They seem to have a pretty good shot, and only the St. Louis Cardinals really scare me. Yet I can envision a future in which the nostalgia for our current era of drought is immense and no abundance of World Series titles will be able to offset the longing for something greater.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

TEXTBOOK RENTAL SYSTEM FLAWED

UMass may start a new textbook rental system in the near future. Their deal with eFollet, the current textbook provider, is coming to an end.

Contrary to what The Collegian says, this is a move in the wrong direction. The main issue isn't being addressed. eFollet operates the textbook annex and receives $6 million a year through it, and pays the UMass administration more than $800,000 per year. eFollet is in the business to screw the students. They sell high and buy low — to and from the students. You pay $130 for a Calculus book, and at the end of the semester, they offer you $30 in cash for it. Next semester, they sell it used for $110 to another UMass student. That student may sell it back for $30, and eFollett gets to resell it again. What a nice business.

The problem? The middleman.

Administration plans to tack on an extra $100 to $150 to the bill so students can rent books. Since the books will be passing through many hands, they will be worn down and the quality will be worse. Students also will have less freedom with the books, and if any are lost, or if you're the unlucky one that rented it right before the bind fell out, guess what — you have to replace it.

If you're retaking classes, the fee still stands. That means if you're taking the same classes this semester as last semester, then you would have paid $200 to $300 to rent the same books. Students often retake classes, so in reality, they would be better off owning their books instead of paying a rental fee, in which ownership goes to the school, but liability is still with the student.

The books will need to be constantly updated as new editions come out. Yes, the four pages that changed from last semester's Calculus book requires a brand new 18th edition so you have to cough up more money.

One side effect of the rental system may be university pressure on professors to stay with dated books to save money and increase the books' lifespan. However, if not properly implemented, UMass students may suffer by not being taught on up-to-date books.

The rental system does not remove the middleman – it replaces one evil with another, and a fee on top of that. That $800,000 that UMass received for the last several years from eFollet needs to be replaced somehow. The rental system only benefits UMass administration. 15,000 on-campus students paying $100 each is $1.5 million a semester; at $150 each that is $2.25 million a semester. So, with two semesters in a year, it's $3 million to $4.5 million a year. That's an increase of 375 percent to 563 percent in revenue. Not bad.

Sure, books cost money, but UMass will buy in bulk and save money. They will probably buy some of the books used (who would know the difference?). Do you really think the savings will transfer to you?

RED SOX NATION

I pledge allegiance to the fans, of the entire Red Sox Nation, and to the Fenway faithful, in all the stands. One team, under Terry, unbeatable, with offense, and pitching bound by the blood of the nation, the Red Sox Nation. Yes, all of these men understand the perennial drama that is the Boston Red Sox.

No, really, this is the year

In 1914 a young prospect by the name of George Herman Ruth signed with the Boston Red Sox. In the next three years, Ruth acted as one of Boston's sole pitchers. He earned a 67-34 record, and an amazing 415 strikeouts with three saves and a 2.07 ERA in 121 appearances. Ruth shined as a batter as well. He hit .298 with nine home runs. The next year, Ruth brought his team to the Chicago, where he won two games as a pitcher, and led the Red Sox to a World Series championship.

In a decision that would affect the stigma of Beantown Baseball forever, after Ruth posted career numbers in 1919, Sox owner Harry Frazee sold Ruth for $125,000 in cash and a $300,000 loan. Rather then using this money for more talent, Frazee used this money to open a failure of a stage production called "No, No, Nanette."

Now, this story would be irrelevant if the Red Sox would have had success during the post-Ruth era, or any era post-Ruth for that matter, but this is simply not the case. In truth, some may say that due to the "Curse of the Bambino," the Sox have had much success since the trade, but never again have they experienced the triumph of a World Series Championship.

Since the notorious trade of Babe Ruth, Sox fans have experienced one dissatisfaction after another. Bucky Dent, Bill Buckner, and every other tragic Buck you can think of has stood in the way of that glorius moment. The kind of moment that will make up for the almosts like Teddy Ballgame, Yaz, Rice and of course 1986. That instant that will help us to forget about the promises that came with the Jose Canseco and the Mo Vaughns. Just one series ring, and maybe I will take Grady Little's picture off my dartboard.

With all of these heartbreaks that a true diehard has experienced, it is no wonder the amount of emotion that spirals from these games. For it is no longer merely just a competition. For the Red Sox it is do or die.

Last year's close call, and this season's late-season surge has sparked a boom in Red Sox trinkets. If you walk to the game, on Brookline Street, just past the Cask 'N' Flagon, you will notice many new unofficial Red Sox memorabilia. Just past the drunks, further down from the street musicians, but before the sausage and $6 waters, there has been a revival of enthusiastic street vendors. There are now such rare items like key chains with a caricature of a little boy urinating on a Yankees logo, or bobble head dolls in the likeness of ex-manager Little.

There is also a market of materials very obviously aimed at the traditional Red Sox fans. A group of South Boston kids have taken it upon themselves to be all entrepreneurial like and make some slogans of their own to splash on T-shirts, mugs, and even maybe a hand-stitched pillow for grandma.

"A-Rod is an A-hole," adorned a t-shirt being sold outside the game, while others said things like "take your 26 rings and shove 'em up your ass" and "Shank a Yank."

Bitter? We're not bitter, we're just glee challenged.

In all reality the thing is, each year is a different battle. As time goes by, we as Red Sox fans have found every excuse to believe that Babe Ruth is haunting us, that Yankees are evil and that next year is the year. With all of the heartbreak, drama, and resentment, you have to ask yourself one thing: would you prefer it any other way?

Fittingly, Go Sox, and Yankees ... well, suck!

Ladies get into Red Sox style

likeness for Red Sox clothes.

This goes in many ways for women, too. What better way to cover up a horrible hairday (or sneak back to you own place after a long night,) than in a baseball cap from your favorite team? Women have become just as fond of these pieces of clothing as their male counterparts, and just as important to the sports paraphenelia market; so much so that the makers of these items have started to pay attention, and decided to indulge the female sports fan.

Just take a trip to your local department store in the sportswear section, and you will find Boston's beloved Sox logos in colors such as pretty pink and baby blue. You will also find Red Sox baby tees and jerseys designed to fit women. Female sports fans have spoken out, and retailers have responded.

"The Red Sox women's apparel became really popular last year, once they started doing well in the season," said Gavin Hazard-Johnson, University of Massachsetts student, and summer intern for Filene's department store. "There was a pretty high demand, and not a lot of competition, so Filene's did pretty well with it."

The stores to push the merchandise calculated even the marketing scheme. The women's apparel can be found in the men's sportswear section of most stores. "This way when women shop for their husbands, and boyfriends they will see Red Sox clothing for themselves as well."

For the summer months, items include, baby tees, hats, and tank tops, and for the fall sweat shirts and long sleeved tees have hit the floor.

The response has been so good, that stores such as Filene's have decided to bring in women's apparel for NFL teams. "For the football season, Filene's will be bringing in women's apparel for all NFL teams in the New England region," some of these teams include The Pittsburgh Steelers, The New England Patriots, and the Buffalo Bills.

"I think it's about time that they came up with this idea," Elize Davis said. "Guys aren't the only ones who are fans of sports, and they aren't the only ones who love sports, and they aren't the only ones who want wear their teams favorite logos, I'm just glad now I don't have to shop in kids section anymore for it."

Legend passes away at age 82

By David Germain
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Rodney Dangerfield, the bug-eyed comic whose self-deprecating one-liners brought him stardom in clubs, television and movies and made his lament "I don't get no respect" a catchphrase, died Tuesday. He was 82.

Dangerfield, who fell into a coma after undergoing heart surgery, died at 1:20 p.m., said publicist Kevin Sasaki. Dangerfield had a heart valve replaced Aug. 25 at the University of California, Los Angeles, Medical Center.

Sasaki said in a statement that Dangerfield suffered a small stroke after the operation and developed infectious and abdominal complications. But in the past week he had emerged from the coma, the publicist said.

"When Rodney emerged, he kissed me, squeezed my hand and smiled for his doctors," Dangerfield's wife, Joan, said in the statement. The comic is also survived by two children from a previous marriage.

As a comic, Dangerfield — clad in a black suit, red tie and white shirt with collar that seemed too tight — convulsed audiences with lines such as: "When I was born, I was so ugly that the doctor slapped my mother;" "When I started in show business, I played one club that was so far out my act was reviewed in Field and Stream;" and "Every time I get in an elevator, the operator says the same thing to me: 'Basement?'"

In a 1986 interview, he explained the origin of his "respect" trademark: "I had this joke: 'I played hide and seek; they wouldn't even look for me.' To make it work better, you look for something to put in front of it: I was so poor, I was so dumb, so this, so that. I thought, 'Now what fits that joke?' Well, 'No one liked me' was all right. But then I thought, a more profound thing would be, 'I get no respect.'"

He tried it at a New York club, and the joke drew a bigger response than ever. He kept the phrase in the act, and it seemed to establish a bond with his audience. After hearing him perform years later, Jack Benny remarked: "Me, I get laughs because I'm cheap and 39. Your image goes into the soul of everyone."

Flowers were placed on his star on Hollywood Boulevard after word of his death, and the marquee of The Improv, a comedy club where Dangerfield often performed, read "Rest In Peace Rodney."

"When you saw Rodney on 'The Tonight Show' sitting on the couch with Johnny Carson, you didn't want it to go to commercial," comic Bernie Mac said in a statement. "He always left you wanting more and I'm going to miss him."

Dangerfield had a strange career in show business. At 19 he started as a standup comedian. He made only a fair living, traveling a great deal and appearing in rundown joints. Married at 27, he decided he couldn't support a family on his meager earnings.

He returned to comedy at 42 and began to attract notice. He appeared on the Ed Sullivan show seven times and on "The Tonight Show" with Johnny Carson more than 70 times.

After his first major film role in "Caddyshack," he began starring in his own movies.

He was born Jacob Cohen on Nov. 22, 1921, on New York's Long Island. Growing up in the borough of Queens, his mother was uncaring and his father was absent.

As Philip Roy, the father and his brother toured in vaudeville as a pantomime comedy-juggling act, Roy and Arthur. Young Jacob's parents divorced, and the mother struggled to support her daughter and son.

The boy helped bring in money by selling ice cream at the beach and working for a grocery store. "I found myself going to school with kids and then in the afternoon I'd be delivering groceries to their back door," he recalled. "I ended up feeling inferior to everybody."

Red Sox break in to entertainment others, are yet again looking to give the Red Sox Nation their long-awaited happy ending and bring home a World Series victory.

The joy, pain, triumph, fear, anger and assorted other emotions a Red Sox fan feels on any given game day is in many ways similar to the emotions elicited by some of Hollywood's biggest blockbusters, and they are catching on.

The Red Sox, who were recently the focus of the locally revered documentary "We Still Believe: The Boston Red Sox Movie," have slowly began to seep into the entertainment industry. Take for example "Fever Pitch," the forth-coming Red Sox centered comedy from the Farrelly Brothers. Known as lifelong fans of the Sox, the brothers' flick stars "Saturday Night Live" veteran Jimmy Fallon and starlett Drew Barrymore. "Fever Pitch" seems to be a film all devoted Red Sox fans will be able to relate to, the pull between the people we love and the team we worship. Fenway itself gets a starring role in the movie, which is still in shooting.

Not to be left behind, the literary sect of the entertainment world has contracted a case of Red Sox fever as well. "Screwball," a fiction novel by author David Ferrell, capitalizes on the agony and exctasy of the team's history. Though the story — a tale of mysterious murders following the team and their wunderkind player Ron Kane in a race to the playoffs — is rooted in fantasy, the feel of Fenway is present in the pages.

If a society's entertainment is any indication of how much they value a certain aspect of their culture, the Red Sox phenomenon is surely a sign that the major leagues' eternal underdog has gained a presence in the mainstream mindframe. The magic of the Sox has started to spread beyond the Charles, past the limits of New England and created one true Red Sox Nation.

Live Von Bondies show lacks energy

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — In today's celebrity saturated world, tabloid gossip will always outdo actual artistry when it comes to giving a person of any public renown an identifier. It's why we, as readers, eat up scandal-mongering rags like the National Enquirer and Star Magazine in order to get our fix of daily celeb salaciousness. It's enough pointless tittle-tattle to make any celebrity's head spin.

Jason Stollsteimer is one man who has become very acquainted with the idea of being the target of that tawdry rumor mill. He's the unassuming, floppy-haired lead singer of a little Detroit indie rock band called the Von Bondies, and it's doubtful that he ever expected to find himself in the pages of music magazines everywhere for an event that had nothing to do with the music (but everything to do with long-standing music rivalries.)

See, Stollsteimer was once friends with Jack White, one half of an even more famous Detroit rock duo named the White Stripes, but Stollsteimer and White have not been friends for a long time, and one fateful night earlier this year the two wound up in a light at a club, where White ended up beating on Stollsteimer. White wound up in court; the Von Bondie in the tabs.

The incident did work to give the Bondies a bigger profile then they previously had, a convenience considering that they were just about to release their major label debut on Sire, "Pawn Shoppe Heart."

But the Detroit fight came to overcome the music, so what is a burgeoning rock band to do? Go on tour and try to prove it's all about the music, man.

If only the performance had a little more juice than it did. The Von Bondies took their brand of old school Rock 'n Roll through Massachusetts Thursday, stopping at the Pearl Street Nightclub to help make up for a dreary, rainy night by rocking out. But they were overshadowed by their opening acts, never a good sign, and though they performed solidly in was an otherwise uninspired and lifeless set.

COURTESY VON BONDIES.COM

Detroit rockers the Von Bondies played a mediocre show in Northampton on Thursday. Melissa Auf Der Mar, below, and her band also played a set.

It hardly helped matters that the Bondies seemed to have only token interest in their audience. The band played most of the set without referencing the audience between songs; instead they just hopped from one song to the next, only occasionally (especially at the end) stopping to converse with fans. Their new bassist did play right in the audience during one song, but it was too little, too late.

The set lived and died solely on the strength of the songs (including "C'Mon C'Mon" the MTV-approved first single off "Pawn Shoppe Heart") rather than the actual live playing. It was a competent and proffesional set at best, but one lacking in urgency or danger.

The Peels, coming to us straight from San Francisco, opened the show at 8:30. They played for what was, unfortuantely, a sparse crowd, and one almost pathologically unable to do more than cerebrally appreciate their show. The band's lead singer Robyn looks like Michelle Branch channelling Karen O, with the singer writhing and dancing on stage to the beat of the music. The band's music similarly sounds like a more refined version of what the Yeah Yeah Yeahs accomplish — a little less chaotic, a little less jagged, but with the same playful spirit. Alas, a bad sound mix sent Robyn's voice scurrying under the instruments. One could barely make out Robyn over the guitars, bass and drum, effectively muting an otherwise strong set.

It was a problem encountered during Auf Der Mar's set too. The band is lead by Melissa Auf Der Mar, a veteran alt-rocker who rose to prominence as bassist for such seminal early '90s acts as Hole and the Smashing Pumpkins. Now that those bands have long since dissolved, Auf Der Maur decided to become frontwoman for her own band, playing metallic, Gothic stoner rock that comes to us straight out of 1995.

And it was a good set, but it would have been better had the audience been able to hear Ms. Auf Der Mar sing. Her girlish vocals were swamped by the loud, gnarly music throughout the course of the night; the songs were practically turned into instrumentals. Auf Der Mar — the woman, not the group — made up for it using her accessiblity. She chatted to the audience during and after the set and even stayed with the audience to watch the Bondies play. Despite her years in the business and her obvious exhaustion (the band was touring for nine months) she was down to earth and cool. You know, the kind of person that the tabloids wouldn't be interested in.

Sports in brief

ATLANTA (AP) — Baltimore Ravens running back Jamal Lewis has agreed to plead guilty in his federal drug conspiracy case, an aide to the presiding judge said.

Lewis is scheduled to enter his plea Thursday in federal court in Atlanta, said Vicki Hanna, the courtroom deputy for U.S. District Judge Orinda D. Evans.

Hanna would not release details about Lewis' plea, including what charge he will admit to.

A source familiar with the plea negotiations told The Associated Press this past weekend that lawyers for Lewis have been negotiating a deal that would allow him to serve jail time in the offseason.

MIAMI (AP) — Ricky Williams wants to rejoin the Dolphins and has asked the NFL how soon he can return, his agent said.

It's unclear whether the 2002 NFL rushing champion must serve a suspension the rest of this season for repeated violations of the league drug program. He has asked the league for a hearing to clarify his status, but no date has been set.

A Dolphins source speaking on condition of anonymity said the team's understanding is that Williams can't play this year because of the violations.

Sheffield said he applied the cream on his surgically repaired right knee in 2002. He was not told it contained an illegal steroid, the magazine said.

Under baseball's labor deal, players with major league contracts were each tested once for steroids this season. A provision allows more frequent testing if a joint management-labor panel of physicians finds "reasonable cause."

Sheffield also told ESPN he used another steroid called "the clear" for two months, the network reported. He said it was to aid his recovery from workouts and that he stopped using it because it wasn't helping.

AUTO RACING

CONCORD, N.C. (AP) — John Andretti and ppc Racing, one of the top teams in NASCAR's Busch Series, will get together on a Nextel Cup team that will begin racing Oct. 16 at Lowe's Motor Speedway.

Andretti will run five of the last six events of the season, excluding Martinsville, Va., and the entire 36-race schedule in 2005, the team announced.

The ppc team, owned by Greg Pollex, won the Busch Series championship in 2000 with Jeff Green and also has four runner-up finishes. The Nextel Cup team will be sponsored by Victory Brand LLC, Sunoco, APlus convenience stores and Ford.

Victory Brand is the second cigarette company to sponsor a car full time in NASCAR. The R.J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. Camel brand was the sponsor of a car entered in the 1990s by Travis Carter.

TENNIS

LYON, France (AP) — Top-seeded Nicolas Massu was ousted by Agustin Calleri of Argentina 6-3, 6-4 in the upset-filled first round of the Lyon Open.

Calleri rose to 21-14 this year, while double Olympic gold medalist Massu fell to 36-24.

Third-seeded Juan Carlos Ferrero and No. 7 Vince Spadea also won, but other seeded players fared poorly. No. 5 Tommy Robredo and eighth-seeded Mario Ancic made early exits.

FILDERSTADT, Germany (AP) — Vera Zvonareva's bid to join four of her Russian compatriots in the top 10 of the WTA Tour rankings was slowed at the Porsche Grand Prix when she double faulted 13 times in a loss to Elena Likhovtseva.

Likhovtseva upset the sixth-seeded Zvonareva 6-3, 7-5 to advance to the second round of the $650,000 event, which features five of the world's top six players.

Zvonareva, ranked 11th, is trying to join countrywomen such as French Open champion Anastasia Myskina, Wimbledon champ Maria Sharapova and U.S. champion Svetlana Kuznetsova in the top 10.

Mary Pierce also advanced to the second round with a 6-2, 6-3 win against Paola Suarez of Argentina, while Slovakia's Daniela Hantuchova struggled past American Lilia Osterloh 3-6, 6-2, 6-1. Colombia's Fabiola Zuluaga and Nathalie Dechy of France also won.

SOCCER

HERZOGENAUROCH, Germany (AP) — Major League Soccer signed a 10-year deal with Adidas, making the company its official athletic sponsor and licensed supplier.

The announcement was made by Adidas managing director Erich Stamminger to company shareholders. The deal is worth an estimated $150 million.

Williams may return to NFL

By Steven Wine
Associated Press

MIAMI (AP) – Maybe Ricky Williams is tired of traveling. Maybe he has run out of books to read. Or maybe he doesn't want to pay the $8.6 million he owes the Miami Dolphins for breach of contract.

Whatever the reason, Williams wants to rejoin the Dolphins and has asked the NFL how soon he can return, his agent said Tuesday.

It's unclear whether the 2002 NFL rushing champion must serve a suspension the rest of this season for repeated violations of the league drug program. He has asked the league for a hearing to clarify his status, but no date has been set.

A Dolphins source speaking on condition of anonymity said the team's understanding is that Williams can't play this year because of the violations.

Williams left the Dolphins reeling when he retired just before training camp in late July, and they're off to an 0-4 start, their worst since 1966. His agent, Leigh Steinberg, declined to discuss Williams' change of heart.

"All I can tell you is that Ricky has asked me to explore and to try to facilitate his return," Steinberg said. "He's excited and in good shape and misses football."

One likely factor for Williams' reversal: On Sept. 24, an arbitrator ordered him to repay more than $8.6 million to the team for breaching his contract.

Steinberg and the Dolphins declined to say whether there have been recent conversations between the two parties.

"This is an issue between the player, his representative and the league," Dolphins general manager Rick Spielman said. "Accordingly, we don't have a comment on the matter."

Last week, coach Dave Wannstedt said he hadn't talked to Williams in about a month.

NFL spokesman Greg Aiello declined to comment on the situation.

Since retiring, Williams has traveled to Asia and Australia, but Steinberg said he's now in the United States.

"He's in excellent shape," Steinberg said. "He has been working out regularly and looks great."

Williams and the Dolphins traded long-distance barbs in the days after he quit. But the Dolphins' poor start would likely make them more inclined to take him back.

The 27-year-old running back has given many reasons for retiring. He expressed a desire to travel, read and continue smoking marijuana. He said he was unhappy about his contract, a workload he considered excessive and Miami's new offensive coordinator Chris Foerster.

He acknowledged testing positive for marijuana three times. Under league rules, a player in the NFL's drug program faces suspension if he returns in the calendar year after he announces his retirement. If he returns after a year, he faces a lesser suspension.

The Dolphins might be headed toward their first losing season since 1988. They have scored only two touchdowns in four games without Williams, who rushed for 3,225 yards in two seasons after being obtained in a trade with New Orleans.

Big weekend in college football

By Ralph D. Russo
Associated Press

From the Coliseum to Athens, the national championship race will take shape and Heisman Trophy contenders will emerge Saturday.

Six games will match ranked teams with the biggest of the big games being played in California, Texas and Georgia.

No. 1 Southern California faces No. 7 California at the Los Angeles Coliseum; No. 2 Oklahoma and No. 5 Texas meet at the state fairgrounds in Dallas in the Red River Shootout; and No. 3 Georgia hosts No. 17 Tennessee between the hedges at Sanford Stadium in Athens.

"I'm asked if OU is a big game for us, and every game is a must game for us," Texas coach Mack Brown said.

The difference is the Oklahoma game is defining Brown's otherwise stellar career.

His Longhorns have lost four straight to coach Bob Stoops' Sooners in both embarrassing and excruciating fashion. Last season, the Sooners won 65-13 in the most lopsided contest in the 98-game history of the border rivalry.

"There's no number that we might have on Texas in the series," Stoops said. "It's a year-to-year thing."

Heisman Trophy winner Jason White is off to another strong start for Oklahoma, ranking sixth in the nation in passing efficiency with 859 yards and nine touchdowns.

Texas tailback Cedric Benson leads the nation in rushing. He has said that given a choice between one or the other, he'd rather win the Heisman than beat the Sooners. The fact is, he'll probably have to lead the Longhorns past the Sooners to have a chance to win the Heisman.

Georgia also has a four-game winning streak in its series against Tennessee, including the last three under coach Mark Richt, who has turned the Bulldogs into the team to beat in the Southeastern Conference East.

The Volunteers are coming off a 34-10 loss to Auburn, but with a win over Florida already on their record, beating Georgia would put them in control of the SEC East race.

Bulldogs quarterback David Greene looked like Heisman material last week, when he threw five touchdown passes against LSU.

USC-Cal doesn't have the history of Oklahoma-Texas and Georgia-Tennessee, but it is every bit as significant. The Trojans have won 13 straight since losing 34-31 at Cal last season. The loss cost USC an outright national title.

If the Golden Bears can make it two in a row over the Trojans, they'll validate themselves as national title contenders.

"There is a really fun buildup to this game," USC coach Pete Carroll said. "With what happened last year, it adds to it all. It brings more excitement."

While USC quarterback Matt Leinart has received most of the Heisman hype, Cal's Aaron Rodgers is the Pac-10's leading passer, averaging over 300 yards per game.

The James Madison offense also leeds off of its running game. Last week, running backs Maurice Fenner (148 yards) and Alvin Banks (118 yards) combined for 266 yards on the ground in a 31-21 win against Hofstra. It was the second time this season that both backs have rushed for over 100 yards in the same game.

James Madison received a huge blow this week, however, when they learned that Banks suffered a broken left leg in the first half last week. He won't need surgery, but is still expected to be on the shelf for the next three-to-five weeks.

"We'll prepare for (Banks), but they're both good backs," Brown said. "They've got a tandem group, but they don't seem to change their scheme from one back to the other so preparing for one is like preparing for the other."

Fenner, who will get the start against UMass, leads the Atlantic 10 with an average of 110.3 rushing yards per game this season, but Banks is considered the better blocker and receiver.

Quarterback Justin Rascati, who arrived in Harrisonburg from the University of Louisville after also being courted by UMass, has reaped the benefits of his team's solid rushing attack.

"Part of the reason they've been able to have success is that they've been able to generate the run game so people are defending the run, then all of a sudden you're getting beat by the play action," Brown said. "They're doing a nice job of trying to mix it."

Rascati has completed 42-of-63 passes this season for 445 yards and four touchdowns, and his only interception came three games ago in a 62-7 win over Lock Haven. Rascati was 19-of-22 last week for 188 yards, and he completed all eight of his passes in the second half.

"They have a controlled passing game, and they get the ball out there quickly," Brown said. "(They throw) a lot of short passes, and they have been able to be economical that way."

One of the UMass defenders trying to shut down the James Madison offensive attack will be Shannon James, who was just named the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week after recording seven tackles and two interceptions at Boston College last week. The free safety has picked off five total passes this year, and it was the second time in his career that he has been given that Atlantic 10 honor.

"(James) has probably been the most consistent performer we've had on our defense," Brown said. "He was a preseason All-Atlantic 10 pick. I think he has lived up to that billing. He has given us great intangible leadership on the field – not by voice – just by his play."

Massachusetts linebacker Charles Walker has also emerged as a solid contributor. He has recorded 56 tackles and 3.5 sacks through five games this season.

The UMass offense has been led by tailback Steve Baylark who has rushed for 344 yards and three touchdowns.

Quarterback Tim Day has completed 74-of-127 passes for 1,013 yards, eight touchdowns and four interceptions. He also rushed for a touchdown against BC last week. Day's efficiency rating is 139.76.

UMass holds a 6-3-1 record in the all-time series against James Madison including wins in the last four contests dating back to 1998. Only one of those wins was in Harrisonburg.

While the head coach at Northeastern, Brown had beaten the Dukes each of the past four seasons for an all-time 4-0 record against the team.

Beleaguered offense must step up for UMass on Saturday only 12 completions for 114 yards, as only two players caught more than one pass.

In last week's 29-7 setback at Boston College, Day misfired on 18 attempts and managed only 121 yards, while nearly leading the offense to as many three-and-outs (nine), and punts (12), as he had completions (13).

One major reason for Day's recent troubles has been the relative disappearance of wide receiver Iason Peebler. After posting three 100-plus yard receiving games in as many weeks, the all-conference star has caught just six balls in the last two games, with five of those coming last Saturday against the Eagles.

Additionally, after finding the end zone on a 50-yard screen pass against Richmond, Peebler has been kept off the scoreboard for consecutive weeks and hasn't shown the same explosiveness that previously prompted Delaware coach K.C. Keeler to admit that he changed his defenses to account for the senior captain's whereabouts.

One major reason for that may be the troublesome chronic hamstring problems that have plagued Peebler since he first hurt his leg in a 24-14 win over William & Mary almost a year ago, but it also likely has a lot to do with team's shifting their looks and coverages on defense to keep UMass' elite playmaker at bay.

This is something that Brown believes JMU coach Mickey Matthews will employ this weekend.

"[The Dukes] are going to account for him at all times," Brown said. "They don't want to get beat, and they know he's capable of it. They're going to do what a lot of teams have done against us, and make sure that their coverages keep him in front of them and try to direct the ball in other directions."

With that in mind, it is not just Peebler who must step up in giving Day options with the football. After a breakout season in 2003 that entrenched him as the team's No. 2 receiver this season, Dominique Stewart has struggled to get the ball this season. After catching four passes against the Spiders, the senior was held without a reception against Delaware and managed just one catch against BC, giving him eight total on the season without a touchdown.

Redshirt freshman J.J. Moore has also experienced a similar drop-off in production. After making an early splash with a touchdown against Delaware State, Moore managed only 24 and 20 yards receiving against Richmond and Delaware, respectively, and was held without a catch against BC.

While the group's lack of production has opened the door for solid early play from sophomore Brandon London, there is clearly an urgent need to shape up as a unit. With James Madison playing its best football in years, the Minutemen will certainly be tested on the road, in front of a sellout crowd on Family Weekend in Harrisonburg.

However with Matthews using a 4-4 defense designed to stop the run, the opportunity for Day and the offense to turn things around and lead the Minutemen to a win is there for the taking. All that's left is to go out and make it happen.

"We just need to get out there and play our kind of football," Brown said. "We know what we're capable of, and we know what we need to do. We've had a good week of practice, and the guys have really been getting after it. We just need to make sure that translates into a solid effort and a good performance on Saturday."

MATTHEW REISWIG/COLLEGIAN

Quarterback Tim Day has led a struggling UMass offense to just four touchdowns over the last three games, all of which were losses.

Cross country to compete in New England Championship out of his way to help the newer runners, and we felt that it was time to expand the team to tri-captains," O'Brien said.

Tri-captain Matt Clark is in agreement.

"We have so many great leaders on the team. We all kind of carry each other during races. We help each other and we can drive better and more forward because we are so close," Clark said.

Clark, a senior, is enthusiastic about the team. "Last year we didn't think we were good, so we didn't do well. The attitude this year is one hundred percent different. We are good and we're only going to get better," Clark said.

"The season is going great, and I couldn't be happier. We are all pretty pumped for Friday, and I'm expecting a really great turnout from all of us," Clark said.

On the women's side, coach Julie Lafreniere is worried about the dynamics of the course.

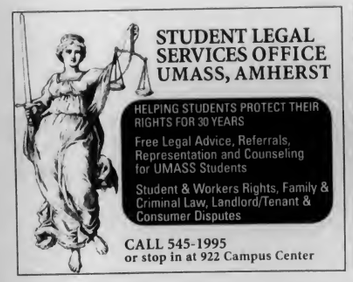
"The course is a little dangerous," Lafreniere said. "It's very crowded in the beginning cause it's narrow. We've had incidents on this course in which runners have fallen and been injured."

The course starts very narrow and goes only 200 meters before taking a sharp turn. Normally courses are about 800 meters before making any abrupt turn. The course opens up eventually however, and becomes easier and less risky. Lafreniere is not too worried about the danger of the course, but she warned new runners that the narrow and fast start is tough.

To prepare for the challenging meet, the team took part in a unique early morning practice last Friday that Lafreniere has made a tradition. After waking at 6 a.m., the team ran a hard three miles up a dirt hill.

"Since the ground is pretty flat at the New England Championships, I figured if they can run like they did up these hills, then the meet on Friday should seem easier," Lafreniere said. Freshman Christina Derosa ran the best time of 21:41 up the steep terrain, and hopes to transfer that success tomorrow.

Derosa has been a force during her rookie campaign and is confident that she and her teammates will do just as well tomorrow.



"We are really excited about this meet, and ready to run hard," Derosa said. "This meet is very important."

Along with Derosa, seniors Amanda Dahlberg and Alexis Anzelone look to make an impact in tomorrow's meet. They have been solid all year and have shown leadership on a primarily young team.

Among other runners, Cuisle Kierans, the No. 2 runner, has had an excellent start during her first year at UMass and looks to continue her strong performance. Tricia Silva and Kara Gillette round up the top six runners for UMass as the sixth and seventh runners.

The team had a bye last weekend and has had plenty of time to prepare for this much-anticipated meet. According to Lafreniere, the practices have been upbeat and focused on the task at hand.

"We have been working on running a hard two miles to prepare us for that fast start that this course has," Lafreniere said. "The girls run relays in groups of two and the really run as hard as they can. The relays make the practices exciting."

Minutemen ready to Duke it out

UMass looks to snap losing streak at JMU

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

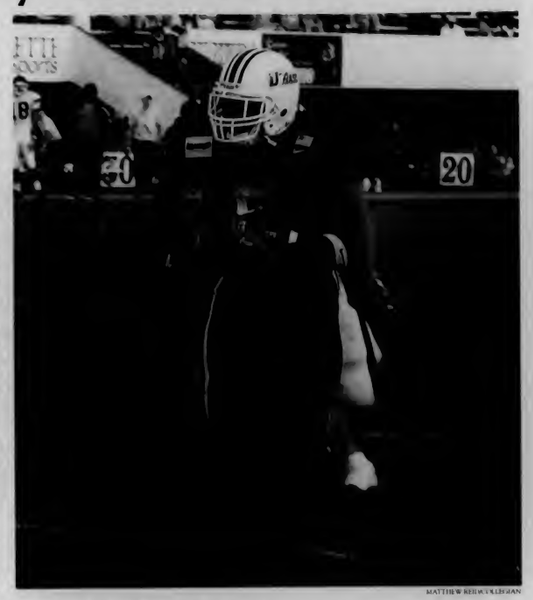
The Massachusetts football team, which is unranked for the first time all season, will be looking to end its three-game skid when it travels to Harrisonburg, Va. to take on No. 19 James Madison on Saturday at Bridgeforth Stadium at 1:30 p.m.

The Minutemen (2-3, 0-2 Atlantic 10) will have their fourth crack at the program's 500th all-time victory, but they will have to beat an overachieving Dukes squad (3-1, 2-0 A-10) to accomplish the milestone.

UMass' struggles have clearly been on the offensive side of the ball, as they have only scored 14 points in their last 11 quarters during the losing streak. This is coming after UMass put up 95 points in its first nine quarters of the season.

This could be a direct correlation with All-American wide receiver Jason Peebler's performance during that stretch. Peebler caught 12 balls for 426 yards and five touchdowns during the team's first nine quarters in 2004. Over the last 11, however, he only has seven receptions for 86 yards and no touchdowns.

UMass coach Don Brown says that opposing defenses are preparing different schemes for Peebler such as a cover-2 on his side of the field.



"(Defenses) are playing a short and a deep defender to protect over the top," Brown said. "They're definitely paying attention to him. We've got to get him the football, but at the same time, there are a number of things we have to [improve] on offense. (The offense) just needs something positive to happen early, and then they'll take off."

The Minutemen have played two very tough defenses in a row as well. Last week, they lost to Division I-A state rival Boston College, a week after losing to defending Division I-AA national champion Delaware.

UMass will have a new challenge this week, as the offense will go up against a Dukes' eight-man defensive front that could create a serious problem for the Minuteman running game. Brown knows he needs to disguise and change his formations to have success against the Dukes' 4-4 defense.

"You just can't let them get camped in there," Brown said. "We're going to have to be a little bit more pro-conscious and look at what we can do throwing the football."

Offense must step up for UM

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

It was widely recognized when Don Brown was hired as coach of the Massachusetts football team that the days of five wide receivers and the throw-it-all-over-the-place-for-four-quarters offense of former coach Mark Whipple was going the way of the dinosaur.

After all, Brown and offensive coordinator Kevin Morris had made names for themselves within the conference utilizing an effective combination of running the football to set up the play-action pass and playing great defense in turning Northeastern into an annual contender.

Their plan was clearly to turn the Minutemen into a power football machine, using wrecking-ball tailbacks Steve Baylark and Rich Demers to run the ball behind a veteran offensive line and preach speed and versatility on defense to keep the opposition on its heels.

When Tim Day was tabbed as the starting quarterback prior to week one, he was essentially the final piece of the puzzle; a mobile quarterback with an accurate arm to manage the offense and get the ball out of his hands and into those of the team's many playmakers.

The plan worked flawlessly at first, as Day set a new school record for passing efficiency in a 51-0 romp over Delaware State and paced the offense in a 30-point output against national runner-up Colgate.

However after three weeks of spotty ball control, a near-anemic passing attack and three consecutive losses, the new UMass offense is quickly moving past the problematic stage and into the realm of a potentially fatal flaw.

In those three losses the Minutemen have scored a total of four touchdowns, and in an Atlantic 10 conference where parity rules, that just isn't going to cut it.

"It's certainly something we need to correct," Brown said. "We haven't been able to establish the run like we've wanted to against some of the physical opponents we've faced in the last few weeks, and that's hurt us in the passing game as well."

This weekend, UMass returns to A-10 action for the remainder of the season, and the need to improve on offense is clearly imminent. For all intents and purposes, UMass must win out if it hopes to make the Division I-AA playoffs – a tall order given the top-to-bottom talent in the league. Yet for a team loaded with playmakers on both sides of the ball, it's hardly a shot in the dark.

So as the Maroon and White gets set to take on a James Madison team ripe with holdovers from the group that surrendered 31 points to Whipple's squad last October, the time for UMass' core group of offensive players to step up has arrived.

"It's time for our guys to go out and make plays," Brown said. "We've had trouble putting points on the board over the last three weeks, and that obviously needs to change.

"We're not going to get by scoring one or two touchdowns a game in this league."

First and foremost, the onus falls on Day to ignite the dormant passing game. With Baylark having established himself as a known commodity carrying the football, it's clearly been the team's lack of consistent passing attack that has slowed No. 5 as teams have loaded up in the box to stop the run.

After throwing for 230 yards and a touchdown in a loss to Richmond three weeks ago, Day has quickly experienced a decline in his effectiveness. The following week against Delaware, the junior managed

Cross country to run in New Englands

By Martha Powers and Eric Athas
Collegian Correspondents

Tomorrow, the Massachusetts men's and women's cross-country teams will compete in the New England Championships held in Boston at Franklin Park. The meet includes over 45 different schools, hundreds of runners and one difficult course. It is also different from other events UMass usually competes in due to the wide spectrum of participants.

"This conference is a little unique in that D-I, D-II, and D-III schools are all in the same championship," men's coach Ken O'Brien said. "It was developed a long time ago to give schools that are near each other, but wouldn't normally compete, the opportunity to race."

The size of the race is also different from what the Maroon and White is used to. "There are just under 50 teams competing, which means that there are about 300 runners. Therefore, the level of competition is huge," O'Brien said.

"Eleven of the schools that will be competing are ranked in the top-20 of their respective national cross-country polls," O'Brien said. Historically, Providence College has been the favorite to take the first-place spot. The last time the Minutemen grabbed the title was in 1987.

Teams from all different conferences, such as the Atlantic 10, Big East, and Ivy League, will be running on Friday. The race encompasses the entire New England region, as schools will travel from all over the Northeast to compete.

"Cross-country is an interesting sport in that the size of the school does not usually matter. It's only the top five runners who score, so small schools are just as successful as the larger ones," O'Brien said.

But O'Brien is excited about the race.

"Franklin Park is a good course for mostly everyone. Even though this meet is a step up for us, the team has responded better than last year, and I anticipate moving up the ladder."

Franklin Park is known to be a relatively easy, flat course, which will be a change from the challenging Massachusetts home course and the course in Syracuse.

"Franklin Park is not a new venue for us. A lot of kids competed on this course in high school, so that will help us ease into conference play," O'Brien said.

"This is the midpoint of the season, and the start of things getting a bit more serious. It is more important to have a better performance in the second half of our season than in the first half," O'Brien said.

It was after the last meet in Syracuse that junior Ryan Corbett was announced as a tri-captain.

"Ryan is great leader and an enthusiastic runner. He has gone

Freshman making an impact

By Eric Athas
Collegian Correspondent

The switch from high school to college can be a struggle for some freshmen, but for Massachusetts women's cross country runner Christina Derosa, it has been a cakewalk.

As a freshman, Derosa doesn't have to worry simply about juggling classes and getting use to the different lifestyle, she also has the pressure of being the number one runner on the No. 15 Massachusetts cross country team.

"The transition has been very good so far," Derosa said. "It's definitely a lot different than high school though."

Derosa has been outstanding during her first year in college, placing first among UMass runners in every meet this year and earning the top position on the team. In her first college meet ever, Derosa placed 21st out of 94 overall runners at the New Hampshire Invitational, where UMass placed seventh as a team.

On Sept. 18, Derosa took first place with a time of 18:12 at the three-mile long UMass Invitational. Her most recent meet was against challenging Syracuse University at the Orange Cross Country Classic, where she placed second overall and first among UMass runners. Despite her success, Derosa continues to make the difficult transition from high school cross country to college.

"Since it's my first year here, I haven't ran any of these courses in a meet before, so I don't know what to expect," Derosa said. "But it also takes away from the pressure, because I don't really know what parts of the course are going to be challenging, so I don't have to worry about it."

The meets are not the only major difference that Derosa has faced so far, as she is also getting use to the different style of practices that coach Julie Lafreniere runs.

"Christina is responding very well to the type of training that we have been doing," Lafreniere said. "We have two hard practices a week in which the girls have to get up early."

Derosa's practices in high school were much shorter when it comes to running, but she has benefited from running longer distances during practice in order to prepare for the meets.

She has also benefited from having a strong team behind her, and veteran leadership from seniors Amanda Dahlberg and Alexis Anzelone.

"In high school it was usually me and another girl that were the top runners on the team," Derosa said.

"It is so much different because everyone on this team are good runners, and the team as a whole is strong."

Academically, Derosa has been managing her time and doing her work during the little time that she isn't running.

She is happy with her class schedule and has been getting plenty of sleep, getting to bed at 9:30 p.m. some nights, especially before those early 6 a.m. practices.

Derosa and her teammates continue the season with the New England Championships tomorrow followed by the Albany Invitational on October 16.

Former A.G. speaks on race

Former United States Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach delivers speech at UMass regarding Brown v. Board of Education.

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Former U.S. Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach visited Mahar Auditorium last night to deliver a lecture examining how far the United States has come over the past 50 years since the landmark Supreme Court case of "Brown v. Board of Education," which banned segregation in public schools.

Katzenbach was introduced to a crowd of over one hundred people by University of Massachusetts alumni Kenneth Feinberg, who referred to the former Attorney General as a "true American hero" that was a participant during the turbulent 1960s. He was a voice who experienced the events of the decade first hand.

Katzenbach started his speech by stating that today, 50 years after racial segregation was made illegal, more students are attending all white or all black schools than was the case in the 1954. During the event, he raised the important questions, "Why should we celebrate the Brown versus Board of Education decision?"

"Was it really the most significant decision in court during the last century as many claim?" Katzenbach asked the crowd. "Or was it largely a failure as a number of African-Americans felt at the time? Or is it possible as I believe, that it was both."

To understand the significance of the Brown case, Katzenbach said it would be necessary to put yourself in the shoes of a 1950s African American.

At a time when blacks were forced to use separate restrooms, drinking fountains, and sometimes even enter restaurants through a different door than whites, it was clear, Katzenbach explained, that the 1896 Supreme Court decision of "Plessy v. Ferguson," a ruling that declared separate but equal facilities for the two races, implied inferiority to blacks.

"There is an obvious irony that almost a century after fighting a bloody war over slavery, [Americans] continued to live in a racially segregated society," Katzenbach said.

Throughout 1940s and 1950s, he said that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) exposed that separate was in fact never equal. They demonstrated the inequality of segregation in public education, which became qualifying grounds for the Supreme Court to look at six different cases involving segregation in public school in five states, as well as the District of Columbia in 1953. Brown v. Board of Education was one of these six cases.

"Once Plessy v. Ferguson was overruled in 1954, the clear majority believed that ramification should be gradual in order to lessen the danger of violence," Katzenbach said. "So [the court] put off any remedy until a third hearing, which led the court to order desegregation with all deliberate speed."

Katzenbach, however, added that some public schools were not about to comply with the ruling. He said that in Little Rock, Ark. students sometimes had to be escorted by the state guards to and from their classes.

Although the court decision did not immediately give equality to blacks, according to Katzenbach it, "opened the door to direct political action."

"Brown created new expectations and thus opened up an entirely new road," he said.

During the years that followed, blacks were participating in sit-ins at lunch counters and department stores, bus boycotts and freedom rides, all following the non-violent philosophy preached by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Unfortunately, as Katzenbach pointed out, this still led to violence on the part of the whites who did not agree with the Civil Rights Movement.

"This was a fascinating time in our country," Katzenbach said. "And in a way it brought out the best of us, as well as the worst in our country."

There were many white students who joined black students in demonstrations in the South, he said, adding that the inspiring March on Washington in 1963 was integrated and met with a peaceful crowd, by a number that exceeded all expectations.

"If we think of Brown in political terms we have accomplished much, it inspired African Americans to insist, with great courage, on the rights to which all of us are entitled. To take political action often involving risk of serious personal injury," Katzenbach said.

"And in final analysis, we owe it to the court to have the courage and unanimity to decide the Brown case."

Campus elections bring out students

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The general consensus on the second and final day of elections at polling areas around the University of Massachusetts was that there was a high voter turnout rate.

A Campus Center voting station attendant said he guessed that around 70 people had voted at his station between 10 a.m. and noon. Station attendants concluded that the turnout was consistent at the Worcester Dinning Hall in the evening as well. Sophomore Bibi Khadija was stationed at the Worcester D.C. and said that there was a constant stream of voters between 5:30 and 6:30 p.m.

Student voters had three issues to vote on. The first was the respective voter's residential area Student Government Association Senate seats. There were a large number of students running for each of the five residential area seats, as well as commuter student seats.

Aimee Ayers is one of 15 candidates running for a Senate seat representing commuter students. She hopes that the recent controversy involving the Student Government Association's involvement in the questionable "KKK-9" photos will get students interested in student government.

"I hope that this whole controversy with the SGA will spark a lot of people to vote and take an interest in student government," Ayers said.

Ayers said she is in favor of a textbook rental system as well.

"I'm in favor of the textbook rental system. I think the costs for books are just ridiculous," she said.

Luis Giovanni, a senior Spanish major agrees.

"It would be good. People don't really use the books for more than a semester or two anyway," Giovanni said.

Christopher Morash, a freshman Mechanical Engineering major said he thinks books are too expensive.

"I like the idea. I spent $600 in textbooks this semester. Most of them are used so I might as well rent them," Morash said.

Ryan Gibbons, a freshman pre-Journalism major agreed that books are too expensive.

"It sounds like [the rental system] would take a lot of financial burden off students," Gibbons said.

Students' opinions on the vote that would change the graduation requirement from 60 credits to 48 credits have been split. A number of students The Collegian has talked to outside polling areas have been both for and against the idea.

"I voted for it," said Christine Bergeron, a junior majoring in History and Communications. She explained that the requirements from Commonwealth College, the honors college, which she is a part of, could be overwhelming when they coincide with those of the University.

"I don't like how there is a separate honors college ... I think it's unfair that people in the honors program have to take more classes to be considered honors students," Bergeron said.

Maxine Dube, a Senate candidate from Central also agreed with the proposal. Her credits situation is similar to Bergeron's.

Bush admits Saddam did not possess any weapons of mass destruction

By Scott Lindlaw
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush and his vice president conceded Thursday in the clearest terms yet that Saddam Hussein had no weapons of mass destruction, even as they tried to shift the Iraq war debate to a new issue – whether the invasion was justified because Saddam was abusing a U.N. oil-for-food program.

Ridiculing the Bush administration's evolving rationale for war, Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry shot back: "You don't make up or lind reasons to go to war after the fact."

Vice President Dick Cheney brushed aside the central findings of chief U.S. weapons hunter Charles Duelfer – that Saddam not only had no weapons of mass destruction and had not made any since 1991, but he had no means of making any either – while Bush unapologetically defended his decision to invade Iraq.

"The Duelfer report showed that Saddam was systematically gaming the system, using the U.N. oil-for-food program to try to influence countries and companies in an effort to undermine sanctions," Bush told reporters as he prepared to fly to campaign events in Wisconsin. "He was doing so with the intent of restarting his weapons program once the world looked away."

Duelfer found no formal plan by Saddam to resume WMD production, but the inspector surmised that Saddam intended to do so if U.N. sanctions were lifted. Bush seized upon that inference, using the word "intent" three times in reference to Saddam's plans to resume making weapons.

Cheney dismissed the significance of Duelfer's central findings, telling a town-hall style meeting of supporters in Miami, "The headlines all say 'no weapons of mass destruction stockpiled in Baghdad.' We already knew that."

The vice president said he found other parts of the report "more intriguing," including its finding that Saddam's main goal was the removal of international sanctions.

"As soon as the sanctions were lifted, he had every intention of going back" to his weapons program, Cheney said.

The report underscored that "delay, defer, wait, wasn't an option," Cheney said. And he told a later forum in Fort Myers, Fla., speaking of the oil-for-food program: "The sanctions regime was coming apart at the seams.

Saddam perverted that whole thing and generated billions of dollars."

Yet Bush and Cheney acknowledged more definitively than before that Saddam did not have the banned weapons that both men had asserted he did – and had cited as the major justification before attacking Iraq in March 2003.

Bush has recently left the question open. For example, when asked in June whether he thought such weapons had existed in Iraq, Bush said he would "wait until Charlie (Duelfer) gets back with the final report."

In July, Bush said, "We have not found stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction," a sentence construction that kept alive the possibility the weapons might yet be discovered.

On Thursday, the president used the clearest language to date nailing the question shut: "Iraq did not have the weapons that our intelligence believed were there," Bush said. His words placed the blame on U.S. intelligence agencies.

Rocket hits parking lot near diplomatic area

By Daniel Cooney
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A rocket slammed into the Afghan capital near the U.S. Embassy and other diplomatic missions early Friday, a day before landmark elections. All U.S. embassy staff were ordered to briefly take cover in an underground bunker.

The rocket hit a parking lot near a media accreditation center for the elections, causing no damage or casualties, said Lt. Commander Ken MacKillop, a spokesman for international peacekeepers.

He said peacekeepers suspected a second rocket may have hit nearby, but no impact site was found.

"We are alert and investigating," he said.

Heavily-armed U.S. and Afghan troops sealed off the roads leading to the diplomatic area.

Beth Lee, a spokeswoman for the U.S. embassy, said all staff had been ordered to take cover in an underground bunker as a precaution. A senior U.S. official in Washington said embassy staff were allowed out of the bunkers a short time later.

The blast shattered a relatively calm lead-up to Saturday's vote, at least in the capital. It was loud enough to shake windows and rouse people from bed.

The headquarters for the 9,000-strong NATO-led International Security Assistance Force is also close to the U.S. Embassy, as are the German and Pakistani missions.

It was the first apparent attack in Kabul since August 28, when a huge car bomb outside a private U.S. security firm killed 10 people - three of them Americans.

The Americans were helping train anti-narcotics police.

Lingerie show fundraiser tonight

By Mike Travis
Collegian Staff

A lingerie show to benefit the University of Massachusetts Everywoman's Center will be held tonight at 7 p.m. at Shear Bliss Day Spa, located at 479 West St. in Amherst.

The event is open to both men and women and is being run by UndercoverWear Inc., a Tewksbury based company specializing in lingerie, sleepwear and bedroom novelty items. The 27-year-old company has been featured in media outlets such as CNN, Playboy and Oprah.

Door prizes and refreshments will be served until 7:30 p.m., followed by a 45-minute-long lingerie show modeled by three UMass Sigma Kappa sorority sisters. People will then be invited to shop for lingerie or book their own parties.

Kimberly Lucas of Amherst, the UnderCover Wear agent who will be hosting the event, has been the company's sole Western Massachusetts salesperson for some 15 years. She said this is the first time in 10 years since the Everywoman's Center has had a fundraiser from an outside source.

"It's one hundred percent supported by UndercoverWear itself to do fundraisers," said Lucas. "They encourage their salespeople because it's a good way to get involved with the community."

A total of 10 percent of the night's total retail sales will go directly to the EveryWoman's Center. If someone signs up to have their own party at the event, Lucas will donate an additional five percent of her sales from that party to the Center.

"Our funds for advertising were limited, so we didn't really advertise," Lucas said. She encourages those interested in attending the show to call (413) 549-2747, as space is limited.

AT&T to make 7,500 job cuts

By Bruce Meyerson
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — AT&T Corp. announced Thursday that it is cutting at least 7,500 more jobs and slashing the value of its assets by $11.4 billion, drastic moves prompted by the company's plan to retreat from the traditional consumer telephone business.

The company now plans to shrink its work force by more than a fifth, or about 12,500 jobs, during 2004 – up from a previous target of about 4,900 jobs. Severance costs and other expenses related to the job cuts will reduce third-quarter earnings by $1.1 billion, the company said.

The asset writedown of $11.4 billion amounts to about a quarter of the company's assets, and reflects the reduced value of AT&T's network now that it will be carrying less consumer voice traffic.

"In response to recent regulatory developments and a highly competitive market, we have made some tough decisions to reduce our work force and cut costs," said AT&T chairman and chief executive Dave Dorman.

While the writedown is an acknowledgment that AT&T wasted billions of dollars upgrading its network and marketing to consumers, the sharply reduced value of the company's assets will mean tremendous savings on paper.

The announcement came after the close of trading. AT&T shares, which had slipped 16 cents to $15.04, rose 2.5 percent in after-hours trading, to $15.42.

Many analysts have speculated that AT&T will make itself a more attractive takeover candidate by cleaning up its books and reducing depreciation expense. Talks to be acquired by former subsidiary BellSouth Corp. collapsed earlier this year.

AT&T, still the nation's biggest long-distance carrier with about 30 million customers, announced in July that it would no longer spend money to sell long distance or local service to consumers. The company is still spending aggressively to sign up homes for its new Internet-based phone service.

The withdrawal from the traditional phone business followed a federal court decision that will make it more expensive for AT&T to sell local service by leasing residential lines from the four regional Bells – who at the same time are luring away AT&T's long-distance customers.

The consumer business, once a cash cow that generated $25 billion a year in long-distance revenue, is expected to bring in less than a third of that amount in 2004. In addition to increased competition, the business has been hit hard by rival technologies such as cell phones and Internet phone service.

Students' opinions differ on certain ballot proposition

Brian Benoit, a junior Mechanical Engineering major said he takes more classes than most students and does not feel that five classes are a difficult amount of work.

"I don't like that idea. I currently take six classes a semester and that's not unmanageable," Benoit said.

Robin Drew, a sophomore S.O.M. major said she thinks taking at least five classes per semester can actually help students.

"You can take a more variety of classes. If you don't know what your major is going to be, you can take a wide variety of classes to help you decide," Drew said.

"Five is good. It's fair," said senior Luis Giovanni.

However, in the midst of the debate over election questions, several students are concerned with bigger problems on campus. Particularly, a few students have mentioned their concern over issues of race in the aftermath of the controversial SGA photos. This was a concern of Masha Khazanovich, a junior Economics major.

"I think we need to abolish racism on this campus, seeing as we have a wonderfully diverse campus. Everyone needs to feel as comfortable as

Bomb kills ten at Baghdad hotel

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Rockets struck a Baghdad hotel housing foreign contractors and journalists late Thursday, drawing return fire and underscoring the precarious security in the heart of the Iraqi capital. Outside Baghdad, roadside bombings killed two more American soldiers.

Early Friday, U.S. aircraft attacked what the U.S. command said was a hideout of terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi in Fallujah. The military said "credible intelligence sources" reported terrorist leaders were meeting there.

A Fallujah doctor said the attack killed 10 people, including a groom on his wedding night, and wounded the bride and 16 others. Residents reported several other strong explosions in the insurgent stronghold through the night.

The latest attacks came as aide to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr offered to disarm his Mahdi Army militia in a move that could bring an end to weeks of fighting in Baghdad's Shiite district Sadr City. The government cautiously welcomed the offer and suggested other militant groups also lay down their arms.

Three Katyusha rockets slammed into the Sheraton hotel, the Interior Ministry said, triggering thunderous explosions, shattering windows and setting off small fires. Dazed guests, including western journalists, contractors and a bride and groom on their wedding night stumbled to safety through the smoke and debris.

"I made a mistake by booking at the Sheraton," said Hayer Abdul Zahra, holding his shivering bride under his arm. "I knew something like this would happen."

There were no deaths or serious injuries, Iraqi officials said.

The hotels, which have been targeted by rockets and mortars before, stand as symbols of continued U.S. and Western dominance in Iraq despite the formal handover of power to an interim Iraqi government June 28.

Egypt blast kills 30

By Ariel Schalit
Associated Press Writer

EILAT, Israel (AP) — An explosion tore through a resort hotel in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula where Israelis were vacationing at the end of a Jewish holiday Thursday night, killing at least 30 people and wounding more than 160, officials said.

Two smaller blasts were reported later at other tourist sites in the Sinai, and witnesses gave reports that car bombs caused all three explosions. Egyptian officials said they had no evidence of terrorism but that it was unlikely the three blasts could be coincidence.

The huge blast collapsed a 10-story wing of the luxury Hilton hotel built by Israel when it controlled Taba from 1967 to 1989. Israeli security officials told The Associated Press they were convinced it was caused by a car bomb.

Israelis described a chaotic scene as the explosion brought the top floors of the hotel crashing into the lobby.

Meir Frajun said his three children were playing one floor below the lobby when the blast tore through the building. He went down but found only two of them.

"Everything was filled with smoke," Frajun told The Associated Press after crossing into the nearby Israeli resort of Eilat. "We were hysterically looking for the child. In the end we found him sitting outside with an Arab guest of the hotel."

Four hours after the blast, Israel's military took command of the scene, according to the army spokeswoman, Brig. Gen. Ruth Yaron, but there were delays in sending Israeli forces and rescue workers across the tense bor'er.

The explosions came a month after the Israeli government urged citizens not to visit Egypt, citing a "concrete" terror threat to tourists in an area. The warning, issued Sept. 9 by the counter terrorism center in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's office, identified the Sinai Peninsula as the target of a potential attack.

The initial blast, about 10 p.m., rocked the Hilton hotel in the Taba resort, only yards from the Israeli border.

"The whole front of the hotel has collapsed. There are dozens of people on the floor, lots of blood," witness Yigal Vakni told Army Radio. "I am standing outside of the hotel, the whole thing is burning and they have nothing to put it out with."

A spokesman for the rescue workers, Yeruchaim Mendola said others were trapped in the debris.

A car rental manager at the Hilton, Mohammed Saleh said he was in the storeroom and couldn't see where the explosion originated but that several people at the hotel claimed it was caused by a car bomb outside the reception area. Some witnesses reported seeing the wreckage of a car.

Just before midnight two smaller blasts struck the area of Ras Shitan, a camping area near the town of Nuweiba south of Taba, witnesses said. Egyptian hospital officials said four people were killed in those explosions, and Israel's Channel 10 TV said two Israelis died.

Ameulem Tarrag, whose uncle and cousin own camps in Ras Shitan, said both told him that Israeli cars exploded outside their camps. The two blasts were only five seconds apart, he said. He said the camps were full of vacationing Israelis.

Man kept alligator, tiger in apartment

By Samuel Maull
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — A man who pleaded guilty to keeping an alligator and a tiger in his apartment while children lived there was sentenced Thursday to five months in jail.

Antoine Yates, who pleaded guilty in July to reckless endangerment, told the judge he never intended to put anyone at risk and that the children were never in danger.

Judge Budd Goodman said he was disturbed by a presentencing report that described Yates, 36, as delusional about having a special gift for handling animals.

Goodman also sentenced Yates to five years probation and told him to get a job and not to keep wild animals.

Prosecutor Jeremy Saland said witnesses' reports and documents indicated Yates also may have kept a leopard and a panther in his home.

"There were even reports of a bear," the prosecutor said. "There's a whole slew of animals, a lineup you would expect to find on the Discovery Channel."

Saland has said that at various times eight children lived in Yates' Harlem apartment with him and his 69-year-old mother between April 2002 and January 2003 while animals were there. Some of the children were relatives and some were foster children.

Saland said it was a miracle none of the children was harmed. Yates' lawyer, Raymond Colon, said his client committed no crime and objected to Saland's listing of animals Yates reportedly kept.

Yates was arrested in October 2003 in Philadelphia, where he went for treatment of a deep bite on his right leg, inflicted by the 400-pound tiger, Ming.

The tiger is being kept at an animal sanctuary in Ohio; the alligator is at a sanctuary in Indiana.

New compassionate majority

Eric Magazu

You see President George Bush on television and immediately your stomach turns. You watch him make his tired and oft-repeated cases for invading Iraq or perhaps for the tax cut for his rich friends. You know that he puts his corporate buddies at Halliburton ahead of regular people.

I decided to take some time to look over President Bush's record, and I am not convinced that these initial reactions are accurate. In fact, President Bush has supported many viewpoints that traditionally have been held by progressives. A thorough review of the Bush policy will show that it rivals President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society. I invite you to take a second look at President Bush, and hopefully you will come to the conclusion that he indeed advances the progressive cause.

In office, he has supported a bill to crack down on chief executives, despite his reputation for having corporate buddies. This was only after the Enron scandal, but the fact is that when the issue actually came to table, he supported the initiative. He even supported the tougher Democratic version over a more corporate-friendly version that came out of the House of Representatives. The law increased penalties for chief executives that make false statements. It also made chief financial officers personally responsible for the financial reports of their companies. The law required corporations to prepare an incredible amount of additional paperwork to document their numbers.

A thorough review of the Bush policy will show that it rivals President Lyndon Johnson's Great Society.

President Bush was able to achieve passage of one of the main planks in his 2000 platform, the "No Child Left Behind Act." President Bush has taken an aggressive stance against poorly performing school systems, and offered a large amount of money to back this up. He has a core conviction that the old policy of "social promotion" should be considered just a, "soft bigotry of low expectations." That phrase refers to those who feel that some children just cannot learn. After some compromise that made the bill even more progressive, President Bush's NCLB Act earned the endorsement of Senator Edward Kennedy.

President Bush has also advocated for large increases for Head Start and early-childhood education. He is providing additional funding for research on how children develop reading and math skills. Instead of calling for the removal of the federal government from education, he has vastly increased federal funding in nearly all areas surrounding education.

On healthcare, he called for the largest overhaul of Medicare since its inception, providing an additional $400 billion to fund a prescription drug benefit for senior citizens. It utilizes private insurance companies to deliver the benefit instead of a costly government bureaucracy, but the fact remains it is a huge entitlement designed to benefit our senior citizens. President Bush pushed this bill through Congress over the objections of many conservatives.

President Bush has also secured additional funding into research on renewable sources of energy. George Bush is committed to the vision of a day in which our economy is not based on fossil fuels; he only differs from other progressives in that he knows that in the meantime our oil-based economy cannot be shut down.

He is also the first president to fund stem-cell research. Contrary to popular opinion, the President has not tried to ban stem-cell research. Private corporations have been investigating this avenue of research for some time now. President Bush recognized the potential of this research, and has set aside federal money for this line of research. He only ran into opposition when he limited the new public funding to areas that are consistent with preserving the dignity of life at all stages. The research has found new momentum thanks to Presidents Bush's support.

Since the party of President Bush has the majority in both the upper and lower houses of Congress, it allows him to have more of a free reign. Republicans are eager to please President Bush and many conservatives roll over and support more generous spending because they want to support the president. Unless the democrats can win outright control of Congress, a democrat in the White House will inevitably lead the conservatives in Congress to stand firm against expansion of most social programs. This is evident from a comparison of the amount of spending between President Clinton's and President Bush's times in office. Do not get me wrong: I am talking about non-military, social spending.

Human rights are an issue important to most progressives, and here as well, President Bush has advocated for the rights of people around the world. Michael Moore makes the argument that President Bush invaded Afghanistan for an oil pipeline project, but even most Democrats support the effort there. In Iraq, there is less support among Democrats, but I am not going to review the arguments for and against going to war. In both Afghanistan and Iraq, the rights of citizens, and most especially women, have been utterly transformed. While there is still violence in both countries, the future is now extremely hopeful for its citizens. Freedom and human rights have expanded worldwide under President Bush.

I know in the past when you saw President Bush on TV, you saw a simple-minded cowboy. Next time he is on television, I ask you to reevaluate your core beliefs, and see if you now agree that President Bush works hard toward solving the problems of today's suffering world. Perhaps you too are a member of the new emerging republican majority; this is President Bush's new compassionate majority.

Halting the draft rumor

Ben Duffy

I know you've heard the rumor. I think I've heard it roughly a thousand times, and I suspect that the average UMass student has as well. It's the sort of rumor that might make even the most apathetic citizen sit up and pay attention.

The rumor is that the draft is coming back. What a scary word that is: draft. And that's exactly why it's being thrown around: to scare people. The news wings of CBS and MTV, both subdivisions of the left-leaning Viacom Corporation, have done stories on the issue. Unfortunately, we can't count on either of these "esteemed" news agencies to tell us the whole truth. We can, however, count on them to propagandize for the Democratic Party.

There's some truth to the rumor. Actually, there's a bill in Congress that's been bogged down in committee for almost two years, called Universal National Service Act of 2003. In fact, it's a degree more severe than a draft, in the sense that there is no lottery system. It requires two years of mandatory military service, for both men and women. There will be alternative service for conscientious objectors, but no deferment for college students. An official summary of its contents is available on the World Wide Web at thomas.loc.gov. It reads as follows:

"It is the obligation of every U.S. citizen, and every other person residing in the United States, between the ages of 18 and 26 to perform a two-year period of national service, unless exempted, either as a member of an active or reserve component of the armed forces or in a civilian capacity that promotes national defense. Requires induction into national service by the President. Sets forth provisions governing: (1) induction deferments, postponements, and exemptions, including exemption of a conscientious objector from military service that includes combatant training; and (2) discharge following national service.

Amends the Military Selective Service Act to authorize the military registration of females."

When it comes to the idea of drafting women and college students, nothing could be scarier to middle America, to young voters or to their parents.

There's just one problem — it's not Bush's idea, and the media seems unwilling to tell us whose idea it really is. Actually, the bill belongs to Rep-resentative Charles Rangel, a liberal Democrat. It has fourteen co-sponsors, all anti-war Democrats. On the other side, there is a bill in the house that would abolish the Selective Service System entirely. The bill's sponsor is Ron Paul, a moderate Texas Republican. Co-sponsors include members of both parties.

You wouldn't know that if you read a recent Associated Press article by Terence Hunt. The article made reference to Kerry's reaction to outright rumors that the president might bring the draft back, without a single reference to the existence of Rangel's bill.

There's a bill in Congress that's been bogged down in committee for almost two years.

CBS News did a segment on the topic as well. The entire story revolved around a nervous mom who is concerned with "mass emails" circulating "among worried parents." In other words, CBS now does news stories on rumors, without a single reference to the tangible Rangel bill.

The email admits to being third-hand information from an anonymous source — "Someone I know forwarded this to me, it was forwarded to them from someone they know who has a friend that works in the dept of defense." It reads: "There is pending legislation in the House and Senate (twin bills: S 89 and HR 163) which will time the program's initiation so the draft can begin at early as Spring 2005 – just after the 2004 presidential election. The administration is quietly trying to get these bills passed now, while the public's attention is on the elections, so our action on this is needed immediately."

You might think that CBS News would point out who sponsored these bills, and the absurdity of fifteen of Congress's most liberal anti-war Democrats acting in collusion with the president, but of course they didn't. The focus of the story, a worried mother named Beverly Cocco, is presented as a Bush supporter. She says that she might change her vote according to the fictitious draft "issue." The reporter says that "Beverly is not buying it," referring to Bush's assurances that he would not reinstitute the draft. The reporter asks her if she would vote for a Democrat, if it would mean avoiding the draft. She says that she would vote for Howdy-Doody, if it meant that she could keep her sons at home.

The fictitious draft "issue" is a plus for Bush, but the casual viewer might not understand that from CBS's insinuations to the contrary. For the record, both presidential candidates and Donald Rumsfeld have repeatedly rejected the idea of a draft. According to the website of the draft board, www.sss.gov, there are no plans in place to reinstate the draft.

More importantly, it's best to do away with whispers that Bush is plotting some sort of post-election, middle-of-the-night executive order to reinstate the draft. It's nonsense, for the simple reason that only Congress has that authority. Bush does not.

Rangel's bill is destined to fail, and he knows that. Rangel has written an excellent editorial on his legislation, and he makes it very clear that this legislation is not based on support for the war, but rather based in its opposition. He believes that minorities, as well as poor and rural whites, fill a disproportionate section of our military's enlisted ranks. Meanwhile, white upper and middle-class folks go to college. I couldn't agree more. I just don't think that the draft is the right way to change this terrible situation. If you agree with Rangel, and you're a middle class white kid, then I suggest that you drop out immediately and enlist in the interest of fairness to minorities and the poor.

So please, if you oppose the draft, then write a letter to Charles Rangel. Write a letter to your congressman. Or you can just vote and boot the draft scare-mongers out of office.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

RACIST 'JOKES' SHOULD NOT BE MINIMIZED

This goes out as a plea to each and every student on this campus, regardless of race, creed, orientation or any other source of identity. Since the surfacing of those controversial photos, many people have voiced their concern, and in some instances, nonchalance and disregard for the severity of their contents.

As a student leader on this campus, and also being a person of color, I can admit that I was perturbed on two fronts. The first being the weak and insulting claim that it was all a "joke" shared by friends having a good time, and was being taken out context. Apparently, unbeknownst to those involved, the implications of their actions were nothing remotely close to being comedic in any way. To those of you in the student body who are brushing off this disturbing occurrence and urging people to take a "chill pill," I implore you to look back on events over the course of global history that beg to differ.

By searching beyond the basics, one will quickly realize that far too much has gone unaddressed and undocumented, and that which has would much rather be disguised than exposed for the monstrous reality it brings to light. The Grand Wizard has never appeared on a sketch for "Saturday Night Live," and for a good reason.

Originally established as a social organization, the Ku Klux Klan quickly evolved into a means of executing horrific and dehumanizing acts against African-Americans and other persons of color. To the advantage of klansmen, the protection of officials in law enforcement allowed them to practice their debauchery without prosecution. With a track record that boasts senseless and unwarranted lynchings, burnings, beatings, murders, draggings, among other deplorable acts of violence, I'm supposed to somehow expunge any reference made to such a group because it was all in good fun?

Secondly, I was disturbed because these "student leaders" are among my colleagues. I have been involved in RSO's since my first year at this university, and slowly made my way up the ranks to assuming leadership roles within several groups. For me, being an active member of this campus community has helped me form great alliances, friendships, and become part of a huge network of individuals who selflessly give of themselves and their services to benefit others. For many student leaders on this campus, our roles and responsibilities are taken quite seriously, and literally I might add.

On the contrary, some people don't recognize the breadth of their influence and privilege, and the consequences their actions bear. In closing, my earnest plea to everyone reading this is to examine this situation critically, and consider its implications and severity. Furthermore, I caution you all in minimizing the reactions of those students who were not only deeply offended by these actions, but were also forced to question their acceptance and safety on campus. Each of us is entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, but certainly not at the expense of others.

Dan Wallace

The trash flung at John Kerry makes me cringe. With a combination of half-truths and extremism, John Kerry's critics have implied that if you vote for John Kerry, you will die. If you look beyond the sound bites and commercials, John Kerry's actions make all the sense in the world.

Most anybody paying attention to the presidential election has heard Kerry's foot-in-his-mouth quote: "I voted for the $87 billion before I voted against it." The media didn't show you everything. What Kerry was trying to explain was that he voted for the $87 billion Iraq and Afghanistan funding, paid for by rolling back the tax cuts for people earning $400,000 or more a year. What he did vote against was paying for the funding by going further into debt, which is what George Bush and the Republicans wanted.

Congress, against John Kerry, decided to go into more debt. More debt now means more interest payments later, which means needlessly higher taxes in the future. Thank you John Kerry for voting against more debt.

Do you need more proof that John Kerry will not mean a weaker United States? His critics complain that he voted to cut spending on particular lighter planes and combat vehicles. Ironically, Dick Cheney was Secretary of Defense during Bush Sr.'s administration, and he pushed for nearly all the military cuts that John Kerry voted for. The Cold War was over then, and the exorbitant military spending on missiles and fighter planes was unnecessary; it is still unnecessary. How often do you hear that the military doesn't have enough deadly weapons?

And while we have all the deadly weapons we need for the military, we still don't have enough troops, and we sorely need them. Terrorists hold no allegiance to any one country, but are united in the destruction of America. It takes the manpower of specially trained troops to locate and destroy stealthy terrorist cells effectively. If we don't get more troops in the army, we can expect to meet the terrorists at the front doors of our embassies, foreign bases, and big cities over and over again.

Terrorists are cockroaches, and exterminators don't get rid off cockroaches by blowing up the house; they are subtler than that. John Kerry has consistently supported pay increases for our troops. John Kerry voted for a 4.5 percent pay raise for troops in 1989, and a pay raise that is 0.5 percent higher than the inflation rate through 2006. The raise will keep servicemen in the army longer and attract additional people. More troops are a superior ingredient for defeating terrorists.

"Weak on defense" certainly does not apply to John Kerry. Kerry recognizes that our tax dollars can't be squandered away. John Kerry realizes that there is not a silver bullet that will defeat terrorism; instead, a million small pricks will bleed it to death.

JIM BREUER, BACK AT AND STRANGE AS EVER

By Reid Davenport
Collegian Staff

On Saturday Oct. 9th, former "Saturday Night Live" star and comedian Jim Breuer returns to the University of Massachusetts with his out-of-control style of comedy.

Breuer, no stranger to the Fine Arts Center, brings his "World Therapy Tour" to campus, most likely backed up by guitarist and comedian Paul Bond. On their last stop through, Breuer and Bond delivered a solid performance with Bond's mood setting guitar riffs during Breuer's whacky antics.

Despite being a husband and father of two, when he's home in Long Island, N.Y., Breuer still delivers a performance only a hyperactive college student could be capable of. Constantly laughing at his own actions and thoughts, Breuer always manages to keep the crowd bursting with laughter.

Breuer is known from his time spent on the famed NBC show, Saturday Night Live. On "SNL" he became wildly popular for his Goat Boy character, as well an immitation of Joe Pesci on a farce entitled "The Joe Pesci Show."

His first breakthrough role after leaving "SNL" was Brian, the Jerry Garcia loving potthead, from "Half-Baked." Since then, he has done standup comedy specials for Comedy Central and had minor roles in movies such as "Titan A.E.," "Crooked Lines" and "American Dummy."

"This was a lot better than I thought it was going to be," Breuer commented in a previous interview from his last UMass show. "Usually the first time I ever see where I'm playing is when I walk out and [tonight] I was like, 'Dude there's a lot of people out there!'"

Jim Breuer's "World Therapy Tour" stops at the Fine Arts Center this Saturday at 10 p.m. Tickets are $5 for UMass students, $10 for Five-College students and $15 for the general public. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center box office. The show is brought to you by the Student Activities Center.

Thriller movie is easily 'Forgotten'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

There's a nifty special effect that anchors "The Forgotten," a supernatural thriller in the "gotcha" mode of a M. Night Shyamalan film. In this film the characters don't see dead people, but they do have a tendency to get sucked into the sky right before your very eyes. They'll be standing there when – whoosh – they get whisked right into the ether. It's a neat trick, but it's practically all that the movie has to offer. "The Forgotten" is one of those thrillers that have mood, and, almost, nothing else. It builds on a mystery that only gets less mysterious the longer it takes to end.

I could spoil the secrets of the movie, but the trailers have done that job for me. I will say that the movie is one of those thrillers of obfuscation in which what we think we know happens to not be true at all. Of course, there have been so many of these kinds of films since little Haley Joel Osment began seeing ghosts that those surprise twists lack their old power. Sitting down to watch "The Forgotten" I managed to guess – correctly – the big "shocker" within the first five minutes.

For the first quarter, though, "The Forgotten" manages to be compelling. Telly Peretta (Julianne Moore) is a mother grieving for her son, who died in a plane crash 14 months earlier. She's been locked in her anguish for so long that she's been seeing a therapist (Gary Sinise) at the urging of her husband (Anthony Edwards). Then one day, her son is missing from the family photos. Everyone – her husband, her therapist, even the babysitter – claim that her son never existed, that she miscarried and invented his life from scratch.

It's a fascinating hook for a movie, the parent who mourns their child only to learn that the child never existed. Too bad the movie abandons the premise before it's even halfway through. "The Forgotten" turns into a conventional and rather boring mysterioso thriller, all chases and twists and hidden meanings, and that has the result of flattening the movie out. The movie could have – should have – been a great psychological drama but it instead turns into the umpteenth Shyamalan rip-off.

The movie's cast includes actors as skilled as Gary Sinise and Alfre Woodard given roles that barely rate as two-dimensional tonce you spot the shifty-eyed Sinise, you know something's up.) Moore's central performance turns out to not be very interesting; the milky skinned actress, who's one of the most adept at balancing fragility and toughness, seems lost amidst the fallow surroundings. Her range moves from sad to determined and back again, without much in between. It's a distracting shallow performance, but it matches that of her co-star. Dominic West, who plays a neighborhood father with her exact same problem; his performance is similarly lacking in gradations.

"The Forgotten" is competently made but ultimately lifeless. The movie plods along on its way to its functional conclusion, but it sacrifices depth and substance for unearned twists, forced atmosphere and cool special effects. The movie's name is apropos for its purposes; by next week it'll be among the forgotten.

A wise Eve says : Friends go before men, forever

Original Sin
Eve

Can someone please explain to me why people change who they are the minute they land a relationship? Is it too difficult to keep your individuality maintained? Is that why people are so afraid to remain single?

I think it is the word "we" that bothers me. The minute one of my girlfriends tries to put that word in a sentence, a wave of nausea erupts inside of me like a bad case of morning sickness. Speaking of morning sickness, my best girlfriend can tell you all about it. She called me hysterically crying two weeks ago claiming that she was pregnant. Maybe if we were sixteen, inexperienced, or even freshmen, I would cry for her too. However, we are twenty-two and quite aware of the consequences of our sexual behavior.

So I asked her how it happened. "I didn't think I was fertile. So we never used protection," she says matter-of-factly. I took a moment to understand her rationale, then I took another moment to let the "we" run through me, so as not to hang up the phone. Then I lectured her like a sixth grade sex-ed teacher. And I don't think she seemed to mind.

She asked me to come to Boston and help her through the abortion ordeal, and naturally I was flattered. "Of course I'll come, but what about your boyfriend?" I asked cringing at that horrifying word. She remained silent for a minute then answered, "He has been so supportive and understanding through this whole thing. He wants to be there, but I really think I'd prefer you to be around," and that was all she had to say.

We planned to meet on Friday night. I made her a big dinner at my house and she swallowed the pill while holding my hand. "Good girl," I said as she finished off her glass of water. I set her up on the couch and tucked her in with the most comfortable blankets I could find. It was so nice to have a moment alone with her again. Ever since he showed up I haven't been able to converse with her unless it was on his clock. But if she was happy, I was happy ... but not really. Within moments we were laughing and joking around like old times, as if neither of us had a care in the world. For a moment everything seemed comfortable.

The doorbell rang; she stopped laughing and became quiet. I opened the door only to find him standing in front of me. Uncomfortably, I said "Hi! Come in. She's on the couch." I walked away leaving the door wide open. He entered my house quietly, and walked directly towards her.

"Hi, hun," she whispered solemnly. There were no more laughs, no more jokes, and no more happiness. I couldn't believe the switch in personality. Does he make her miserable? Or is she just miserable with him? I studied their interactions carefully and concluded that she is better off alone or with someone else. But she hates being alone, and he is convenient for now. That is nauseating.

He looks at his watch and says, "Come. Let's go home to bed." My heart skipped five beats. I knew this was her final test. Spend the night with a boyfriend of four months or a best friend of two years. As expected, she chose the guy, and I had no choice but to understand. However, I don't understand why I haven't seen her since.

We spoke once later that weekend, but I was someone she never found time to meet up with. I didn't even bother to say good-bye when I left to go back to school. Two days later, I received a two-minute message on my phone, apologies and all; "I'm sooo sorry we didn't spend time together. Please understand I wasn't choosing him over you. I appreciate you coming down, and I love you. Call me back."

I called her back, only because she was aware of how I was feeling, and no "boyfriend" can ever change that.

EA strikes gold again with 'Def Jam'

Reid Davenport

The newest release from EA Sports, 'Def Jam:Fight for NY' is highly acclaimed for its celebrity cameos and total revamping of the original game 'Def Jam Vendetta'.

After "Electronic Arts" announced it would make a sequel to a game as poor as "Def Jam Vendetta," most gamers were probably surprised as "Vendetta" was not very popular. Despite using the popular grappling engine, which was how you wrestled in World Wrestling Entertainment's hit games "No Mercy" and "Wrestle Mania" on the N64, "Vendetta" did not appeal to the wrestling audience and the rap aspect of it was more odd than annoying.

However, EA has revamped the game and made it into a true fighting game. Even though there is a level you climb into a ring, don't think this has gone back to rappers acting like pro-wrestlers again. This time around you knuckle up as your own character, with a list of other popular rappers, and fight for respect and territory.

The game is far beyond "Vendetta" and the only thing carrying over is the storyline. It begins with the infamous D-Mob being lead away in cuffs, following the final battle in the previous game, then your character crashes the party – literally – and takes D-Mob back home.

EA creates an interesting way to create your character by using a cop from the scene to identify the suspect, which is your character. They also give you a feature so you can give your character the voice you want, so there's no more of the miming expressions instead of talking.

You will quickly recognize many of today's popular rap artists in the game: Method Man, Redman, Warren G, Snoop Dogg, Fat Joe, Iced-T, Busta Rhymes, Falva Flav, Lil' Kim and even appearances by actress Carmen Electra and rocker Henry Rollins. With a long list of names both starring and lending their musical talent to the game, it shows that EA definitely planned on investing more time to make this a better game.

Your character will earn points to use in "The Gym" to build up strengths, learn new finishing moves, and learn new styles of fighting to KO your opponents. You will also earn money so you can become the biggest playa in the circuit. You can purchase throwback Michael Jordan jerseys, a pair of Sean John jeans, get your hair dreaded up, toss a tattoo on your back, grab some diamond earrings, necklaces, and rings to make yourself all pimped out for your next fight.

While lights can sometimes become overwhelming, you will eventually learn what you need to do to survive and win. It's all about timing and taking advantage of being able to toss your opponent into the crowd, or objects, to do more damage. You will find that weapons come in handy if your energy is fading fast.

The last significant improvement is the story mode. The story is very well developed with turns that you don't really expect. EA also didn't hold back on the language as F-bombs are dropped left and right. They did an excellent job trying to show a more realistic, rap based game. It's not hard to find yourself playing for a few hours just to find out what happens next.

Overall EA did a fantastic job giving "Def Jam Vendetta" a complete face lift to create "Fight for NY." Even if you are not a fan of rap, this game still provides a solid fighting game to spend hours at a time playing.

EA's "Def Jam: Fight for New York" is available now on all three major platforms for around $49.99. It is rated M for mature due to violence, strong language, and adult situations.

Stern fights back

By Daniel Rubin
The Philadelphia Inquirer

If you want to hear Howard Stern, starting in Jan. 2006, you'll need to shell out $12.95 a month for satellite radio.

Sirius, the number two of orbital radio companies, announced Wednesday that it had lured the nation's most popular morning disc jockey to an exclusive five-year deal that, all told, will cost them a staggering $500 million.

The move promises to launch satellite radio into the mainstream.

Stern, 50, who has spent years pushing the line of what's permissible on broadcast radio, told his millions of listeners Wednesday he was "tired of the censorship."

With its porn-star confessionals and his crude talk, Stern's show has cost broadcasters more than $2 million in settlements with the Federal Communications Commission since 1995. Little is out of bounds on satellite radio, which, like cable television, has escaped federal regulation for indecency.

"I've decided what my future is," Stern said Wednesday. "It's not this kind of radio anymore."

Scott Greenstein, Sirius' president of entertainment and sports, called Stern "the greatest prize in radio, maybe radio history."

Bernoff said the move would make Sirius, with 600,000 subscribers, more competitive with its rival, XM Radio, which has 2.5 million.

Stern's weekday morning program airs in 46 markets, including in Philadelphia on WYSP-FM, and is heard by between 8 million and 12 million people, Joe Clayton, Sirius' chief executive officer, noted in an interview. Stern's hold on the key 18-to-49-year-old male demographic, which he is counting on to pay for his investment in the shock jock.

To break even, Sirius says it needs to sign up 1 million new subscribers at $12.95 a month, and keep them until Stern's contract expires in 2010.

Sirius' stock closed Wednesday at $5.87 a share, up 52 cents, or 16 percent. XM Radio closed at $29 a share, down 48 cents, or 2 percent.

A national debate on objectionable content has brewed since the FCC staff decision last fall, later reversed – not to penalize NBC affiliates after the singer Bono used the f-word during the 2003 Golden Globes award show. Janet Jackson's breast-baring on the Super Bowl halftime show in February raised the volume. That month Clear Channel dropped Stern's show from six stations after pledging "zero tolerance" for indecency.

Stern recently said on the air that Jackson's exposure could cost him his job. Actually, it may have made him millions. Sirius, however, would not disclose what Stern would be paid – only that he will get 1 million stock options that he can keep should he leave after five years.

Sirius projected $100 million yearly cost for Stern includes staff salary, studio construction in New York and production expenses. Stern talked of developing two more channels in addition to his morning talk show, and Sirius executives suggested he could develop a music show.

The deal does not address the cable television broadcast of Stern's show, which has been the most popular talk fare on the I-1 network for a decade.

Can knitting be the next trend to hit the college circuit?

By Daina Klimanis
Knight Ridder

After Sarah Asher Morris began knitting about three years ago, she got a dose of teasing. People would say things like, "I thought only grandmothers did that!"

Now a junior at the University of Oregon, Morris often sees students knitting during lectures. A new knitting group has formed in one of the dorms, she said; another meets in the student union. The two knitting classes at the craft center on campus fill up so quickly; people who want to learn how to knit must turn elsewhere, such as the University Students Fibers Guild, of which Morris is co-president.

"People want something so that they can pull away from whatever they're doing just for an hour, instead of (doing) yoga or something else," Morris said. " ... It's meditative. It's relaxing."

The University of Oregon is among schools nationwide where knitting clubs are blossoming as many college-aged women, as well as an increasing number of men, are taking up the ancient craft. According to a survey done for the Craft Yarn Council of America, the percentage of women younger than 45 who knit doubled in recent years, going from 9 to 18 percent between 2000 and 2002, the most recent year for which data is available.

Since then, knitting has become even more popular among young people, giving a boost to the business, said Mary Colucci, the yarn council's executive director. She estimates yarn vendors have seen yarn sales grow by double-digit percentages in the last two years.

"I know publishers have added more knitting and crocheting titles because the demand is there," Colucci said. " ... I know from retailers around the country, a lot of them have added more and more (knitting) classes and some shops, they fill up their classes so quickly, people have to wait to get in."

Lisa Meyers, owner of Rosie's Yarn Cellar in Philadelphia, said college-aged students make up about 20 percent of her customer base; it was only 5 percent when she opened her shop nine years ago. Now she's getting calls from resident assistants at area colleges who want her to organize knitting sessions in dormitories.

"People think this is an industry where you're going to be dealing with people with hearing aids all day long," Meyers said. "Not at all."

Knitters are eager to explain the hobby's appeal. Sure, it's cheap and portable, many said they take their knitting to class to help them stay awake – and it's a great source of cheap gifts for friends and family. But for many, the true appeal lies in the repetitive motion itself, which they use to escape stress, or at least keep their hands busy.

"Last semester I knitted a lot and it helped me stop biting my nails," said Elissa Washuta, a sophomore at the University of Maryland. "Then I stopped, and I started biting my nails again."

But none of this is news; the gentle clack of knitting needles has been around for thousands of years. What's changing is the knitting industry, which has been stocking stores with funky yarns and trendy patterns to draw adventurous young knitters.

"It's not such an old lady frumpy sweater thing," said Emily Powell, a junior at the University of Maryland.

Powell, who enjoys making matching hats and mittens, said even those who make fun of her hobby end up appreciating the results.

"A lot of times they laugh, but then they think it's pretty cool when I stay warm in the winter due to my cool knitted things," she said.

Not only are yarn makers putting more effort into producing bright colors and interesting textures, but improving technology makes yarn softer and lighter, Colucci said.

"You hear, 'Wow, why weren't these yarns around?'" Colucci said. "I think we've all experienced kind of those really heavy handmade things. It's not that way anymore."

The result, combined with new larger needles that speed the knitting process and patterns that keep pace with fashion, appeals to those who grew up on fluffy store-bought knits.

Men are getting in on this traditionally woman's activity more than ever before. At a recent knitting club meeting at the University of Maryland, four of the 20 attendees were men. One was sophomore Mat Lewis, a club regular who began learning to knit about a year ago.

"A lot of punk rock guys I know knit, because it's a fun thing to do, and they like to switch up gender roles," Lewis said.

A number of male knitters have showed up at the University of Oregon as well, said University Student Fibers Guild co-president Morris. Many had already learned knitting from a family member or a class.

As younger adults turn toward knitting in increasing numbers, more and more knitting resources are targeting the younger set. Across the country, Stitch 'N' Bitch knitting circles target sassy young knitters. The Web site of Stitch 'N' Bitch Chicago sells "knitting paraphernalia of a new generation." An online knitting magazine, Knitty.com, recently shared patterns for fashionable lingerie and these kinds of knitting resources are attracting new knitters in turn.

"With the new patterns and new types of yarns and more textures, it's become more fun to do," Powell said. "It's a fashion statement."

The result is that more women and men are finding themselves less dependent on the inventory of their local department store.

"I'm obsessed with (BBC television show) 'Dr. Who' and (show actor) Tom Baker," said Sarah McKisson, University of Maryland sophomore. "He has a really awesome scarf that you can't buy anywhere, but I found a pattern for it to knit!"

Six months and at least six skeins of wool later, McKisson has a multicolored scarf that's twice as long as she is tall. Now she has moved on to other knitting projects, using her new skills to knit gifts for friends and family.

The slow pace of knitting projects sets the activity apart from other pursuits, said Lizzy Malouf, president of the University of Maryland's knitting club. In a world where spending hours to make a present for a friend has become a rarity, people have greater appreciation for these homemade gifts.

"It stands out and it shows that you spent a lot of time on it, and time is something that no one has anymore," Malouf said.

KNITTING RESOURCES

Looking for knitting patterns, or just some basic instructions? Some college knitters share their favorite books and Web sites.

For beginners:

"Knitting for Dummies," by Pam Allen et. al., For Dummies, $21.99

"If you're looking for a book that will go through the basics and it has pictures," said Lizzy Malouf, University of Maryland

www.learntoknit.com

"It explains kinds of yarn, needles-it even has crochet instructions... That's the site I learned to knit from," said Sarah McKisson, University of Maryland.

"Stitch 'N Bitch: The Knitter's Handbook," by Debbie Stoller, Workman Publishing $13.95.

Tony Nguyen, right, learns to knit from Melissa Carder, a campus ministry intern at the University of Maryland in College Park, Maryland.

Spiders looking to defend A-10

TEMPLE

The Owls had a promising start to their opening with wins against Lehigh and Syracuse, though they went on to lose their next three games against American, Temple and Maine. Currently, the Owls stand at 3-5, which is not as standard as it is, until I think since Temple has one of the harder schedules in the A-10, has to play all three ranked teams in their first eight games. Temple dropped its next eight games to ranked teams, Penn State and Delaware.

At center, head coach Lauren Fuchs's team has displayed an aggressive offense, scoring four times against Temple and three times against Lehigh. While showing signs of change on the offensive side, the Owls have also shown a severe lack of production on defense. Goalie Erin Conroy and her defensive defense have been hurt for 25 goals, while the offense has only scored 15. Overall, the Owls have been outscored as a team by a total of 67-46.

Lauren Fuchs will have to guide her defense and inspire her offense if the Owls hope to compete against Richmond in their conference opener tomorrow and against the rest of the A-10 in the tournament.

WESTCHESTER

The Rhode Island, the WCU Golden Rams have their first three games of the season. Though unlike URI, the Golden Rams went on to lose nine more of their next 10 games giving them a 1-10 record.

Furthermore, one of their problems is that they've been playing all of their home games on the road. The construction of a new turf stadium forced the Golden Rams to travel north 40 minutes to Ol' Roberts High School for home games.

Kathy Krannebitter's team has lost many heartbreakers in the first month of the season, including 2-1 losses to Rider, Ursinus and Monmouth, all of which were in overtime. The 2004 WCU program is obviously not where it should be. With a potent offensive attack consisting of forwards Jen McGinley, Jen Doody and Megan Glielmi, WCU should be in contention with other team such as Temple and St. Joe's.

Krannebitter's experience as a coach is unparallel among other A-10 coaches. 2004 is her 19th season as coach for the Golden Rams and, in that time, she has a 181-154 record. Over the past two seasons, the WCU program has fallen apart, though. So far this season, her team has scored only three goals. This is an embarrassing stat, which shows that perhaps it is time for WCU to move on and look for guidance from a more youthful coach.

LASALLE

The Explorers, coached by Sarah Catlin, opened up their season with a tough 2-1 loss to Drexel though quickly regained their composure with two wins against Lafayette and Monmouth. LaSalle's schedule is perhaps one of the easiest in the A-10, playing only two ranked teams, one of which is non-conference.

Their toughest loss so far came in a 5-0 defeat to Wake Forest, a team that is now 11-2 overall. The Explorers stand at 4-6 for the season with their biggest wins coming against a weak Robert Morris team, which they beat 6-0 and Rider, which they also shut out 4-0. Defense has been the name of the game for the Explorers. Goalie Colleen Bolger along with blanking Rider and Robert Morris, has also shut out Lock Haven and Bucknell.

to a red card received against Harvard on September 19. Kitchell was a peg in the center defensive midfield. During his suspension, Koch played around with the lineup, pushing players like Ralph Pace and Todd Skelton to double-team the area.

Now, with Kitchell back in the lineup, Koch is wary to stray from a strategy that has only let up three goals over the last three games, a vast improvement over the nine given up over the first three games of the season.

"We're playing with two guys in the central part of the defense, one is more of a defensive midfielder, one is more of a back," Koch said. "We're getting more compact as a unit, and since we've done it, it's cut the goals down by two-thirds."

Koch is looking for his defense to be in top form this weekend against two teams that love to attack.

Both Richmond and George Washington tend to attack fast and often, vying to break the ice. Neither team has done particularly well thus far, and Koch is looking to stifle whatever first attempts they send the Minutemen's way.

"I know they are both very direct in the way they play, as in they like to get it to the opposite-third as quick as they can," Koch said.

One thing UMass can't do is let either of these teams get on the board first. Whenever either squad scores first, they tend to be more conservative and pull their attacking midfielders back.

Koch has seen their style before and is making a point to try to strike first.

"The one thing you don't want to do in either of these games is get behind," Koch said. "Once either of them gets up by a goal, they tend to just pack it in. They'll just sit back there and make it as impossible as possible to score."

opportunities. The thought process in anything has to be that there is never going to be another chance. This is the last chance you're going to have," Shea said.

Shea will look to several of her players to provide these opportunities. One is Trish Borneo. The junior midfielder and member of the Trinidad and Tobago national team, has one goal and one assist so far this season.

She has the ability to be a spectacular, spectacular player," Shea said of Borneo. "She's just too unselfish, and she doesn't want to take the ball. Yet, that's the thing we need her to do to help us."

Shea also mentioned that she needed a boost from her younger players including Gina Sanders.

"I think we need some underclassmen to step it up. I think we need Gina Sanders to step up and finish some of the opportunities that she's had," Shea said.

On the defensive end, Massachusetts must do a better job of attacking opponents further up the field. The Minutewomen have been doing a better job of that as of late but still continue to play a "bend-not-break" defense which allows teams deep in to Massachusetts territory but doesn't allow many quality shots on goal.

The backs must also provide more support for senior goaltender Christine Tocco. Tocco has been outstanding in net, registering 100 saves. Her 2.82 GAA doesn't nearly reflect how excellent she has played in front of the cage.

"I think Christine Tocco has been keeping us in games. She's been playing very well in goal. You look at the scores, and it doesn't really seem it. And then you look at the shots that she's faced, and it's incredible. She's been doing a great job and she's been really keeping us going," Shea stated.

UM shoots for more success at Rudd

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team wraps up its five game home stand this weekend with games against Richmond and George Washington.

The Minutewomen have been successful on their longest home stretch of the season, winning two of their first three matches, but they face two of the Atlantic-10's toughest teams in the Spiders and Colonials.

UMass hopes the offense can get rolling this weekend, and a big part of that will be based on the play of Britt Canfield.

The freshman scoring-machine was named the Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Week after her efforts in Sunday's game against Temple. Canfield scored twice in the game, including the game-winner in overtime.

Canfield leads the team in goals (5), points (10) and shots (34).

"Britt's been playing great," assistant coach Rebecca Myers said. "She's stepping up, and she's getting us the goals that we need. She's getting great help to get those goals, but she's also setting herself up in good position to get them."

Just past the midway point of the season, UMass (3-6, 1-2 A-10) seems to be hitting its stride, winning three of the last four games. The Minutewomen are looking to build off their most impressive victory of the season, a 3-2 overtime win over conference foe Temple.

Senior forward Lindsey Fairweather said the team's expectations are high for the weekend doubleheader.

"We're not looking for a split this weekend," Fairweather said. "We want to win them both."

Junior midfielder Lindsey Bellini echoed Fairweather's sentiment.

"These are two of the most competitive teams in the A-10 so hopefully we can go at least 1-1, but hopefully it'll be 2-0," Bellini said. "We can definitely play with them if we come out confident."

The goal all season for UMass has been to make the Atlantic-10 tournament which is scheduled to take place on UMass' home turf at Rudd Field.

The top six teams in the conference qualify for the tournament, and UMass is currently in a three-way tie for seventh place. The Minutewomen will have plenty of opportunities to improve their conference standing as their eight remaining games are all against league opponents.

There is a sense of urgency for the Maroon and White to make the conference tournament for the first time since 2000, and it starts with the upperclassmen.

"I'm not going out senior year without making the tournament," Fairweather said as she pointed out this weekend's games as an opportunity to bolster the team's conference record.

With the tournament being played at UMass, the emphasis is even greater.

"We want to make it," Bellini said, "especially with it being held here."

The first challenge for UMass this weekend will be Richmond at 3:30 p.m. Friday. Richmond (4-4-1, 2-1 A-10) was predicted to be the No. 2 team in the A-10 in the preseason by the league's coaches, and the Spiders have not disappointed.

Richmond boasts four players on the preseason All-Conference team including two first-team honorees from last year.

There will be no let-up for UMass on Sunday when George Washington travels to Amherst. GW was predicted to finish No. 4 in the A-10 and is undefeated so far in league play.

The Colonials (4-4-3, 2-0-1 A-10) feature first team All-Conference defender Lindsay Bruno.

"We're going to see what we're made out of in both games," Myers said. "Whatever the result is on Friday, we have to be able to come back and battle on Sunday."

"They're two tough teams, and if we don't come out to play they're going to have their way. If we do show up to play it's going to be a fun weekend."

Brady's receivers change, results don't

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO (AP) – When Tom Brady looked downfield last season his top targets were Deion Branch and Troy Brown. He'll be focusing on other wide receivers Sunday.

Branch is doubtful with a knee injury, and Brown is questionable with a shoulder injury for the game against the Miami Dolphins that could give the New England Patriots an NFL record 19th straight win.

And Brady will be facing a strong pass defense.

"I'm not concerned," the two-time Super Bowl MVP said.

That's because he has plenty of other teammates to throw to – wide receivers David Patten, David Givens and Bethel Johnson and tight ends Daniel Graham and Christian Fauria.

Branch led the Patriots with 57 catches and Brown was third with 40 last season. Kevin Faulk had 48 receptions, mostly short gains out of the backfield.

This year, the Patriots also have rookie P.K. Sam, a fifth-round draft choice from Florida State, who saw his first NFL action – he recalls being in three or four plays – in last Sunday's 31-17 win at Buffalo.

"It was fun," Sam said Thursday, "actually being on that side of the line instead of the sideline. It was cool so (I'm) just waiting to see what happens this week."

With so many good receivers already with the Patriots, he's had to be patient after making 50 catches as a junior last year and leaving school with athletic eligibility left.

"That's part of the program when you come to a great team like this, so it was expected," Sam said. "I'm just waiting for my time, but everything's cool right now. I'm just learning from the older guys."

Most of the Patriots' other wide receivers also took a while to develop.

Brown was drafted in the eighth round in 1993 and didn't become a full-time starter until 2000 when he caught 83 passes. Patten, an undrafted free agent out of college, totaled 71 catches in his first four seasons then joined the Patriots in 2001 and had 112 in his first two seasons with them.

Givens, a seventh-rounder in 2002, had nine catches as a rookie but 34 last year and leads the team with 14 this year. He's a big receiver with good hands.

"David is a tremendous player," Brady said. "He just keeps getting better. The more you throw to him, the more reliable he is."

Johnson, a second-round pick, had 16 catches as a rookie last year. He and Sam have to make progress before getting into the regular rotation at wide receiver. "It was a start," coach Bill Belichick said of Sam's play against Buffalo. "I am sure it will be better. Well, I am not sure. I hope he will be better as he continues to gain experience."

Sam was 21 last February and is one of the NFL's youngest players. He was sidelined for part of training camp and says he's content to wait his turn on a strong team rather than play sooner on a weak team.

"Definitely," he said. "That's why even in college I chose Florida State. Anybody can be in a lesser program."

Minutemen ready to open hockey season after losing last season's core players

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

To say that the Massachusetts hockey team's last meaningful game came on March 20 would be a gross understatement. The epic Hockey East final, which the Minutemen finally dropped to Maine after a total of 109:27 of hockey, was under seven months ago, and in some ways, for all the changes the Minutemen have endured, it could have been 70 years ago.

The squad lost all three of last year's captains to graduation, and with them went Thomas Pock's scoring ability, Nick Kuiper's size and defensive skills, and Mike Warner's overall leadership. If that weren't enough, junior forward Greg Mauldin bowed out early to join the Columbus Blue Jackets, who drafted him in 2002.

In addition, one assistant coach – Bill Gilligan – stepped out, and one assistant coach – former Princeton bench boss Len Quesnelle – stepped in.

Then again, coach Don Cahoon has repeated many times over the years that he "doesn't want any historians" on his team. So, the Minutemen will play their first official game since Ben Murphy tipped Mathew Deschamps' slap shot past Gabe Winer to clinch the Hockey East title, tomorrow night at 7 p.m. when they host Clarkson. And while reaching the conference final for the first time in the program's history was certainly a landmark event, Cahoon and his charges are intent on looking ahead, specifically to tomorrow's first-ever meeting with the Golden Knights.

In the realm of positive changes, the Minutemen discovered late last year that they could function as a two-goaltender team. Junior Gabe Winer is slated to make the start tomorrow night, but senior Tim Warner proved in his clutch playoff performances last year that he has the ability to be a consistent part of the net minding picture.

"If we had two games this weekend, Tim would play one and Gabe would get the other," Cahoon said. "The following weekend we play two games, and my intention will be to play two goaltenders. Timmy's been every bit as good going into the preseason as Gabe, and has really picked up where he left off last year, which is a great credit to him for getting prepared. I just think Gabe's very comfortable in general, and up to this point doesn't seem to get affected by much."

In terms of ability, the two goaltenders seemed to be near equals in combining for one goal allowed in Saturday's 2-1 overtime win over St. Francis Xavier of Nova Scotia. The determining factor in deciding who would open up the 2004-05 season, Cahoon said, came down to which netminder was more suited for the pressure of the first game.

"It's the first game of the year, so [Warner] might feel like if he doesn't have a great performance, he's not going to factor in, and that's not the case at all," Cahoon said. "Pressure wise, we need focus out of Gabe, and we need him to play well, but I didn't want one guy hanging out there and thinking in the first game out that he's not in the equation."

If UMass is short on anything, it certainly isn't heralded rookies. Six brand-new players will vie for ice time just months after finishing up with their high school teams.

In terms of name recognition, the cream of the crop may be forwards Matt Burto (Boston Jr. Bruins) and P.J. Fenton (New England Jr. Coyotes), who played against each other last year in the Eastern Junior Hockey League. However, forward Dan Gordon, a late addition, and defensemen Mike Kostka and David Leaderer both showed plenty of grit and ability in the exhibition game against St. Francis Xavier.

Not to be ignored, either, are Zech Klann and Paul Lynch. Klann did not become eligible until this season but worked out heavily away from the team last year and already looks able to contribute. Lynch, who transferred from Maine prior to last season but had to sit out due to NCAA regulations, has a booming slap shot, and at 6-foot-3, 220 lbs. is hard to miss on the ice.

"I think you're going to see a lot of the younger kids over the course of the first half-dozen games," Cahoon said, "you'll see enough of them to get an idea of what they'll be able to do for us. And, still, the core of the team will be the older kids, and they're going to carry the load. The younger kids will be used in a complementary fashion."

UMass set for two at Garber

By Dave Quinn
Collegian Staff

The weekends have not been kind to the Massachusetts field hockey team (2-10). The Maroon and White have faced six nationally ranked teams and managed just two wins in their 10 attempts.

This weekend, Massachusetts has a chance to turn that all around. The Minutewomen will open the A-10 portion of their schedule taking on West Chester (1-10) on Saturday and then the Explorers of La Salle (4-7) on Sunday. Both games will take place at 1:00 p.m. at Garber Field.

Despite the similar records, Massachusetts coach Patty Shea isn't looking past either team.

"They both bring a lot of emotion, and they know that their conference is their best way to get to the tournament," Shea said. "Once the conference starts, everything is out the window, all records, all everything. You know you maybe have to take care of three or four games to get to the championship."

Leading the West Chester attack will be Megan Gilemi and Jennifer Doody who have three goals apiece. Carrie Hanshue will handle the duties in net for the Golden Rams. Hanshue enters the game with a 2.24 goals against average and a whopping 125 saves.

The La Salle attack will be lead by Emily Simone, Allison Geiger and Amy Comstock. Simone and Geiger both have three goals while Comstock has provided two goals and two assists. Unfortunately for the Explorers, playmaker Sarah Camilli is doubtful for this weekend's game. Camilli, the team leader in goals and assist, is suffering from a severe ankle injury.

Offensively, the Minutewomen must find a way to finish their shots. Massachusetts has had several opportunities to put goals up on the board in the last few games but have been unable to capitalize.

"We've had more scoring opportunities in the last few games that we just haven't capitalized on. A lot of that is patience, a lot of that is discipline, and you have to go for the jugular. When you have the chance to put a team down, you have to put the team down. We'll have more scoring opportunities if we create them. And if we're patient and play the style of hockey we need to play, then we'll have more scoring

Spiders are looking to catch A-10 in web

By Pat Woodward
Collegian Correspondent

Richmond

Defending Atlantic-10 champion Richmond, coached by Ange Bradley, has started the 2004 season exactly how it ended its last, by dominating the competition. In the Spiders' opening game, they trampled Monmouth 12-0, following up their next two games against tenth ranked Virginia and number thirteen American with 2-1 and 2-0 wins respectively. So far, Richmond's overall record stands at 8-2.

The majority of Richmond's scoring can be attributed to their leading scorer Hollie Cram, who has an amazing 22 total points on 10 goals and two assists along with Whitney Wells's five goals and one assist. The Spiders have scored a league leading 28 goals thus far in the first 10 games played. This, coupled with the expert goal tending of Michelle Swartz, who has a .90 GAA compared to the rest of the league's 2.80, makes Richmond the top competitor within the A-10.

Richmond, who last year earned a national top-10 ranking, begins its A-10 schedule tomorrow vs. the Temple Owls.

Rhode Island

The Rhode Island Rams, coached by Stacey Bean, have had a rough opening to the 2004 season. They lost their first three games to Hofstra.

Monmouth and Albany by a combined score of 7-1, a discouraging start to the year after they had hoped to bounce back from a disappointing 7-13 record last season.

So far, the Rams have defeated Fairfield, UMBC and Siena, though they have been outscored by their opponents 22-8 and out-assisted 18-8. Rhode Island's leading scorer is Jess Records, who has three goals. The Rams' overall record is 3-6. Their A-10 schedule opened October 6th against Providence.

St. Joseph's

The Hawks' head coach Michelle Finnegan, the winningest coach in St. Joe's field hockey history, is quite confident that her team will give Richmond a run for their money once the A-10 tournament starts up. So far, the Hawks overall record is 6-4.

The reason for Finnegan's early hopes is the return of last year's A-10 Rookie of the Year Nicole Antolini. Thus far in 2004, Antolini has been the Hawks leading scorer with eight goals and eight assists for a total of 24 points. St. Joe's has outscored its opponents 26-13 with eight of those coming in a shutout against Robert Morris. The Hawks defense has notched four shutouts thus far.

Two of their four losses have come against nationally ranked teams Delaware and Penn State in which they scored a total of only one goal.

These losses should be a cause for concern for Finnegan. Finnegan must inspire her team to step it up if they want to contend with Richmond at the Defensive alterations have been the key for UM lately

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Sometimes when things aren't working, all it takes is a quick tweak to get everything back on track.

For the Massachusetts men's soccer team (3-5-2, 0--2 A-10), this alteration has been to the way they approach their defense. The Minutemen will use a much more conservative defensive strategy on the road this weekend against Atlantic 10 conference foes Richmond and George Washington.

UMass will play at Richmond (1-6-2, 0-1-1 A-10) tonight at 7:30 p.m. and will head north to play the Colonials (1-6-2, 0-1-1 A-10) on Sunday for a 1 p.m. kickoff.

This defensive change was first put into effect last weekend against St. Joseph's and Temple on Friday and Sunday, respectively. Essentially, the Minutemen are stacking their defensive midfield rather than sending an extra player forward.

The Maroon and White ended up with two 1-1 ties on the weekend, bringing into question whether this defensive alteration is taking a toll on the offense.

"You're always going to win if you can score more goals than your opponent, but we haven't gotten a shutout this year," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "I think right now in order to help our defense, we need to tighten up, even if it takes a little bit away from our offense."

The Minutemen will still be attacking with their best front men, with Oral Bullen and Rob Charest setting each other up. Both Bullen and Charest have five goals and three assists this season and have been pacing an offense that has been up and down all season.

Adding to the mix are freshmen Matty Lemire (two goals, two assists), Tyler Pagano (one goal, two assists) and fighting-quick sophomore Richard Iliga. All three have made opportunities; it's just been a matter of finishing the job.

"The main thing is that we're creating (opportunities). Finishing them isn't necessarily a big deal. We have guys that can put it in the back of the net," Koch said. "As far as being on the same page, I think they are on the same page; it's just that, technically, we need to finish the opportunities we're creating."

Another small alteration has been the repositioning of Tim Kitchell to offensive midfield. Kitchell, who has been a sweeper and a defensive midfielder so far, will add to Koch's aggressive offense.

"Right now, (Kitchell) is given us something we need, and right now, we plan to play him up top for the weekend," Koch said.

SGA Senate elections not yet ratified

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association Senate elections were not ratified last night due to lack of attendance at the Coordinating Council meeting.

The meeting has been postponed to Thursday evening at 6 p.m. in the SGA's Student Union office.

"The Senate could not be ratified due to quorum," said SGA President Eduardo Bustamante. Bustamante also said he believed many people involved in the SGA were not informed of the meeting until Saturday and many people were out of town because of the three-day weekend.

"I'm really disappointed that we couldn't have the meeting," said Associate Speaker Seamus Brennan. "The [election] turnout was excellent. We had about 2,200 people voting … Every seat was contested."

Despite the lack of attendance, SGA election results were released on the Association's Web site, www.umass.edu/SGA/senate_elections, this weekend.

The winners of the Commuter Area Senate seats are as follows: Anthony Leonardi with 30 votes; Eric Robbie with 15 votes; Julia Kristan with 14 votes; Michael Goldberg with 14 votes; Erin Lemikey with 12 votes; Nora Ritchie with 12 votes; Mark Morrison with 12 votes; Aimee Ayers with 10 votes; Brian Long with 8 votes; Song Anh Nguyen with 8 votes; Colin Delargy with 7 votes; Sofia Binoris with 7 votes; Tom Faust with 6 votes; Todd David Holmes with 6 votes; Justina Jassen with 6 votes; Stephanie LaMarca with 6 votes; Jesus Ortiz with 6 votes; Juan Gabriel Medrano with 5 votes; Justin Eldridge-Otero with 4 votes; Samantha Brown with 3 votes; Lauren Renwanz with 3 votes. There were 217 total votes cast.

The winners of the Central Area Senate seats are as follows: Pavel Payano with 88 votes; Rufaro Nyangoni with 47 write-in votes; Sean Bliss with 46 votes; Abdullah Mamun with 39 votes; Robert McCaw with 36 votes; Maxine Dube with 25 votes; Eoin Moore with 25 votes; Ryan Mudawar with 21 votes. There were 353 total votes cast.

The winners of the Northeast Area Senate seats are as follows: Elizabeth Ayers with 41 votes; Raul Brens Jr. with 28 votes; Jaimil Corliss with 20 votes; Kiev Tran with 18 votes; Saqib Hossain with 17 votes. There were 176 total votes cast.

The winners of the Sylvan Area Senate seats are as follows: Jason Poulos with 41 votes; Alan Chow with 37 votes; Krystal Tucker with 29 votes; Ayotunde Onikoro with 22 votes; Mery Volmar with 21 write-in votes. There were 164 total votes cast.

The winners of the Orchard Hill Area Senate seats are as follows: Adam Szajgin with 60 write-in votes; William Evans with 37 votes; Tristan Brown with 33 votes; Karl Solomon with 32 votes; Brian Whalley with 29 votes. There were 279 total votes cast.

The winners of the Southwest North Area Senate seats are as follows: Lola-Ade Akintobi with 46 votes; Sarah Stern-O'Connor with 43 votes; Peter Barros with 28 votes; Damien Weinstein with 21 votes; Angela Flete with 18 votes; Eric Magazu with 17 votes; Vilgrain Richemond with 8 votes; Brandon Kelly with 7 votes; Brian Tse with 6 votes. There were 252 total votes cast.

The winners of the Southwest South Area Senate seats are as follows: Wendy Lopez with 86 votes; Georgia Kelly with 83 votes; Thomas Shajl Varghese with 57 votes; Shayna Smallwood with 50 votes; Kevin East with 40 votes; Michael Sheridan with 33 votes; Mehdi Rahmeni with 32 votes; Galvin Hazard-Johnson with 30 votes; Kevin Randall with 26 votes; Nadya Stevens with 26 write-in votes; Laura Manley with 20 votes; Lindsay Higgins with 19 votes. Two Amherst fires determined arson

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Amherst – Two fires that took place within an hour of one another on Saturday night are believed to be arson. The larger fire left residents of a 21-unit Crestview Apartment complex on North Pleasant temporarily homeless Saturday night.

According to several media sources, Fire Chief Keith E. Hoyle of the Amherst Fire Department said Sunday that no one was injured in the 10:22 p.m. fire, although fire officials estimated that the building sustained over $35,000 worth of damage from intense heat and smoke.

Hoyle said over 40 firefighters, four pumper trucks, an aerial truck and three chief officers from Belchertown and Northampton responded to the smoky fire, which was located and contained in the basement, but left the building uninhabitable. According to state and local fire investigators, there was evidence of arson in a storage area in the basement.

Firefighters had to break through several walls on the first floor in order to control the minor fire. All other apartments in the complex had loss of electricity, smoke and water damage. The building is owned by Jones Properties of Amherst.

The smaller fire took place in a bathroom in 32 Alpine Commons around 9:30 p.m. on Saturday. There were no injuries, but the fire caused over $1,000 in damage. The building is owned by Aspen Chase Management.

The fires are additions to a series of fires that are believed to be arson in the Amherst area within the last month. In September, a fire was set in a basement storage bin the Presidential Complex apartment buildings on North Pleasant Street.

Local apartment owners are being advised by the fire department to keep storage areas locked and check smoke detectors.

The state fire marshal is investigating four different fires that took place in Sunderland over the last month, two of which were in apartment buildings.

Sigma Kappa sisters model lingerie to benefit UMass Everywoman's Center

Three Sorority Sisters from the University of Massachusetts chapter of Sigma Kappa modeled lingerie Friday night at Shear Bliss Day Spa in Amherst in support of a fundraiser to benefit the UMass Everywoman's Center.

The Lingerie Show, open to both men and women, was sponsored by UndercoverWear, a Tewksbury based company specializing in lingerie, sleepwear and bedroom novelty items.

The event had smaller crowd than anticipated, which UndercoverWear agent Kimberly Lucas attributed to Friday night's presidential debate and Red Sox game that coincided with the show.

"The Columbus Day weekend also added to the lack of students who attended," said UMass senior Teresa Roach, who attended the lingerie show.

Red wine and cookies were served until 8 p.m., followed by a half hour lingerie show featuring pajamas, bras and panties modeled by Ashlee Gordon, Lynne Harrington and Katrina Skurka — all Sigma Kappa sorority sisters.

One particular product in the company's party line called "Sensuous You" caused an outburst of laughter when Lucas mentioned that both the bra and panties have lace ribbon ties for "easy access."

After the show, the products were put on clothing racks and the small number of people who attended were invited to shop for lingerie or book their own parties. None of the women had any previous modeling experience.

"Frankly we are all comfortable being naked," said Harrington, a senior Biology major. "We don't have inhabitations."

The Sigma Kappa sisters did not purchase anything for themselves Friday night, but plan to hold their own fundraiser lingerie show for the Everywoman's Center at their sorority house sometime in the near future.

Women unable to vote in Saudi elections

By Donna Abu-Nasr
Associated Press

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia (AP) — Women may neither vote nor run in Saudi Arabia's first nationwide elections, the government announced Monday, dashing hopes of progressive Saudis and easing fears among conservatives that the kingdom is moving too fast on reforms.

Some women considered the move yet another indignity in a country where they need their husbands' permission to study, travel or work. But others said they wouldn't trust themselves to judge whether a candidate is more than just a handsome face.

The religious establishment had been lobbying against women's participation in the elections, diplomats said.

But an electoral official cited administrative and logistical reasons Monday for the decision to ban women from the municipal elections, scheduled to be held in three stages from Feb. 10 to April 21.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said there are not enough women to run women's-only registration centers and polling stations, and that only a fraction of the country's women have the photo identity cards that would have been needed to vote.

Many women in Saudi Arabia, the birthplace of Islam, have balked at getting the ID cards — introduced three years ago — because the photographs would show their faces unveiled.

Saudi women have limited freedoms. Without written permission from a male guardian, they may not travel, get an education or work. Regardless of permissions, they are not allowed to drive, mix with men in public or leave home without covering themselves with black cloaks, called abayas.

The decision was first announced by Interior Minister Prince Nayef in an interview published Monday.

Register to vote

Wednesday, Oct. 13 is the last day for students to register to vote in this year's presidential election. Students who are already registered can obtain an application for an absentee ballot form online or in the student activities center in the Student Union.

In order to vote at the designated polling stations on Nov. 2, students must either be an Amherst registered voter, or possess an absentee ballot form from their hometown.

Registration forms and absentee ballot information can be found on the website, www.sec.state.ma.us, out-of-state forms can also be found on the Internet on each state's homepage.

Applications must be postmarked by Wednesday and students can drop off their forms at the Student Activities Center to be mailed.

Shiite fighters turn in weapons-for-cash

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Shiite fighters in tracksuits and sneakers unloaded cars full of machine guns, mortars and land mines yesterday as a five-day, weapons-for-cash disarmament program kicked off in Baghdad's Sadr City district — a sign of progress in the center of Shiite resistance in Iraq.

A lasting peace in the sprawling slum would allow U.S. and Iraqi forces to focus on the mounting Sunni insurgency. Underscoring the threat, two American soldiers were killed in a rocket attack in southern Baghdad, and a third U.S. soldier died when a suicide driver exploded a car bomb in front of a U.S. convoy in the northern city of Mosul.

U.S. aircraft attacked a mosque in the predominantly Sunni town of Hit and set it on fire after insurgents hiding in the shrine, opened fire on American Marines, the U.S. military said. In the Sunni insurgent stronghold of Fallujah, a U.S. warplane destroyed a popular restaurant that the American command said was a meeting place for members of Iraq's most feared terrorist organization, Tawhid and Jihad, led by Jordanian-born extremist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi. There was no report of casualties, and the Haj Hussein restaurant was closed during the 12:01 a.m. Tuesday attack.

In Sadr City, followers of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr promised the government last weekend they would hand over

Candidate Update ... 21 days left

Polls say Kerry won last debate

By Jeremy Dirac
Collegian Staff

Friday night was the second televised debate between President George W. Bush and Senator John Kerry.

The two presidential candidates debated in a town hall type of meeting in St. Louis where they were asked questions from an audience of undecided voters. "The Bush and Kerry camps can barely disguise the disdain they have for each other," read a picture caption in a recent Newsweek article, which showed the two men scowling at one another. However, in greeting one another, the candidates were smiling.

According to the polls, Bush faired better in Friday's debate than he did in the first debate. An ABC poll, 35 percent of voters thought Kerry won the second debate and 32 percent thought Bush did. According to a previous ABC poll on the first debate, 52 percent perceived Kerry to be the winner, with 23 percent favoring Bush. "Head to head: Bush limped into St. Louis, but bounded back out — confident that his debate performance left the race dead even," said a Newsweek headline.

An ABC News poll says Bush leads in the "leadership" category after the town meeting debate.

A variety of issues were debated, from taxes to terrorism. According to Newsweek, a highlight of Bush's performance was when he said, "You can run but you can't hide," where Bush cited Kerry's Senate record on tax hikes. The Bush campaign called Kerry a liberal who is weak on defense.

The Bush campaign released a new television ad that cites a New York Times interview where Kerry said, "We have to go back to the place we were, where terrorists are not the focus of our lives but they're a nuisance."

According to a report from CBS news, Bush also criticized this comment at a campaign stop in Hobbs, New Mexico where he said, "Our goal is not to reduce terror to some acceptable level of nuisance. Our goal is to defeat terror. " Bush said that the way to do this is to "go on the offensive," or to preempt a terrorist attack on the United States. According to the ABC news poll, Bush still holds a lead in the category of "leadership."

According to Newsweek, a highlight for Kerry was a comical moment where he referred to the people in the room who he suspected would be effected by his tax roll back — he, President Bush, and moderator Charles Gibson — "Charlie, I'm sorry. You too," said Kerry.

According to the ABC news poll, "Kerry remains more competitive in terms of personal popularity than he was before debate No. 1." According to a CNN/USA Today/Gallup when asked which candidate "cares about the needs of people like you," 49 percent of likely voters chose Kerry, versus 42 percent who chose Bush.

While Bush attacked Kerry on national security, Kerry, in Santa Fe New Mexico, said that Bush's "energy policy has failed," reads a New York Times article. Kerry said that he would "set up a trust fund to develop alternative fuels, cut energy costs by encouraging energy-efficient buildings, diversify sources of oil and other fuels and upgrade electricity grids to prevent blackouts." Kerry said that Bush favored "friends in the oil industry," over consumers.

The nation is still pretty evenly split over whom they would prefer as their president according to two recent polls. One poll by ABC News holds that Bush is in the lead with 50 percent of those polled supporting him compared with 46 percent supporting Kerry. It has a margin of error of 2.5 percentage points. Meanwhile, Kerry is in the lead in a poll by Reuters/Zogby with 47 percent supporting Kerry and 44 percent supporting Bush. It has a margin of error of 2.9 percentage points.

On Wednesday, the third and final debate will be concerned with domestic issues. It will be held at Arizona State University.

medium and heavy weapons for cash in a deal considered an important step toward ending weeks of fighting with U.S. and Iraqi forces. Iraqi police and National Guardsmen will then assume security responsibility for the district, which is home to more than 2 million people.

In return, the government has pledged to start releasing al-Sadr followers who have not committed crimes, suspend raids and rebuild the war-ravaged slum.

Members of al-Sadr's Mahdi Army started showing up at three designated police stations early yesterday morning, carting bags full of guns and explosives — even TNT paste. Many of the weapons appeared old and rusted, but government officials expressed satisfaction with the first day's haul.

"Sadr City residents were very responsive, and the process went without any incidents," Interior Ministry spokesman Col. Adnan Abdul-Rahman said. "We hope this will be completed in a comprehensive manner so that reconstruction can start in the city."

Security was tight, with numerous checkpoints set up along the way and Iraqi troops deployed on the rooftops. U.S. soldiers also watched from a distance.

Abdul al-Nawaf pulled up in front of al-Habibiya station in a white sedan and started unloading machine guns, mortar shells and grenade launchers.

"We have more, but we're waiting to see whether money will be paid or not," the 26-year-old fighter said. "We also want to see if there will be a truce — and whether that truce will last."

Redefining racism is cliché

Zach Oelschlegel

According to how the word is used on this campus, I am a racist. I'll be the first to admit to that one, based solely on the premise that the word "racist," according to University of Massachusetts standards, does not mean that I am "a person with a prejudiced belief that one race is superior to others," as defined in the dictionary. Rather, the new and improved definition for the word when used at UMass is, "someone who disagrees with ALANA [Asian Latino African Native American]" or "someone who is winning or has won an argument against a person from ALANA."

It's something I've seen on this campus all too many times. All along before they were officially given the moronic and unfair dubbing as the "KKK Nine," Pat Higgins, Tim Daly, and the rest who drank themselves silly in the SCERA offices were racists. This was essentially for being at odds with ALANA senators during SGA meetings usually regarding the appointed seats ALANA was given in the Senate up until Jared Nokes, last year's speaker, announced that he wasn't going to recognize them.

While I disagree with the assertion that this is proof that they are blatantly racist, ALANA is right in saying that what happened was offensive. But investigating it as a possible hate crime, as many in ALANA are calling for, is completely ridiculous.

ALANA was pissed, and judging from their point of view, I would be too if I had a giant gift that I was expecting every year that was taken away from me. Of course, when Nokes didn't back down from his democratic stance on how we elect those in charge, he was called – you guessed it – a racist.

I'll never understand the line of thinking that the ALANA Caucus had with this one. By being given free Senate seats, what the SGA was essentially saying to minority students across campus was "Hey! Since we consider all of you to be too stupid to actually run for senator the same way everyone else does, we are just going to give you some seats so we make sure that everyone is fairly represented on this campus." I think that minority students made it clear that they did, in fact, have the intelligence to run for office when they nabbed twenty-five percent of the Senate with over, "ninety percent of ALANA sponsored candidates winning their respective races," as reported by The Massachusetts Daily Collegian last year. Of course, this still didn't keep ALANA from calling Nokes and senators like Higgins racists.

But let's put the past behind us and talk about the present shall we? Thus far for the year, ALANA has already exceeded its prior level of obnoxiousness from the 2003-2004 school year, with their reaction to the current controversy.

Yes, we all know that Higgins and the others were not exactly what most would term "brainy" after posting pictures of the fun they had on March 29 online. While I disagree with the assertion that this is proof that they are blatantly racist, ALANA is right in saying that what happened was offensive. But investigating it as a possible hate crime, as many in ALANA are calling for, is completely ridiculous.

ALANA has been extremely hypocritical during my UMass career on the concept of free speech. For instance, last year, when the SGA elections were thrown out, students from ALANA cried foul and duct taped over their mouths, claiming that they had been silenced. More recently, at a forum a couple weeks ago, students booed Vice-Chancellor Michael Gargano after he said, "in this world everyone has the right to free speech." Booing someone for stating the rights one has as an American, especially after you spend so much time whining about how your own rights have been taken away, is just plain dumb. Despite how legitimate ALANA's claims may be, Pat Higgins would have the right to be a racist if he so chose to because of the First Amendment. As the philosopher Voltaire said, "I may disagree with what you have to say, but I shall defend, to the death, your right to say it." The only valid reason ever for throwing Higgins out of school would be for drinking in the Student Union.

Finally, there was the rally sponsored by ALANA last Tuesday, which contained some of the most dim-witted quotes I have ever heard. There was the line from professor John Bracey about UMass being "an all-white racist institution," thus confirming ALANA's own hypocrisy by stereotyping whites as the reason to why racial problems are present at UMass. But my personal favorite had to be from Anthony Ratcliff when he told protestors to "be disrespectful, because they disrespect us." Apparently ALANA had its top mathematicians working on a new equation that proved the theory that two wrongs do equal a right. ALANA showed that it wasn't afraid to sink to the supposed level of those it attacks with that excerpt. Making it more outrageous, and to his credit, SGA president Eddie Busiamante had previously told the crowd to "act as grown-ups and march towards Whitmore as adult members of the University of Massachusetts." Somehow Ratcliff felt justified in instructing the crowd to act like jackasses.

So there you have it. ALANA is correct when it says that there is an intolerable level of racism on this campus. But the means that it has taken to address race issues are wholly unacceptable. Making examples out of students who aren't racists or telling brooding crowds to be ill-mannered is not the way to change things. What should be an organization that truly addresses the needs of minorities at UMass just seems to be a nasty set of talking heads that are more nauseating as the days go by.

Diagnosing the neo-cons

Yousef Munayyer

Surely we have all heard of this faction. The neo-conservatives, a group of policy buffs who dominate the Defense Department; who always provide for interesting talk or even conspiracy theory. The faction is made up of individuals who are not exactly "conservative." In fact socially speaking they are pretty liberal but national policy is not their forte. Rather they specialize in foreign policy, crafting and planning strategies that will direct the might of the United States.

Cheney, Rumsfeld, Wolfowitz, these names may sound like a familiar cast of characters. From the vice-president of the United States down to members of the defense department policy planning board, the "neo-cons" dominate the foreign policy in the nation today.

One thing to keep in mind about this lovely bunch of characters is that they are always planning. The policies, which are in effect today reflect the writings which they have published in the past decade. The scary part is that it's all out there in the open. You can read reports by many of these individuals, which call for a take over of Arab nations, pre-emptive nuclear strikes, and regime change.

The scary part is that it's all out there in the open. You can read reports by many of these individuals which call for a take over of Arab nations, pre-emptive nuclear strikes, and regime change.

The neo-cons developed after the Vietnam era. They come from a school of thinkers who were disgusted by America's withdrawal from Vietnam. They developed at the end of the Carter administration however, most significantly during the Reagan administration. However let's make one thing perfectly clear, neo-cons are not republicans or democrats, they, like parasites feed on the nearest host.

Under Reagan, the Iran contra was a huge embarrassment and many of these individuals were right in the middle of this mess. Including Larry Franklin who was investigated during the contra and was once again investigated this summer for possible espionage charges and transferring secret information to Israel. Several neo-cons are practically in bed with Israel, particularly Israel's right-wing parties. In the 1990s several neo-cons, namely Perle and Fieth were acting as political advisors to Benjamin Netanyahu, then Israeli prime minister. In fact "A Clean Break: A New Strategy for Securing the Realm" a policy report which dealt with several policy recommendations, such as dealing with regional enemies (Iraq, Syria, Iran) and subduing the Palestinian Authority. This report was given to Netanyahu and then almost repeated word for word in a speech he gave to congress.

So what happened when the Bush administration came to power? The influences of these policy makers became clear, even though Netanyahu was no longer in power, his counterpart Ariel Sharon was there to play his part. Arafat was sidelined and the United States adopted a policy of not recognizing him, a drastic shift from the peace negotiations, which the Clinton administration and the rest of the world seemed to support. Also, shortly after 9-11 the axis of evil was named and Israel's regional foes became a target.

However this is only one faction within a faction. Not every neo-con is in on the game because of their fervent support for Israel. In fact, those who have interests else where, say Halliburton, use their positions of power to suit those interests, Cheney doesn't give a damn about Israel, but he follows suit when he has to.

Let's look at North Korea for an example. That regime may be the most brutal regime that we know of. Starvation is wide spread, as is corruption and underdevelopment. The society is militarized, alienated and scared. Proliferation has become part of daily government business and if you don't know what I'm talking about ask Abdul Qadeer Khan. So looking at the national defense strategy, we should be in North Korea liberating people already, but we aren't. What's the explanation? The factions within the neo-cons can't agree on North Korea. That is why our policy towards North Korea is strikingly similar to that of the Clinton administration. The Israeli faction sees no direct benefit for their interests and the oil and contract guzzling faction found no place to drill. This is why we are in Iraq and not North Korea. Iraq is a place that suits the interests of the entire neo-conservative group.

Also, this shouldn't be misunderstood as a claim of, "Jews rule the world" because that is simply absurd. This is about the politics of interests and some of the people in power in the United States share strategic interests with right wing parties in Israel. If religion plays any roll in this administration it would be Christian fundamentalism, the glue that holds the rest of the administration together, blinding them of their moral corruption. If this should teach us anything, particularly in an election year when foreign policy is a major issue, it is that we cannot only consider who is running for office, but it is also vital to think about whom they will be surrounding themselves with.

The prospects of invasion

Mike Sances

I've had two professors recently inform their students that the United States will be invading Iran within the next six months. This they said with the utmost confidence and seriousness, one of them even claiming that said invasion will go forward regardless of which party controls the White House. Both of these classes were large lectures, so in order to counter what may have since become a disseminating rumor, I will now explain why this notion of war with Iran struck me at once as simply bizarre — even within the sadly narrow grounds within which these professors' minds apparently operate. A reality in which the Executive Branch acts recklessly and unilaterally, unrestrained by Congress, the public, or even the slightest legal or moral justification.

The first thing that should come to mind, when faced with the suggestion of invading Iran, is that it has been clear for some time that the United States does not attack countries who actually possess nuclear weapons, or even countries who actively pursue a nuclear weapons program. Nor does it attack countries with formidable armies: according to Mark Levey of ZNet, Iran has a potential force of up to twelve million. Iran, in short, is not prewar Iraq, which had been rendered near defenseless by a decade of international sanctions. The country is instead far more similar, in this respect at least, to North Korea — who, it might be noted, is apparently overlooked by those predicting war with its counterpart. Still, this discrepancy might be explained by the Islamic state's more strategic location.

... right now the military is notoriously overstretched. Any additional military operations against a country like Iran would most likely require a draft.

Yet that is only one reason war with Iran is unlikely. Another, perhaps just as obvious, is that right now the military is notoriously overstretched. Any additional military operations against a country like Iran would most likely require a draft. Even disregarding the repeated statements of both the President and the Secretary of Defense, who insist there will not be any such thing while they are in office, it should be obvious that conscription is definitely not in the interests of an oligarchy intent on carrying out meaningless and protracted wars for the sole benefit of the elite class. And I think those in power know this, too (last week the House voted 402-2 against Charlie Rangel's conscription bill).

The idea that we might instead pull our forces out of Iraq to attack Iran, which has also been suggested to me, doesn't sound too plausible either, since the whole point of attacking Iraq — indeed, the only explanation that makes consistent sense — is to establish a prolonged military presence in an oil-rich nation at the center of a crucial region. This process has already begun as the Chicago Tribune reported on March 26, in the form of fourteen "enduring bases" in the country "designed to last for years."

Also, assuming that war planners in Washington have a brain cell or two, it should be clear to them that the last time they invaded a Middle Eastern country, it turned out to be an utter disaster. Indeed, if the US were to invade Iran, we would have to go about it in an entirely novel way, allowing for all the surprises encountered in Iraq.

Despite all of this, I admit that the prospect of yet another war has caused me to be more receptive to press coverage of US-Iran relations. Though I've yet to find anything that even considers the arguments I've laid out above, I have learned a little bit more as to "why" a conflict with Iran might occur.

Israel — who continues to possess nuclear weapons and who routinely violates UN resolutions, but who is conspicuously not subject to US invasion — is worried that Iran may produce a nuclear weapon in the near future. Despite Iran's consistent denial of these allegations, and full compliance with the International Atomic Energy Association (both of which you can find in any of the recent news articles on the subject), the world has pretty much concluded that Iran is pursuing nuclear weapons, no doubt to defend itself against potential Israeli aggression. Israel, at the same time, is reportedly gearing up for a preventive strike on Iran, reminiscent of its 1981 attack on Iraq's Osirik nuclear reactor. The conflict, then, would play out as such: Israel first attacks Iran with its air force; Iran, seeing Israel as a US proxy, then moves against American forces in neighboring Iraq; the US uses Iraq as a military base to fight Iran.

Still, I am forced to conclude that the notion of war with Iran is, to coin a phrase, "tenuous at best" — even within the solely pragmatic framework that I've just run through, which ignores all the moral and legal arguments waiting in the wings. Those who see war with Iran as inevitable, then, have convinced themselves of either one of two things: that the United States is no longer a democracy, but is instead run by a small group of ideologues; or, far more gravely, that our foreign policy is determined by the perceived security interests of a small client state.

It would have taken only the slightest shred of optimism for these doomsayers to append their predictions by saying that this nightmare scenario will occur only "if we let it." The merest adherence to ideals of American democracy loudly affirms, "We won't!"

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

RAISING GLBT AWARENESS

Yesterday was National Coming Out Day. Granted, it may not be New Year's Eve, St. Patrick's Day, or even Homecoming, but for many of your peers, it's much more important.

Beyond the public expression of sexual orientation, National Coming Out Day is also a time for all gay lesbian bisexual and trans people and our allies to reflect upon the struggles and oppressions, social and self-imposed, that gay and lesbian Americans continue to face in this country every single day. In addition, it is a time to reaffirm that we, as a community, support an environment where every person lives free from fear and discrimination.

For those of you who are not members of the GLBT community, National Coming Out Day may not be a noteworthy time. But it should be significant, because more likely than not, you are friends with, took a class alongside, or have someone in your family who is gay or lesbian (though you may not know it). And for these people, coming out of the closet remains a long, difficult, and emotional process; I speak from experience. We face fear, discrimination, harassment, rejection, and even violence by revealing our sexual orientation. And this is why we need your support.

The easiest way you can support your gay and lesbian friends is by creating an accepting environment, not just on your campus, but in the nation as well. This means choosing a leader who respects and supports gay and lesbian Americans in their struggles.

President Bush has used the lives of gay and lesbian Americans as a political tool. He has pandered to homophobia and bigotry for political purposes, and has attempted to enshrine in the constitution permanent second-class citizen status for GLBT Americans. In George W. Bush's country, GLBT people are a threat to the fabric of America.

On the other hand, John Kerry opposes the Federal Marriage Amendment. He was one of only 14 Senators to vote against the "Defense of Marriage Act" in 1996. And he passionately opposed the discriminating "Don't Ask, Don't Tell" policy.

Additionally, John Kerry supports the passage of comprehensive hate-crimes legislation and the Employment Non-Discrimination Act, so GLBT people can work in environments free of discrimination. John Kerry has a long record of supporting gays and lesbians, and he understands that the real threats to America are not the expressions of sexual orientation, but prejudice and fear.

Oct. 11 was an important day for GLBT people across this country, but the truth is, we are more concerned with the quality of our lives for the next four years. When you go into the voting booth or mark your absentee ballot on Nov. 2, think of how far gays and lesbians have come as a community, and how far we still must go. And vote for a president who will respect our dignity and our rights.

"Superman" actor Christopher Reeve, who turned personal tragedy into a public crusade and from his wheelchair became the nation's most recognizable spokesman for spinal cord research, has died. He was 52.

Reeve went into cardiac arrest Saturday while at his Pound Ridge home, then fell into a coma and died Sunday at a hospital surrounded by his family, his publicist said.

His advocacy for stem cell research helped it emerge as a major campaign issue between President Bush and his Democratic opponent, John Kerry. His name was even mentioned by Kerry during the second presidential debate Friday evening.

In the last week Reeve had developed a serious systemic infection from a pressure wound, a common complication for people living with paralysis. He entered the hospital Saturday.

Dana Reeve thanked her husband's personal staff of nurses and aides, "as well as the millions of fans from around the world."

Before the 1995 accident, his athletic, 6-foot-4-inch frame and love of adventure made him a natural, if largely unknown, choice for the title role in the first "Superman" movie in 1978. He insisted on performing his own stunts.

"Look, I've flown, I've become evil, loved, stopped and turned the world backward, I've faced my peers, I've befriended children and small animals and I've rescued cats from trees," Reeve told the Los Angeles Times in 1983, just before the release of the third "Superman" movie. "What else is there left for Superman to do that hasn't been done?"

Though he owed his fame to it, Reeve made a concerted effort to, as he often put it, "escape the cape." He played an embittered, crippled Vietnam veteran in the 1980 Broadway play "Fifth of July," a lovestruck time-traveler in the 1980 movie "Somewhere in Time," and

Jim Breuer, again excites crowd at the Fine Arts Center

By REID DAVENPORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It had been almost two years since former Saturday Night Live star Jim Breuer played to a packed house at the Fine Arts Center. This past Saturday evening was no different. Despite the long weekend, when many students chose to go home, the Student Activities Center once again provided Breuer with a packed house to perform to.

It was an event that may not have happened if Breuer felt like he did last time he came to the University of Massachusetts.

"I was tired of stand up," said Breuer. "The Comedy Central show fell through [last fall] because they kept holding me back. Now I have the best gig of my life doing a radio show for Sirius Satellite on the Raw Dog channel every Friday night," Breuer said. "It's better than SNL and Half-Baked. It's the best thing that has ever happened to me. I can say whatever and do whatever I want."

Breuer was also without guitar man and comedian Paul Bond this time around. Bond can, however, can be seen playing guitar on Breuer's Comedy Central special. Jim said that Paul wanted to do his own thing for this go around. So they went their separate ways.

After, the crowd overwhelmed with student representation, welcomed Breuer with a standing ovation. He slapped some hands up front, shouted a bit, let the audience calm down and then began taunting people in the audience who came in late. He followed with his own definition of his favorite curse word.

Breuer immediately dove into a pro-Red Sox speech. Being a Mets fan, Breuer has found himself in the same situation most Sox fans are in praying for playoff victory over the Yankees.

"I have something to announce," exclaimed Breuer. "I officially reversed the curse. I played at Hampton Beach this summer when the Red Sox came back at Fenway to beat the Yankees and I announced they won on stage. Someone tossed a Sox hat up and I did a little prayer for the rest of the night," Breuer said.

"The Yankees get players because they have a mob deal," Breuer joked to the delight of the crowd. "They went and got the best player in the whole country of Japan. The whole country. They went and got him because they just sent little Joe Pesci over to get him into the limo and bring him back." Breuer kept the act going by doing his Joe Pesci imitation and noting how the Yankees used the mob to get Matsui and A-Rod.

Jumping from the topic of baseball to politics Breuer kept the laughter coming while touching on a more serious subject. He poked fun at President George W. Bush, saying that he is not a true leader and that America is constantly being shown things that aren't real life.

"If Bush is re-elected," said Breuer. "It's going to be the worst time in American history. He's a nightmare, a phony, and he really scares me."

"You guys have to stop it with the porn," Breuer continued on the topic of what reality is. "That's not real life. No woman does that stuff, unless she's wicked drunk."

Breuer also found himself in a situation most comedians are familiar with in hecklers from the crowd.

"You came all the way here just to shout that?" Breuer joked towards a heckler named Phil. "You go to college, where you are supposed to be getting an education. You come all the way here and your mind thinks, 'What's the most educated thing I could possibly say?' And that was it?"

Breuer also touched upon his family life and how as adults, we get up in the morning read the paper, watch TV, and drink our coffee. But to his five year old daughter, it's just another day in which she can get up to play with her dad.

"Daddy, you're a bad man and you can't catch me because I'm a cat, 'MEOW!'" said Breuer, imitating his daughter. "Kids are just so energetic and they just want to play, play, and play because they don't have a care in the world."

He then jumped back into the serious topic of drug abuse and how when he was in high school he had a buddy who gave him drugs that made him "freak out."

"He probably said, 'Look out for the oil stains when we're walking because you don't want to fall in the dark,'" Breuer started. "But what I heard was, 'Whatever you do, don't step in the darkness.' So, I ended up stepping in the darkness, and I was freaking out. All my buddies are laughing at me in super slow motion."

Breuer consistantly had the audience filled with laughter by dishing out physical comedy and ending with his skits entitled "Party in the Stomach" and "The Three Armed Umpire."

Breuer ended by thanking the crowd and informing them that his radio show airs on Sirius Satellite. He also plans on having a music and comedy album out soon. His other projects include a homemade DVD and a cartoon short, which he hopes to post on his official website JimBreuer.com in December.

"I'm thinking of doing a tour in late spring," Breuer mentioned. "I'd bring the crew from my radio show and I would like to bring a popular band with me."

"I loved the reaction of the crowd here," Breuer said following the show. "Maybe I could do an HBO special here." Student Activities Assistant Director of Staff Lloyd Henley replied, "just tell me when."

More info on Jim Breuer and tour dates can be found at JimBreuer.com. For more information on upcoming events put on by the Student Activities Center you can check out http://www.umass.edu/umhome/events/.

Reeve passes on at age 52

an aspiring playwright in the 1982 suspense thriller "Deathtrap."

More recent films included John Carpenter's "Village of the Damned," and the HBO movies "Above Suspicion" and "In the Gloaming," which he directed. Among his other film credits are "The Remains of the Day," "The Aviator," and "Morning Glory."

Reeve's life changed completely after he broke his neck in May 1995 when he was thrown from his horse during an equestrian competition in Culpeper, Va.

Enduring months of therapy to allow him to breathe for longer and longer periods without a respirator, Reeve emerged to lobby Congress for better insurance protection against catastrophic injury. He moved an Academy Award audience to tears with a call for more films about social issues.

"Hollywood needs to do more," he said in the 1996 Oscar awards appearance. "Let's continue to take risks. Let's tackle the issues. In many ways our film community can do it better than anyone else."

He returned to directing, and even returned to acting in a 1998 production of "Rear Window," a modern update of the Hitchcock thriller about a man in a wheelchair who becomes convinced a neighbor has been murdered. Reeve won a Screen Actors Guild award for best actor in a TV movie or miniseries.

"I was worried that only acting with my voice and my face, I might not be able to communicate effectively enough to tell the story," Reeve said. "But I was surprised to find that if I really concentrated, and just let the thoughts happen, that they would read on my face."

In 2000, Reeve was able to move his index finger, and a specialized workout regimen made his legs and arms stronger. With rigorous therapy, involving repeated electrical stimulation of the muscles, he also regained sensation in other parts of his body. He vowed to walk again.

"I refuse to allow a disability to determine how I live my life. I don't mean to be reckless, but setting a goal that seems a bit daunting actually is very helpful toward recovery," Reeve said.

Dr. John McDonald treated Reeve as director of the Spinal Cord Injury Program at Washington University in St. Louis. He called Reeve "one of the most intense individuals I've ever met in my life."

"Before him there was really no hope," McDonald said. "If you had a spinal cord injury like his there was not much that could be done, but he's changed all that. He's demonstrated that there is hope and that there are things that can be done."

Reeve was born Sept. 25, 1952, in New York City, son of a novelist and a newspaper reporter. About the age of 10, he made his first stage appearance in Gilbert and Sullivan's "The Yeoman of the Guard" at a theater in Princeton, N.J.

After graduating from Cornell University in 1974, he landed a part as coldhearted bigamist Ben Harper on the soap opera "Love of Life." He also performed frequently on stage, winning his first Broadway role as the grandson of Katharine Hepburn's character in "A Matter of Gravity."

Reeve's first movie role was a minor one in the submarine disaster movie "Gray Lady Down," released in 1978. "Superman" soon followed. Reeve was selected for the role from among about 200 aspirants.

While filming "Superman" in London, Reeve met modeling agency co-founder Gae Exton, and the two began a relationship that lasted several years. The couple had a son and a daughter, but never wed.

Reeve later married Dana Morosini; they had one son, Will, 12. Reeve also is survived by his mother, Barbara Johnson; his father, Franklin Reeve; his brother, Benjamin Reeve; and his two children from his relationship with Exton, Matthew, 25, and Alexandra, 21.

No plans for a funeral were immediately announced.

In his 1998 book, "Still Me," he recalled that after the accident, when he contemplating giving up, his wife told him: "I want you to know that I'll be with you for the long haul, no matter what. You're still you. And I love you."

His children helped, too, he told interviewer Barbara Walters. "I could see how much they needed me and wanted me ... and how lucky we all are and that my brain is on straight."

Singer Ciara's single 'Goodies' climbs to number one on the Billboard Top 100

By JIM FARBER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Let's hear it for soundalike hits. First, Usher racked up the biggest single of the year with "Yeah!"

Now, a new singer named Ciara (pronounced Sierra) has struck No. 1 with a single called "Goodies" that makes you go, "Hmmm, where have I heard this one before?"

Ciara 'Goodies' LaFace

"That's an opinion," Ciara says, before admitting it's one she has heard many times before. "I didn't look at the song like that." But her collaborators must have.

"Goodies" was produced by Lil Jon (who oversaw "Yeah!") and co-written by Sean Garrett (who wrote the Usher powerhouse). Small wonder it has nearly the same synth hook and virtually the same beat.

It's the "crunk" beat – that signature Southern hip-hop sound that has, in the last year, kidnapped the attention of the entire country.

Ciara's debut CD, conveniently titled after the smash, hit stores last week.

Though Ciara's name appears first on the credits, the recording gives more space to "guest" rapper Petey Pablo. The singer provides a counterpoint monotone murmur that could well be the most minimal vocal in a pop single since "Gimmie Dat Ding." Judging by the record, Ciara's voice is understated enough to make Janet Jackson sound like Maria Callas.

"I'm not saying I'm Whitney Houston," the singer admits. "This record isn't about singing, singing, singing. It's just a vibe." If nothing else, Ciara makes a great spokesmodel for the record. In fact, the 18-year-old (whose last name is Harris and whose first name comes from the perfume) wanted to be a model growing up, not a singer. She has done runway work in her native Atlanta. She switched her attention to vocal work after seeing Destiny's Child perform on TV when she was 14.

"I could dance and I could model, so I thought, 'Let's be an artist,'" she explains.

She had an agent who got her a meeting with Jazzy Pha, of Sho Nuff Records. He became her mentor, much like Irv Gotti is to Ashanti. Jazzy hooked Ciara up with Lil Jon.

Ciara wrote the hit's lyrics, which have a funny hook line. "If you're looking for goodies," she tells a guy who comes on to her, "keep on looking/'cause they stay in the jar."

Ciara admits her debut album isn't the deepest CD in the bins, but says, "That will come later. I don't want to give you everything right now."

Right now, it's smarter to give people what they already love.

How do you follow up ten years of success in the music industry? If you're Henry Grimes, you disappear. The fabled bassist recorded with a who's-who of jazz legends (including Benny Goodman, Coleman Hawkins and Charles Mingus) between 1957 and 1966 before he promptly left this career behind to pursue largely sterile, though no less noble endeavors.

In 2002, bassist William Parker came across Grimes living in a one-room apartment in Los Angeles and eventually found him a bass (he did not own one). Today, you can find the elder lowender playing with musicians the like of John Zorn, Marc Ribot, Nels Cline and Andrew Cyrille.

Parker will perform and lecture tonight at 7 p.m. at the University of Massachusetts' Augusta Savage Gallery, located in the New Africa House. Admission is free. For more information, contact the Augusta Savage Gallery at (413) 545-5177.

SaturdayOctober16

The Incomparable Jazz Mandolin Project makes its way to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall. Mandolin virtuoso Jamie Masefield's famed quartet (of which he is the only original member) always puts on a great show. They did so last December in a show also at the Iron Horse. On Saturday evening, the jazz/grass soiree should be no different.

The current incarnation of the band includes Masefield, Scott Ritchie on bass, Michael "Mad Dog" Mavridoglou on trumpet and keyboards and the wildly talented Dan Weiss on drums. Tickets are $12.50 in advance, and $15 at the door; show is at 10 p.m.

WednesdayOctober20

Smith College's Otelia Cromwell Series will host Paul Frymer, author of "Uneasy Alliances: Race and Party Competition in America" Wednesday, at 7 p.m., in the Neilson Browsing Room. The author will discuss the role of race in electoral politics.

Otelia Cromwell was the first African-American to graduate from Smith, back in 1900. Smith college will celebrate Otelia Cromwell Day on Nov. 2.

The Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts brings us "The Look of India," a photo essay by Blair Boudreau and Kelly Basner Wednesday at 7 p.m. The exhibit presents recent documentation of the architecture, animals and people of North and South India. Basner will be on hand to comment. This event is free, and will be held in the lobby.

SaturdayOctober23

Bowker Auditorium will host a performance of "James Baldwin: Down from the Mountaintop," a one-man play by Calvin Levels. The Tony award nominee will also be on hand to perform his composition, Saturday at 8 p.m.

The play will detail the life of the famed novelist, essayist, playwright and civil rights activist. Tickets are $5 for UMass students, $7.50 for 5-College students and $10 for the public.

Hunter Trio sounds off at the Iron Horse

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

Musicians make use of sound differently. Ben Folds can impregnate a room with nothing more than his voice and piano. Five-piece rock ensemble 311 struggle to even fill the amphitheatres that they call home. The Charlie Hunter Trio, however, tore apart Northampton's cozy Iron Horse Music Hall Friday night when they applied their self-proclaimed "rhythm music" to every spare surface in the joint.

Charlie Hunter Trio
Iron Horse
Northampton
Oct. 8

If you do it right, three musicians can sound like twenty. These cats know how to use space.

Who needs twenty when you've got the Charlie Hunter Trio? Opening with "Moore's Alphabet," the closing track on their new album, "Friends Seen and Unseen," Hunter and company rocked the house for close to two hours, distributing generous helpings of their soul-infused sound to the lucky few in attendance. Even at capacity, you can only cram so many students and/or aging hippies into the hallowed hall.

Everyone gets seconds when Uncle Charlie comes to dinner. Eight-string guitar in hand, Hunter blew minds with every phrase. Sinuous bass lines were coupled with scorching guitar licks at every turn, all courtesy of one man's hands; Hunter essentially performs the duties of two musicians. The trio tours without a bassist.

Derek Phillips is no slouch, either. A slammin' drummer with impeccable taste, Phillips' task is no cakewalk. Supporting a guitarist as tremendous as Hunter, and a reeds-man as talented as John Ellis, requires hig-time chops and masterful listening skills, but make no mistake, Phillips is the man for the job. His drumming on the heavy tune "Running in Fear from Imaginary Assailants" was exceptional and damn funky.

Speaking of big-time chops, enter tenor saxophonist John Ellis (he broke out his bass clarinet at the show as well). The man simply drips with tone and style, as evidenced by his solos on tunes like the quirky "Lulus Crawl."

One needs merely to sit back, or stand up, for that matter and enjoy a show by these guys. True road warriors, their performance that night stank of a telepathy that only comes from playing together day in and day out. The interplay between the musicians, the way they wove lines around each other, and in between one another, was remarkable.

Their abilities caught the eye of an awesome new record label. "Friends" is Hunter's third release for Ropeadope records (each one features Phillips and Ellis), and the partnership is seemingly fruitful; "Friends Seen and Unseen, Right Now Move" and "Right Now Live" (a DVD documenting the Right Now Move tour) are all excellent.

As would be expected. The Charlie Hunter Trio is kicking out the jams right now in support of their new disc, and it looks like they can do no wrong; they're putting out great records, and backing it up with a spectacular live show. Please, check these guys out.

Sax-man Calder Spanier was added to fill out the band's sound.

Red Sox ready for Yankees

about 60 pitches in a bullpen session, according to pitching coach Mel Stottlemyre.

Major league baseball decided Monday to move Game 5, the only scheduled afternoon contest of the series, into prime time, bumping the NLCS to the earlier time slot. They are the two biggest spenders in baseball, the Yankees at $186.4 million and the Red Sox at $128.1 million, according to the Aug. 31 payroll. Judging by the TV ratings, baseball fans are captivated by New York's Derek Jeter and Alex Rodriguez and Boston's Manny Ramirez and David Ortiz.

"I know this is what everyone was hoping for, I imagine," Mussina said. "I think it's the way it should be."

Schilling, acquired by the Red Sox from Arizona last November, plays for moments like these. He's won six straight postseason decisions since 1993, allowing two earned runs or fewer in all nine of his starts. He beat Mussina for the Diamondbacks in the 2001 World Series opener, then defeated him again on April 15 this year at Fenway Park.

"I don't know that I've ever pitched in a game that will have the atmosphere that tomorrow's game has. In Arizona during the World Series, it was electric," Schilling said, "but I think the Yankees and the Red Sox is a step above everything else."

Wearing a T-shirt with the words "Why Not Us?" Schilling talked about how he likes to quiet fans when he pitches on the road — especially Yankees fans' still giddy following the seventh straight AL East title for New York (101-61) and the seventh second-place finish in a row by Boston (98-64).

"It's going to be loud," he predicted. "It's going to be thunderous."

Schilling, who went 21-6 to lead the major leagues in wins, threw short tosses Monday, a day after testing out an injection of painkillers on his right ankle.

Three years ago, he said the Diamondbacks weren't intimidated by the Yankees because "mystique and aura, those are dancers in a nightclub, those are not things we concern ourselves on the ball field." Then he watched New York hit tying two-run homers in the bottom of the ninth on consecutive nights to win Games 4 and 5 before Arizona rallied against Rivera in Game 7 to stop New York's streak of three straight titles.

He knows games like these define careers.

"You can make a name for yourself in one inning, one play, one pitch that you can't make in another series with any other teams," he said.

Curt Schilling pitched seven and two-thirds strong innings to reach the 20-win plateau for the third time in his career.

Penalties hurt the game

Jeff Howe

The Massachusetts hockey team defeated Clarkson 6-4 on Saturday night at the Mullins Center in a contest that shouldn't be confused with a hockey game, because it just wasn't hockey.

It closer resembled a group of guys skating around the rink with seemingly common goals while referees randomly stopped play to send a new person into the penalty box, over, and over and over again.

Sure, the win will still count for UMass and likewise the loss for Clarkson. All of the stats will be tallied, and Matt Anderson will still be the CCM Hockey Player of the Week for his three-goal and two-assist performance. But it still wasn't hockey.

There were rarely five skaters on the ice for both teams at the same time due to the 28 penalties that were called during the 60-minute contest. Out of the 10 goals scored, seven were on the power play, one was shorthanded, one was during a four-on-four and only one was during five-on-five play.

UMass clearly had the better special teams play as the scoreboard showed, but who was the best team at regular strength. The Minutemen had a 1-0 advantage in that department, but since less than half the game was played at even strength it's tough to really give an answer to that.

And it may turn out to be that way for the entire season since the NCAA has told its referees to call much tighter games. The result has been ugly to this point in the very young college hockey season.

Penalties were way up over the weekend, and most of the games had a similar amount of residents in the penalty box as there were in Amherst on Saturday night.

"It's a frustrating game when it's played that way," Clarkson coach George Roll said.

It's frustrating for the players, but it's just as frustrating for the fans who are trying to get into the game.

There was never any rhythm established because of the ongoing sporadic whistles.

Alienating the fans should be the last thing the NCAA should want to do, especially with the NHL lockout still going strong.

College hockey has a tremendous chance to get on the national map since hockey fans will have little else to watch in the coming months. No one will want to tune into any games if they are going to be continually called like this.

And with television networks like ESPN already hesitant to sign any college hockey deals, the chances of making this game a mainstream event will diminish as the referees are set to determine the style of the game instead of letting the players play it out.

The calls weren't swayed toward either side, with both teams being whistled 14 times. Individually, however, the penalties were confusing and very inconsistent.

"It's frustrating for the players," Roll said. "They're not sure what they can or can't do. You make a body check, and (the ref) calls you for a trip."

The NCAA is supposedly trying to open the game up more for the skaters by minimizing clutching and grabbing in the corners and while skating up the ice. The governing body of college sports is saying that, as a result of the tight calls, the game will ultimately be more exciting.

For this to happen, players will have to go through a transitional phase to learn how to play a different game than the one they have been playing their entire lives.

Until everyone figures out which game that is, though, don't call what you're seeing, "hockey".

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist.

sign that officials will actually be cracking down on obstruction and interference, as addressed in a letter from the NCAA given to coaches a few weeks ago.

"It's really hard, you don't get any flow to the game, it's a bit discouraging," said UMass forward Stephen Werner, who had a goal and three assists. "It's not that much fun when that many calls are going on. We found out about [the crackdown] about a week and a half ago, and obviously you think they're going to do something like that, but I had no idea that it would be this severe, and that they'd be making this many calls. It'll probably take a few games for teams to get used to it."

In all, 12 obstruction and interference calls were made, as well as three holding whistles. UMass coach Don Cahoon, who had already seen a few penalty-filled games in preseason scouting, was not surprised at the number of trips to the box that each team made.

"That's just the way it is," Cahoon said. "It was interesting from a coaching standpoint, because I knew it was going to take shape that way. So I was very accepting, for the first time in my life that those calls were going to be made.

"I think the idea is to change the culture," he said. "[The officials] claim that they're going to be calling the game the same way at the end of the year, and it's up to the players to play it. The game didn't seem to be excessively hostile tonight, and it looked like the game could have broken out a lot earlier, and finally in the third period they let it break out, and it became an entertaining event."

Indeed, only four penalties were called in the final frame, compared to nine in the second period and a whopping 15 in the first.

When not playing special teams, which took up nearly half the game, both squads played well. The Minutemen opened the scoring 6:47 in, when Marvin Degon took a feed from Werner, who won an offensive-zone faceoff, and fired a slap shot that beat Traylen high.

But Latullippe scored in the 16th minute of the first period for Clarkson, and responded again less than a minute after Anderson scored his first of the night. Werner sent the Minutemen to the locker room with a lead, converting on a power-play feed from Degon with 29 seconds left.

The Golden Knights established a foothold in the second period, as Chris Blight and Steve Zalewski bookended the frame with goals at 5:18 and 17:35, respectively. The Minutemen were hurt by penalties throughout the second period, but survived the onslaught and rebounded in the third.

Though neither goaltender made any waves, UMass' Gabe Winer earned the win with a respectable 29-save performance, and saw a barrage of shots in the first period but held together throughout. Traylen was narrowly outmatched, making 26 stops on 33 shots.

Anderson opens with a hat-trick

trick goal, doesn't exactly cast the same shadow as Mauldin, the scoring ability of Werner and Anderson was still evident all night. The duo teamed effortlessly on every shift, as they did in the exhibition against St. Francis Xavier on Oct. 2 when they combined for the game-winning goal in overtime.

"I think when you have two good players, the chemistry is just there automatically," said Werner, who assisted on Anderson's second and third goals. "I felt it the first time I skated with [Anderson], and it's just great to be back on the ice with him."

A year's absence, even with strenuous off-ice workout and occasional stints on the ice after practice, would normally result in slowed reflexes and less ice time. Anderson, however, led the Minutemen in shots (six), and his top line was on the ice in some shape or form, especially with the massive amount of penalties called both ways, and the loss of a third line winger (freshman Zech Klann) in the first period.

"I wasn't planning on playing him in the exhibition last week, but we didn't have a couple people, there were some guys who were banged up," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "So I said, 'Jeez, we'll get him out there,' and I think after I saw him last week, even in special teams, I realized this kid's going to be productive, that's for sure. Matt's got a great feel for the game. It's really nice to have him back, he fills a void, that's for sure."

Ever the team-oriented leader, Anderson responded to one post-game question about his early success with an answer about the team's general performance.

"I think it's early. I think we need to do this in April when it really counts. It's too early in the season to judge," he said, clearly referring to the squad's overall work in the 6-4 victory.

Announcing New User-Friendly Meter Paystations!

Parking Services is installing new parking meter paystations, one in the Visitor's Lot south of the Visitor's Center, and a second in the parking meter section of Lot 40-Boyden. These new user-friendly paystations will take the place of the existing individual space meters.

These paystations offer such features as multiple language instructions and the ability to pay for parking without returning to your vehicle with a parking ticket. Customers simply enter the number of their parking space into paystation, select an amount of time, then select a payment method. Initially coin, bills, and credit cards will be accepted and in the near future, the paystations will accept Ucards and calls from cell and telephones to purchase additional time.

For further information, please visit Parking Services website at http://parking.umass.edu or contact Rob Hendry at 413-545-0065.

you don't want your quarterback to be throwing the ball 50 times a game, but that's what happens when you can't run the ball."

"There were a couple drops, a couple missed assignments and we didn't run the ball very well," Day said. "I don't know where to pinpoint the problems."

Another consistent problem was Day's inability to get the ball in the hands of All-Conference wide receiver Jason Peebler. The senior captain finished with three catches for 20 yards, and has not made a major impact since his 50-yard touchdown reception in a loss to Richmond.

"It's frustrating not getting the ball," Peebler said. "It's something I'm probably going to bring up, because I feel if I got the ball more in certain situations I could make some things happen."

Asked about the possibility of making a major change on offense due to the struggles – with one possibility clearly being replacing Day with freshman Liam Coen, Brown was hesitant to make a decision right away.

"I'm not going to make that statement right now after an emotional football game," UMass' first-year coach said. "That's something that we have to analyze and take a look at."

Day, meanwhile, was not concerned with his job security, and replied with "No, not at all," when asked if he was worried about losing his starting position.

After a Christian Koegel punt pinned James Madison down at its own four-yard line with 8:51 to play in the third quarter, the Dukes used 11 plays to march 96 yards and break the scoreless tie. Tailback Raymond Hines ripped off the drive's biggest play – a 61-yard gain on 3rd-and-three to move JMU down to the UMass 14-yard line – before quarterback Justin Rascati eventually plunged in from one yard out to put the Dukes up 7-0 at the 4:01 mark of the third quarter.

James Madison then forced UMass to go three-and-out on its next possession, and quickly doubled its advantage with a 12-play, 63-yard scoring march. Relying on the legs of Fenner and Hines, who gained a combined 36 yards on the drive, the Dukes moved down to the Minuteman 5-yard line and Rascati again found the end zone, this time diving for the goal line to complete a scamper that made the score 14-0 with 11:56 to play.

JMU safety Tony LeZotte set up JMU's third score when he intercepted Day and returned the ball 10 yards to the UMass 24-yard line. From there, Hines carried the ball 15 yards down to the 9-yard line and then put the Dukes' on the board again with a nine-yard burst into the end zone to give James Madison a 21-0 lead.

UMass finally answered back on its next possession, as Day found Moore over the middle with a 40-yard pass on the first play of the drive, and eventually hooked up with tight end Mike Douglas for a two-yard touchdown pass to cut the deficit to 21-7 with just under five minutes remaining.

Junior receiver Nathanael Hasselbeck catches a ball for the Minutemen. Hasselbeck has 19 yards this year for UMass.

Minutewomen split

Just ten shots between the two teams were taken heading into the second, but that all changed when the wall of the UMass defense was delivered a hole.

Ten minutes in, Megan Ogilvie took a nice feed from Whitney Sikes and rolled a shot that slipped by a diving Kristin Walker and plopped safely into the bottom left corner of the net. The goal put the Spiders ahead 1-0.

Ultimately, it was a 1-0 deficit the Minutewomen could not recover from, due to the fact that they were on the defensive for most of the game.

Canfield had one last chance to tie it up, a breakaway with 30 seconds to go. However, the chance was nullified by a crucial penalty against UMass.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen turned the tables and delivered a shutout of their own, their first since October of 2002. That is, a 2-0 defeat of the George Washington Colonials to wrap up the homestand.

While the affair with Richmond was more of a physical game, Sunday's match with the Colonials boiled down to strategy, not force.

"We definitely dominated [this] game, and it's a win we deserve to win," Bellini said. "You can play well and lose, and you can also play shitty and win. We actually played well and won, so that's good."

Maffucci's return to action made a world of a difference for the Minutewomen, as a more tightly-wound defense allowed the Maroon and White to take 20 shots, their highest single-game total in 2004.

"That was very big," Walker said of Maffucci's return to the lineup. "She's like the voice of our defense, in every aspect. She controls it, keeps everyone in it. If something goes wrong, she keeps everyone's spirits up… very big to have her back."

The defense allowed Walker to receive her first shutout of her career, a huge relief having witnessed several heartbreakers fall through her grasp in 2004.

"This is like a turnaround for this team," Walker added. "Everyone pressured today, and everyone's happy with the result. It feels good."

The Minutewomen first found the back of the net at the 18-minute mark in the first half. Fairweather flipped the ball up to a waiting Adair Blyler on the right side, and in turn she flicked her shot right over the head of goalie Anna Handzlik to make it a 1-0 affair.

It was the first time in four years that the Minutewomen had registered a goal against the Colonials, but it certainly wouldn't be the last.

With 15 minutes left in regulation, Canfield took advantage of some heavy GW pressure and scripted a beautiful counterattack. This one was a one-woman show, however, as she took the ball near her own 18-yard box and streaked down the far sideline untouched. With a thrust of the leg, she booted one at Handzlik, and ball ricocheted off her hands into the net. Handzlik left the game 15 seconds later with a hand injury.

The Minutewomen came away from the homestand with three wins and two losses, and have tied their win total from a year ago with six games to go.

Freshman Britt Canfield has six goals on the season this year for the Minutewomen. Canfield had a goal against GW on Sunday.

Schilling ready to take on Yanks

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Curt Schilling signed with Boston for this very reason — to silence the hated Yankees and pitch the Red Sox to that elusive World Series title.

"I'm not sure I can think of any scenario more enjoyable than making 55,000 people from New York shut up," he said Monday, a day before starting the opener at Yankee Stadium against Mike Mussina.

Before the first pitch was even thrown, the AL championship series had players buzzing. They thought back to the 45 intense meetings between the rivals during the past two years, to the on-field fights and the clubhouse boasts.

But in a series that seemed predestined since Aaron Boone's Game 7 homer off Tim Wakefield won last October's playoff in the 11th inning, there was an element of uncertainty for the Yankees this time. It centered on the status of closer Mariano Rivera, who returned to Panama on Sunday after two of his wife's relatives — a cousin and his son — were electrocuted in his swimming pool.

While the Yankees said Rivera planned to be back for Tuesday night's game, manager Joe Torre wasn't taking anything for granted.

"If he's here tomorrow, obviously, it would be wonderful," Torre said. "If not, we understand that."

Tom Gordon, his left eye still a little blurry after it was hit by a champagne cork in Saturday's clubhouse celebration at Minnesota, would take over as the closer if Rivera is absent. Tanyon Sturtze and Paul Quantrill would replace Gordon as the setup man.

While Gordon's good, he's not Rivera. No one else is.

"I never had a problem with it. I enjoyed closing," Gordon said. "Whatever it takes for this team to get a win."

Following Boston's first-round sweep of Anaheim and New York's 3-1 win over the Twins, Schilling and Mussina are rested heading into the opener. The Red Sox rotation has Pedro Martinez pitching Game 2 on Wednesday, followed by Bronson Arroyo on Friday at Fenway Park and Wakefield the following day in Game 4.

Jon Lieber and Kevin Brown follow Mussina for the Yankees, who still haven't decided between Orlando Hernandez or Javier Vazquez in the fourth game. El Duque, bothered by a tired arm, felt better Monday, when he threw

UMass stumbles again

Minutemen fall to JMU

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

HARRISONBURG, Va. – After struggling mightily to move the ball for three consecutive games, an ineffective offense led by quarterback Tim Day finally brought the Massachusetts football team to a place it never wanted to be: the point of no return.

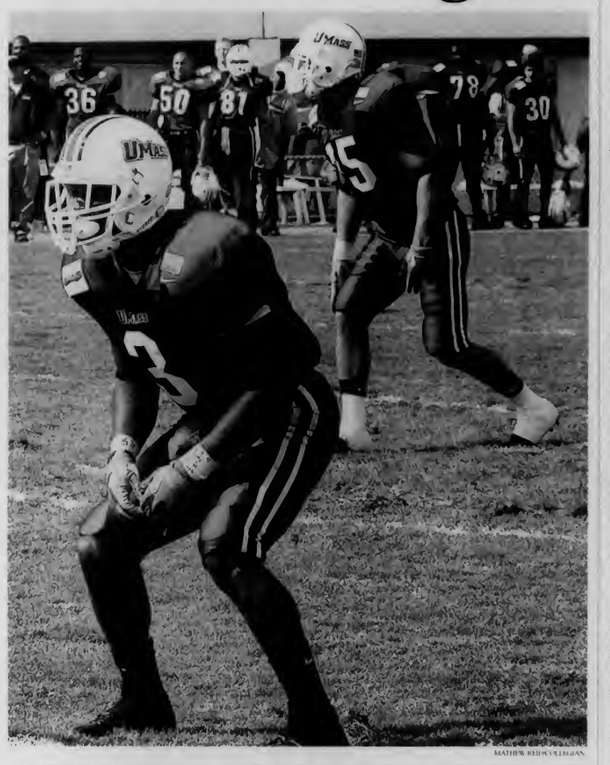
After a scoreless first half in Saturday's Atlantic 10 contest between the Minutemen and No. 19 James Madison, the Dukes finally cracked a tired and overworked UMass defense and the offense never got on tracked as the Minutemen fell to the Dukes 28-7 before a sellout crowd of 15,321 at Bridgeforth Stadium.

JMU	28
UMass	7

With the loss – UMass' first to JMU since 1997 – the Minutemen fall to 2-4 overall and 0-3 in A-10 play. They will return to action next Saturday in Durham, N.H. for a 1 p.m. match up with No. 9 New Hampshire.

The Maroon and White is now also all but eliminated from Division I-AA playoff contention, and remains in last place in the A-10 East Division.

Junior quarterback Tim Day completed 28-of-52 attempts for 213 yards and a touchdown while also throwing two interceptions. His completion total tied for third most in program history, while the attempts were second on the school's all-time list.



JMU quarterback Justin Rascati was 11-of-17 for 79 yards and rushed for a pair of touchdowns.

Junior tailback Steve Baylark was the Minutemen's leading rusher, gaining 48 yards on 16 carries. Raymond Hines led James Madison (4-1 3-0 A-10) with 123 yards and a touchdown on 12 carries, while Maurice Fenner chipped in with 96 yards on 22 carries and a touchdown as well.

Redshirt freshman J.J. Moore paced UMass' receivers with seven catches for 75 yards and junior Dominique Stewart and senior fullback Rich Demers had six catches apiece, but the Minutemen were hurt severely by dropped passes throughout the game.

"It just seemed like every time we got something going, we would self destruct," UMass coach Don Brown said. "Obviously

Minutewomen split weekend

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts women's soccer came back to Amherst for a five-game homestand two weeks ago, it knew that it needed to come away with more wins than losses over the stretch if they were to stay in post-season competition.

But to keep up with the pack, they were going to have to play incredible ball against some stiff competition.

The Minutewomen (4-4, 2-3 Atlantic 10) did just that, splitting the final two games of their home stretch this weekend against two A-10 powerhouses in Richmond and George Washington. Now they have some momentum on their side as they hurdle through the second leg of the A-10 season.

To kick off the weekend, UMass hosted a defensively-sound Richmond squad that was physically larger than life. Fighting against a roster with an average height of 5'7", the Minutewomen were going to have to play big. And they did — or, at least, for the first 45 minutes of play.

After playing even ball through the first half, the Spiders (5-5-1, 3-2 A-10) finally broke through with a goal early in the second, and would nurse that lead right up to the end to seal a 1-0 downing of UMass.

The Minutewoman defense wasn't just undersized, however. They were also playing without junior Amy Maffucci, one of the more vocal defenders for the Maroon and White, due to a knee injury.

"She's a talker, a big organizer," sophomore Nadia Villaroel said of Maffucci's absence. "I think everybody had to talk a whole lot more and organize better, not just rely on her. I think we did that really well."

"There wasn't anything we really couldn't handle," freshman Kaelyn Caldwell said of defending the Spiders. "The goal they scored was unlucky, somehow it didn't get backed back out. But, I think it was a close game for the most part."

The likes of Caldwell, Villaroel and Stephanie Barrett were able to keep a clamp on the brute Richmond attack in the first half.

The only real surge of offense came midway through the first half, when a series of one-touch passes allowed Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather and Lindsey Bellini to get off several shots that went wide.

An offensive explosion

When a reporter asked Matt Anderson a tongue-in-cheek question about trying to shake off the rust he had from missing a whole season of hockey Saturday night, all Anderson could do was chuckle.

That's because Anderson, whose last game was the Massachusetts hockey team's loss to New Hampshire in the 2003 Hockey East semifinals, had just scored a hat trick in the Minutemen's 6-4 win over Clarkson at the Mullins Center Saturday night. Anderson's trifecta was the first by a UMass player in nearly two years, dating back to Thomas Pöck's hat trick against Providence on Jan. 5, 2003.

Clarkson	4

James Solon scored the game-winner for the Minutemen, crashing the net as P.J. Fenton lired a slap shot at Clarkson goaltender Dustin Traylen. The puck bounced up off of Traylen, and the speeding Solon knocked it home with his body.

Although the tally won't go in any highlight reels as a "goal-scorer's" goal, it came at a perfect time for UMass, who found itself trailing for the first time all game to start the third period, after the Golden Knights scored the only two goals of the second period to make it 4-3.

However, Anderson scored his second of the night just 16 seconds in to the third period to tie it, and Solon followed up with 5:33 to go, scoring one of only three even-strength goals by either team.

Anderson then completed the troika when sophomore Kevin Iarman opted to feed him at the blue line, rather than take it in himself on an empty net. Anderson took the pass, worked his way to the hash marks, and potted the final goal of the game, with 37 seconds remaining.

"It went pretty well, but at the same time, overall, I think we need to do this again in April," Anderson said.

Although Anderson's scoring outburst highlighted the game, and the team combined for 10 goals, the contest was marred by a plethora of penalties. In all, each team was assessed 14 penalties, for a combined 59 minutes. The penalty box parade was the season's first

If the Massachusetts men's soccer team had a stress indicator, it would be flashing red and suggesting the squad take a stiff drink.

In a grueling weekend of conference play, the Minutemen (4-6-2, 1-1-2 Atlantic 10) were handed a 3-2 loss at the hands of Richmond (2-6-2, 1-1-1) on Friday, but bounced back to defeat George Washington (1-7-3, 0-2-2), 2-1 in double overtime on Sunday.

No stranger to playing in nail-biters, Sunday's game marked the sixth contest of the season for the Minutemen to be decided in overtime, and the fifth in the last six games. The defensive-minded Minutemen have gone 3-2-1 during that stretch.

UMass	2

At George Washington, UMass coach Sam Koch picked up his 150th career win from behind the Maroon and White bench, thanks to Tim Kitchell's golden goal in the 105th minute.

The game winner was set up by a Ralph Pace on a throw-in. Pace lobbed a high pass to Kitchell, who headed the ball with the back of his head for his first goal of the season. The shot deflected off the cross bar and past Colonial goalie Derek Biss to give UMass its first A-10 win of the year.

UMass took 12 shots on the day and put only two on net, but both were for goals that came in the form of headers.

The first score came from sophomore Rob Charest in the 62nd minute. Charest netted his team-leading, sixth-goal of the season when Ian O'Donnell and Pace set up a Charest on a bang-bang play deep in the Massachusetts zone, to give the Minutemen a 1-0 lead close to midway through the second half.

The lead was short lived however, as George Washington responded in the 80th minute with a Jon Allen breakaway goal.

The Colonials out shot the Minutemen 8-0 in the first half but could only capitalize on one scoring opportunity, despite holding a 12-6 advantage in corner kicks.

UMass freshman goalkeeper Nick Billman recorded five saves and won his second game as a starter.

Pace came up big for the Maroon and White on Friday as well, but a pair of goals in the second half was not enough to lead the Maroon and White to a come-from-behind victory over conference foe Richmond.

The Minutemen outshot the Spiders 12-to-3 in the second period as they tried to overcome a 2-0 halftime deficit. Pace led the effort with scores in the 80th and 87th minute.

Pace's first goal of the season came when he sent a header past Spider goalkeeper Eric Sciocchetti to put the Minutemen on the board. The 6-2 sophomore took advantage of his superior height and gained position in front of the Richmond goal, where he out jumped the competition and redirected a Todd Skelton crossing pass.

Seven minute later, Pace was given a golden scoring opportunity that was set up by a Richmond foul inside the box. On the ensuing penalty kick, Pace placed his shot perfectly, inside the left post past a diving Sciocchetti.

Anderson returns with a bang

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Sitting in the Mullins Center's green room, a towel around his neck, Matt Anderson pretty much said it all.

"What else could I ask for?" he said, a thief's grin sneaking across his face.

The sophomore, who had not played an official game in more than a year, showed all 2,486 in attendance at Saturday night's season opener against Clarkson what they — and he — had been missing for the entirety of the 2003-04 season, which he sat out because of a shoulder injury he re-aggravated just before the season began.

All Anderson did in his first game back was score three goals, assist on two, and be on the ice for five of the Minutemen's six tallies. Were so many of the goals not scored on power plays, Anderson would have finished the game in the neighborhood of plus-four. Looking like they were using telepathy, Anderson and his linemates moved so effectively and fluidly, it would be hard to believe, if you didn't know better, that this was Anderson's first real game in 575 days.

When Anderson was last a regular member of the UMass lineup, he was a part of the promising "WAM" line, comprised of himself, Stephen Werner, and departed winger Greg Mauldin. In one year together, the trio combined for 47 goals and 63 assists, and their 110-point total raised hopes that the combination might lead the Minutemen for years to come. However, Anderson suffered an injury late in the 2002-03 season that reappeared before the next season's opener, and was serious enough to require season-ending surgery.

Saturday night was, among other things, a showcase of what might have been, had Anderson been able to avoid surgery. Though Kevin Iarman, the burly power forward who ultimately set up Anderson's hat

Candidates prepare for final debate

By Neora Pickler
Associated Press

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) — Bracing for their final debate, John Kerry accused President Bush of favoring "friends in the oil industry" over consumers strapped with rising fuel bills on Monday while Bush said his challenger so misunderstood the war on terror that he thought it could be reduced to "a nuisance" akin to prostitution or illegal gambling.

Both candidates campaigned in the West ahead of their third presidential debate, which will take place Wednesday night at Arizona State University in Tempe. Kerry focused on domestic issues — the subject of that debate — and criticized Bush and the Republican-led Congress for not doing more to reduce U.S. dependence on imported oil.

Bush mixed domestic policy with national security, criticizing Kerry as a tax-and-spend liberal while questioning anew the Democrat's fitness to lead the war against terror.

At a rally in Hobbs, N.M., the Republican incumbent ridiculed Kerry for saying in an interview in The New York Times Magazine: "We have to get back to the place we were, where terrorists are not the focus of our lives but they're a nuisance."

In the interview published Sunday, Kerry compared the anti-terror battle to efforts by law enforcement to root out prostitution or illegal gambling, knowing such an activity could never be ended but could be reduced to where "it isn't threatening people's lives every day." He cited his experience as a former prosecutor in Massachusetts.

"I couldn't disagree more," Bush said. "Our goal is not to reduce terror to some acceptable level of nuisance. Our goal is to defeat terror by staying on the offensive."

The Bush campaign also takes on the "nuisance" comment in a new television ad. And Vice President Dick Cheney, campaigning in Medford, N.J., called Kerry's remarks "naive and dangerous."

Phil Singer, a Kerry-Edwards spokesman, said the Republicans took Kerry's single sentence out of context. "Considering that George Bush doesn't think we can win the war on terror, let Osama bin Laden escape and rushed into Iraq with no plan to win the peace, it's no surprise that his campaign is distorting every word John Kerry has ever said," he said.

The Kerry campaign circulated another terrorism-as-a-nuisance quote, a 2-year-old comment from retired Gen. Brent Scowcroft, who was national security adviser for Bush's father. "There is going to be no peace treaty on the battleship Missouri in the war on terrorism, but we can break it's back so that it is a horrible nuisance and not a paralyzing influence on our soci-

New plasma televisions installed in the Dining Commons for students

By Jeremy Dirac
Collegian Staff

Recently four 50-inch wide plasma screen televisions were installed in the Worcester Dining Commons in the Northeast residential area. Each television was $4200 (without the cost of installation). Director of Dining Services, Ken Toong, said, "The TVs are just one of many initiatives which we have implemented because of our student feedback."

Dining Services conducted an Internet survey some time in late February over a period of about two weeks where students were asked questions like what kind of addition would make eating at the DC more fun? Some of the options were ideas like having live music, feature movies, reality shows, clowns or even plasma televisions.

Out of 393 votes, 206 went to the push to purchase the new televisions. Following the survey, on behalf of Dining Services, Toong requested the purchase of the televisions, which was first, approved by the Director of Auxiliary Services, then the Chancellor of the Administration of Finance and so on up the chain. The televisions were purchased from a local vendor approved by the UMass procurement office according to Toong.

The purchase of the televisions is part of a larger plan where Toong hopes that the DCs will become more of "a hub" for student activity. "I think the TVs will help to promote campus life ... it keeps us together, it keeps us informed," said Toong.

Beyond the televisions, other changes are being made to the University of Massachusetts' dining services including renovations to the Berkshire Dining Commons in Southwest, increased serving hours, and themed events. He said that UMass is not the first school to have big screen TVs in its dining facilities. "You may not know that most schools put big screen TVs in their dining halls."

According to Toong, the televisions were not paid for with student tuition money. "We are different from the academic department because we are self sufficient. The money comes from our own operating budget."

The operating budget for dining services comes primarily from student meal plan costs, but also comes from payments from groups that rent the facilities during the summer.

Toong estimated the annual operating budget at $30 million. According to the Northeast Area Governor, Ahmed Nasef, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, Michael Gargano, knew nothing about the television purchases when it was

U.N. helicopter brought down on its way to collect ballot boxes

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) – Engine failure brought down a U.N. helicopter sent to collect ballot boxes from northeastern Afghanistan on Tuesday, injuring no one but causing a new glitch in efforts to tally the results of the country's landmark presidential election.

The accident came as a panel of foreign experts began probing irregularities in Saturday's vote alleged by rivals of front-running interim leader Hamid Karzai.

The complaints have stalled the start of vote counting, though officials were hopeful the tally could begin Wednesday. Final results could take until late October.

The helicopter had yet to pick up any ballot boxes when it crash-landed in a snowy field in the Pamir Mountains of Badakhshan province, said David Avery, chief of operations for the U.N.-Afghan body managing the vote.

The American military said one of its C-130 transport planes dropped emergency supplies, including sleeping bags and food, to the three crewmembers, three election workers and two police officers on board.

The group took shelter in an abandoned house, and the U.S. military said another helicopter would try to rescue them Wednesday.

Avery said the loss of the Russian-made Mi-8 would slow the recovery of ballots from Badakhshan, one of the country's most inaccessible provinces. Donkeys have also been used to bring ballot boxes from remote villages.

The helicopter was "at such an altitude that it's unlikely to be recoverable," Avery said.

The massive task of counting the results of this war-ravaged nation's first-ever Western-style vote was also being slowed by faulty paperwork accompanying some of the boxes flooding into regional counting centers, Avery said.

The tally will begin Wednesday at the earliest, and final results are not expected until late October.

Chances for a conclusive outcome were on firmer ground after several of Karzai's challengers backed away from a boycott of the vote, indicating they would accept an independent commission to probe vote-fraud charges.

Karzai is the clear favorite to win, but his ability to consolidate his rule would be undermined if the opposition refused to acknowledge the vote results.

Ethnic Tajik candidate Yunus Qanooni, considered Karzai's closest rival, said Monday he would accept an investigation by independent experts into opposition complaints that the supposedly indelible ink used to mark voters' thumbs in some polling stations could be rubbed off, allowing some to vote more than once.

There were indications another rival, ethnic Uzbek warlord Abdul Rashid Dostum, might be considering backing down as well. Dostum traveled Tuesday to Kabul from his home in the north, and his spokesman said he was considering accepting a compromise.

The candidates had a Tuesday afternoon deadline to submit formal protests.

Election officials said Qanooni and two other candidates were complaining about a shortage of ballots in some areas in addition to the problems with the ink.

U.N. spokesman Manuel de Almeida e Silva said Tuesday that two members of the panel had been appointed and had "started working today." A third member was in the "final stages of being identified."

He said it was "totally realistic" that vote-counting could begin Wednesday.

Election organizers agreed to the panel in hopes it would end a crisis begun when all 15 opposition candidates declared the boycott Saturday.

The election has been hailed as a success by U.N. officials, President Bush and other world leaders. International observers have criticized the 15, saying their demand to nullify the vote was unjustified.

A high voter turnout in Afghanistan, which never before has tasted democracy, and a failure of Taliban rebels to launch a massive attack have also been held up as proof of success.

Concordia professor set to speak to students today

By Sherry Larnard
Collegian Correspondent

The Center for the Study of Communication is presenting a speech by Professor Martin Allor of Concordia University in Montreal.

The professor is well known in the field of documentaries as an acclaimed scholar.

"I can tell you that he is very influential and very insightful in his line of work," said Professor Bruce Geisler, the director of the Center for the Study of Communication at the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

"His speech, titled 'Actuality and Remediation: Documentary Epistemology and Intermedia Circulation' will examine cumulative effects of the blurring of the boundaries between informational, fictional, promotional and entertainment forms of the documentary field." According to a press release about the event.

George Liu of the UMass Communication Department said the speech would give students an idea of, "the nature of documentary and how it reflects the reality of the world."

He feels that this speech can broaden the view of UMass students not only in the way of academics, but also in the way of cultural and global views.

In contrast to what many people have become familiarized with as "reality" put forth largely through the reality television craze, George feels that documentaries inform people, whereas reality TV is a form of entertainment.

Documentaries do not have the ad support that one may find for television.

COURTESY WWW.CONCORDIA.CA

Professor Martin Allor from Concordia University of Montreal

The professor plans to speak on an array of topics, one of them being how in the current culture the differences between fact and fiction have become tenuous at best, thus making them distinction between the two very difficult.

The professor will also speak about the modifications that have been made in producing documentaries with new technology that has been on the rise. He will speak of the current ease of making and distributing documentaries as Internet technology has developed and changed over the more recent years.

The speech may be an opportunity for students to learn and develop an interest in the world of documentary that they may never have been previously exposed to.

The talk is scheduled to take place in room 905 on the 9th floor of the Campus Center on Wednesday, October 19th at 12:15 p.m

Magma still rising from Mount Saint Helens

By Peggy Andersen
Associated Press

SEATTLE (AP) — Magma that has been rising inside Mount St. Helens after weeks of earthquakes and steam eruptions finally pushed its way to the surface Tuesday, forming a new lava-dome just behind the existing one in the volcano's crater.

The quakes subsided as the new lava emerged and cooled in the open air, suggesting molten rock from deep inside the Earth had found the path of least resistance by going around the old dome, said Jon Major, a hydrologist with the U.S. Geological Survey's Cascades Volcano Observatory in Vancouver, Wash.

Unlike the dramatic rivers of red-hot lava from Hawaii's volcano, St. Helens' extrusion of new rock was subtle and difficult to see from outside the crater. A lazy plume of steam rose slowly from the mountain for much of Tuesday.

The last dome-building activity at St. Helens began in the months after its deadly May 1980 eruption and lasted six years. Layers of emerging rock gradually formed a rocky dome nearly 1,000 feet

Last chance to get informed and register

November 2 is approaching fast, and with only twenty days left until the election, the pressure is on for people to decide who will win their vote.

There have been two presidential debates so far, along with the vice-presidential one, where the candidates battled over this year's biggest issues: the war in Iraq, gay marriage, abortion, the economy, stem-cell research and healthcare reform. John Kerry and President Bush differ in their stance on almost ever issue, yet there are still an alarming number of eligible voters who are ignorant to the facts.

Tonight is the third and final debate between the presidential candidates. At Arizona State University, they will give voters one last chance to hear them out and get their questions answered. Starting at 9 p.m., the debate will be on every major station and we, at the Daily Collegian, strongly recommend that those of you who don't feel that you are up-to-date on the issues tune in. Even if you feel that you know who you are voting for, it's important to stay on top of things right up until election day.

So in between innings of the Red Sox game, be sure to pay attention because while baseball will not decide your future or the future of this country, the presidential election certainly will.

Today is also significant in that it is the last day by which your registration cards must be post-marked. Both parties have been exerting huge efforts to register new voters who could be on their side, but still there are people who are eligible to vote and have not yet registered.

This is your last chance.

If you mail in your registration card today, you will still be able to vote on November 2. Even if you don't yet know who to vote for or even if you don't think you will vote, it's important to have the option. It may be too late to register for an absentee ballot for your hometown, but you can still register as an Amherst resident. Please exercise your right as a United States citizen to have a say in the future of this country.

Politicians will never light for the issues that concern us if we don't show them that we have a voice. In recent years, the student age bracket has been less than enthusiastic in its support for national elections, but we have 20 days left to change that. So, watch the debate, register today and vote with an informed opinion.

Redefining our campus diversity

SJ Port

How we define diversity has a lot to do with how we relate to other people. If we define diversity as the aesthetics of human appearance, also know as the visible distinctions between people in a group then perhaps the University of Massachusetts is not a diverse place. If we define the diversity of our campus in terms of race, religion, sexuality and ethnicity, what was just a polarized vision with no basis in the person's being becomes less black and white then our campus' diversity begins to appear. However, if we use the broadest language to identify diversity at UMass — and beyond — suddenly it becomes easier to relate to and include the majority of our peers, as opposed to only a minority.

Diversity is not something we can see; that definition of the weighty word is a fluffy 1950's vision. Today, we live in too complicated a world to rely solely on our vision to define such an important ideological term. Diversity is the very quality of being diverse; it suggests that there is a point at which things differ between members of a group. That difference can be as common as whether one prefers mustard or ketchup on his/her hot dog, or it can be as profound as growing up a wealthy Puerto-Rican man who practices Judaism but lives in a poor, white, Protestant, western Massachusetts community.

Diversity is of the mind. Diversity is what makes life interesting — especially as students and academics.

Race, unlike diversity, is easier to identify — or dangerously assume and project — with only sight. However, does that mean that a black man from Mattapan has more in common with a black woman from the French-speaking Congo? Does it mean that if we judge them on their appearance alone, we can group them together? Admittedly, this is what American society does; equally true, however, is our ability to change this.

Imagine an author that only wrote about one type of character. Each of their stories consisted of multiple characters that differed only in physical description. They may differ in who they are, what religion they subscribe to, where their ancestors came from, how they vote, what sports they play, how old they are, what life altering experiences they have had, etc. But all that this author tells us is their initials, and the small visible differences between each of them. The author never develops the character beyond what they see of each other as they pass one another on the paths of their individual daily lives.

This would not be a very interesting story, nor would the author likely achieve any great success. We ask our authors to develop their characters, to show us who they are in different scenes, settings and interactions with other various characters.

Yet, we don't often respect the characters in our autobiographies as such. Passing one another on our way between Machmer and Herter we look each other up and down noting appearance and attractiveness — and sometimes race or visible ethnicity or cultural association. Then we judge each other, and later we sit in class together and forget to listen, listen for the differences but also for what unites us.

This author, you'll notice does not have a bendee. Currently, not all Collegian columnists are required to have their headshot next to their work. However in years past, when headshots were mandatory (not to mention unflattering) I battled with colleagues and editors to keep my image away from my words. Had readers seen my face beside each opinion piece it would surely have flavored their taste of my ideas.

Imagine if news writers, the supposed bastion of objectivity in journalistic writing, had bendees next to their articles about the SGA's election or Professor Wigam's latest lecture? Or, perhaps, a more blatant example, imagine if a reporter assigned to cover the Red Sox was depicted wearing a Yankees cap in a picture next to his article; would you read his coverage, listen to his opinion, bother to get to know him well enough to read that his deceased son played for the Yankees despite his loyalty to the Sox?

Diversity is not physical alone; its simplification as such is at its core a racist one. Prominent and powerful student groups on campus, as well as certain nameless professors, missed this lesson. Now it is the job of an active citizenry on campus to make sure they hear it, internalize it and use it.

A wise elder once told me that a person who replies just as the first speaker concludes her statement was not really listening to the speaker. The person replying could not have been listening if he had so quickly began to respond. If you really listen to a person — and this is what it requires to see them as more than one aesthetic stereotype or another — then you do not think of your response while they speak, and when they finish speaking you consider your reaction and respond.

To develop a clearer image of the diverse characters on campus, we must listen to hear, understand and appreciate the diversity among us. And like it or not, we are a group — whatever color we are — we are UMass.

Sound too simple to be true? Try it, guaranteed money back if things don't change.

Greek sisters don't speak for every woman

Paige Cram

I'm sure most of you saw the paper yesterday, the one with the front-page picture of the Sigma Kappa girl in a slip with a headline reading "Sigma Kappa sisters model lingerie to benefit UMass Everywoman's Center." Umm, can anyone say contradiction?

Now don't get me wrong, I'm all for fundraising, especially if it is going to benefit groups, such as the Everywoman's Center, who are working to create a better environment for all of us on campus. However, there's something wrong with promoting the objectification of women in order to support a group who strives to do just the opposite. By all means, if you want to have a wet t-shirt contest on your front lawn in order to raise money for a kick-ass Halloween party at your Sorority house, go right ahead. But if the proceeds are going to an organization, then the event also reflects on the image of that organization.

The Everywoman's Center works very hard to encourage both men and women to develop a positive, respectful image of the female sex. They hold many events and offer numerous support programs with one goal in mind: to change how this community thinks about women so that things like sexual harassment, rape, domestic abuse and sex discrimination will come to an end.

The way I see it, this fundraiser is a step backwards. These girls are essentially selling themselves and then claiming it is for the sake of women all over campus.

Sure, it will provide the Center with some additional funding for some of its programs, but at what cost? Every person who picked up the paper yesterday got one more reinforcement of the belief that for women to get what they want in this society, they have to use their bodies.

Yes, we are all taught this lesson at a very young age. Yes, it may be reinforced every day in many places, so why should we hold these girls responsible? The answer is simple: because we can't afford to ignore it. If we continue to accept examples of clear exploitation like this one, we will never be able to change the image of women in this society.

Now, it's one thing to be comfortable with your body. Good for the Sigma Kappa sisters that they can all be "comfortable being naked." I think it's something that more women need to strive for, but just because you are comfortable with it doesn't mean you should exploit yourself to raise money. Women, as well as men, need to understand that with events like this, you are acknowledging that the objectification of women is OK, that you accept it and that it works. In doing that, you are only holding us back in our struggle to gain some ground in the battle for equality and respect.

If you want to have a wet t-shirt contest on your front lawn in order to raise money for a kick-ass Halloween party at your Sorority house, go right ahead. But if the proceeds are going to an organization, then the event also reflects on the image of that organization.

And no, that does not mean that I am against modeling in general. First of all, professional models are paid to do a job, and we hold these girls responsible? The answer is simple: because we can't afford to ignore it. If we continue to accept examples of clear exploitation like this one, we will never be able to change the image of women in this society.

Secondly, there are an equal number of males who have to do their little turn on the catwalk wearing nothing but Calvin Klein's newest style of briefs. But when was the last time any fraternity on this campus raised money by resorting to a fashion show in their boxers?

Exactly, and that's the difference.

Now I know that these girls didn't arrange the event that took place on Friday; they merely participated in it. But they acknowledged plans to organize a similar event in the near future, and I can only hope that they reconsider.

I'm sure after reading this, people will try to accuse me of saying things that I didn't say, so let me be very clear: I am in no way trying to discourage fundraising, especially for the Everywoman's Center. I am simply asking that Sigma Kappa rethink its approach and hold a benefit that will not only reap financial gain, but would also be consistent with the message and values of the organization that they are so nobly trying to help.

Handle your scandal, Mike

Thomas Naughton

Nothing. Not a single thing has occurred since the publishing of the photos featuring members of the Student Government Association and Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy posing with a caricature of Patrick Higgins as the Grand Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, at least not to remedy the situation. Sure, Pat Higgins has resigned, there was a rally against racism and a panel discussion on "Diversity," but nothing has occurred in the vein of consequences for the students still enrolled at this University who were pictured drunk in a public office accompanied by their KKK whiteboard drawing.

Mike Gargano has said we have a zero-tolerance policy at UMass, which I think is great. I just had no idea that "zero-tolerance" meant that you sit in your office and hang out until the situation blows over. I'm glad I know now. Does that mean I can have a zero-tolerance policy for speeding tickets, bad grades, feeling fat, my mom being mad at me or people not wanting to go on dates with me? If so, I feel a lot better about life in general.

However, when it comes to idiotic jerks who pose drunk with a KKK drawing in an office that was set up for "research and education" and then cry foul when the campus sees the pictures and the truth, I don't have a zero-tolerance policy; I have a "Get The Hell Out of My School, You Idiot Policy."

Mike Gargano has said we have a zero-tolerance policy at UMass, which I think is great. I just had no idea that "zero-tolerance" meant that you sit in your office and hang out until the situation blows over.

My policy includes something called action, which is not something associated with an administrator like Mike Gargano. The pictures drew and quartered the campus; one quarter was outraged, one quarter was defensive of the pictured, one quarter didn't care and one quarter had no idea what was going on, still doesn't and furthermore doesn't want to. I wish I didn't care, but then I'd have an office on the third floor of Whitmore. And while I love some of the friends I have made at Housing Assignments, I'm pretty sure they would be less excited to see me if I hung out there all the time.

I was at the Rally Against Racism, and it was great to be with people who were angry and upset by what has occurred at our University. I marched into Whitmore with the other protestors, blew a kiss to Housing Assignments and headed into Gargano's office to say hi and ask him if he had forgotten about the whole "picture thing." I gave him the benefit of the doubt; he must have forgotten about it and that's why all the students pictured weren't promptly booted from our campus community.

To my dismay, he knew exactly why all these students were in his office, and he didn't seem to care. He was lounging on his couch, flanked by secretaries or whoever they were. I'm glad he was comfortable; it must be hard work to not care about students all day. Coming up with ideas to make things more difficult is hard, too. I know from experience; I was the baby of my family.

We were hustled out of his office, not by the bored secretaries, but by the organizers of the protest, which shocked me. I was late for my design class because I wanted to hang out with Mike Gargano, and they were making me leave? I was pissed. What is the point of getting all rowdy and ready for fighting if you're just going to show up and then leave so quickly? I've stayed longer at the houses of people I hate. I guess it's a good idea to rally against racism, and then go home and not face one of the guys who angered you. The organizers said that he was just going to tell us lies, which was probably true, but I at least would have liked to join Gargano on his couch to be lied to.

I really am dumbfounded by this whole situation. What possesses students to get drunk in the office that they work in, draw pictures of themselves as members of the KKK and then to take photos of the whole event? Friends of the students involved want the student body to believe that it was merely a "joke" in response to Pat Higgins being called a racist all semester. That is the biggest piece of crap excuse I have ever heard. I guarantee that someone accused of being a Neo-Nazi would not shave his head in joking response to those allegations.

I think its great that Higgins resigned. However, I kind of expected him to resign along with the other elected officials of the nine drunks in the SGA/SCERA family photo album. That resignation should have been submitted by default because each and every one of those students should have been expelled from this University. Seamus Brennan's refusal to resign is indicative of the lack of remorse he and the other students involved have for embarrassing the University. The jig is up; the SGA is an ineffectual club of resume hounds like Seamus Brennan who don't care about our school.

The blame for this issue does not rest only with the members of the SGA. Mike Gargano is also responsible for these events for he allowed the SGA to deteriorate to such a level. The party in the SCERA office happened on his watch; the students should he expelled and he should resign. However, given Gargano's staunch position on the couch, I don't think things will be changing very soon.

What will the outcome of the surreal events of the past few weeks be? More silence about real issues, more rhetoric from Chancellor Gargano and a definite change of location for future SCERA/SGA benders. Cameras will not be allowed. As for Patrick Higgins, I wouldn't worry about his future; this whole ordeal has probably made him the most promising young prospect the GOP has seen in a long time.

No news is bad news

Lisa McLaughlin

I had several tasks to accomplish when I came back to UMass this year. The surprisingly easy ones included moving into an off-campus apartment, registering for classes with the crashed Spire system and waiting in an endless line after making futile attempts to find affordable used textbooks. The most difficult task the valley handed me was acquiring a decent part-time job that would help me scrape by and earn the good amount of work-study money I was awarded.

Why I am currently unemployed? On Sept. 1, I printed out and highlighted a list of openings from the work-study website. I called places. Throughout the week, I dressed appropriately. I filled out numerous applications, talked to people, shook hands. I was friendly and conversational. I made sure I was a face, not just a name. I entrusted people with my most personal information when I was interviewed. I answered sensible and sometimes difficult questions and waited patiently for any news.

I was betrayed.

Not to sound melodramatic, but that is how I felt. Classes started, and a week passed. I stopped to inquire at the various places I applied to, not trying to sound aggressive or pushy, merely interested. Most were still looking over applications, and others stated that my hours were not what they were looking for. Such things are completely understandable, so I was still optimistic.

I am a nonsensical idealist, blinded by optimism. I sincerely believed that there were no rude people in the professional world.

Another week passed. No snail-mail, no voice-mail, not even a generic e-mail informing all applicants that sorry, it was a tough decision due to the abundance of applications they received, but they decided to hire somebody else. All of these menial office jobs were looking to hire as soon as possible, if not immediately. Surely, they could not be looking over applications still.

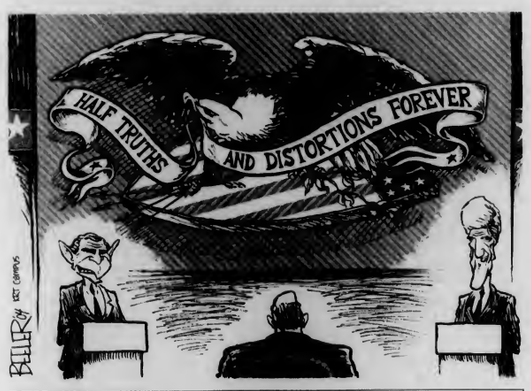
I decided to visit these offices again and find out what was going on.

Office A: The woman I originally spoke to after I filled out my application told me that my hours were exactly what they were looking for. She also said that I had good experience and would definitely get an interview. After two weeks, I approached the hiring manager and asked her if she got a chance to review my application. She looked over her notes, and informed me that my hours were not what they were looking for. This was the complete opposite of what the other person told me, so somebody obviously lied to me. I did not want to bother arguing with anyone though, so I left.

Office B: Here I had an interview with the three people who run the office. I liked the atmosphere, and felt comfortable talking with them. They asked me questions, and I answered them the best I could, making sure to maintain eye contact with all three. Not hearing from them was the biggest disappointment, taking into account that I had an interview in which I thought I did very well.

I have never handled confrontation well. I am the type of person that doesn't say anything when a waitress messes up my order, because maybe I didn't speak clearly enough. While I can be the biggest pushover, I never let anyone take advantage of me. So when I walked into Office B two weeks later, I was apprehensive. I bit my lip and shuffled into the room. I stuttered, and couldn't make eye contact when I asked them if they were still in the process of interviewing for the job. I looked lost, and it almost felt like I was asking them for directions. They told me sorry, they already filled the position, and sorry, we should have contacted you. I nodded my head, mumbled an "okay," and shuffled out.

I have contemplated over and over why this keeps happening to me. I have come up with "theories," which I present here. My first theory was that employers want to hire people, not emotions. They don't want to be the jerk who has to say what inevitably sounds like, "You're not good enough; we're hiring someone better than you." If this was true, I would inform employers beforehand that I would not be deeply hurt by their decision. It is their decision. Obviously I would be disappointed because I'm human, but it is not the end of the world. Afterwards, I would ask them for some constructive criticism so I could develop a better approach for future interviews.



My second theory pondered upon whether or not I had some undiscovered personality flaw. Do I frighten people? Am I too forward? Is there something displeasing about my appearance? Did I miss the "No Irish Need Apply" sign? What's wrong with me? I posed these questions to my roommate to which she replied cynically, "There is nothing wrong with you. It's just that after they hire someone, you no longer exist. They don't want to put the time and effort into writing rejection letters."

Ding! An epiphany: I am a nonsensical idealist, blinded by optimism. I sincerely believed that there were no rude people in the professional world. I was lost in a place where an employee's main task was to be polite and courteous to all those coming in and out of the office. How absurd and old-fashioned of me to live in a world of R.S.V.P.'s and thank-you cards!

But is it really too much to ask? I feel a loss of respect when I am met with silence, rather than outright rejection. Pardon me, but I hate it when people cannot honor me with their honest opinion, since I always offer mine free of charge. That's a prominent reason why I write here. Why lead me to believe that I have a chance at something when I don't? It wastes my time, and more importantly it wastes your time. The world would be infinitely more efficient if everybody resolved to cut the crap.

Time is money. That's why I don't have a job.

Magic of a New England fall

Mike Anmuth

Being born and raised in Philadelphia, you can imagine my surprise and delight at this phenomenon called, "autumn in New England." Oh, sure, we have fall at home, but it mostly consists of that two week period when the tree in the front yard puts a layer of leaves on top of everything right before it gets really cold outside. I can imagine in Philadelphia right now, it's probably still warm whereas I've had my coat here on for a week or two already.

But who cares about the temperature outside? Autumn in New England is something that I imagine most of you have lived with most or all of your lives. According to the statistics on the UMass Undergraduate Admissions Quick Facts page, roughly 19 percent of students are from out-of-state, so the other 81 percent of you have seen these seasons time and time again. For this undergrad, however, this is something new and different. While the weather may be cooler here than in the mid-Atlantic, the colors and scenery more than make up for having to wear long pants and sweaters before Oct. 1.

I'm not saying that I have never seen trees before, but the trees here have leaves of all colors, leaves that stay on the tree for more than two weeks, and when someone envisions fall in New England, it's that image which is most apparent. How many postcards have trees with multicolored leaves and mountains in the background that show off the beauty of Massachusetts?

The great thing about the Pioneer Valley, is that we can look out of our windows and see the same backdrop, the trees and the mountains. No longer do I need publications with lush changing greenery, I can look out from one of the upper floors of the library. For those fortunate enough to live in one of the towers in Southwest, the same view may be apparent from your dorm room window. Wherever you are on campus, chances are there is bound to be at least one glorious showing of autumn in New England, which you may never have noticed before.

Being here in New England allows me to stand on campus in the early evening, smell the wood burning and know that Western Massachusetts is settling into the fall.

There is more than just the sight of foliage to let you know the season has changed. The sense of smell, for instance, is prominent this time of year as fires are started in fireplaces and one can tell that winter is coming. I cannot tell you that I've ever been fanatical about the outside, especially because that would be rather difficult in a city where one's outside consists mostly of cement and skyscrapers. However, being here in New England allows me to stand on campus in the early evening, smell the wood burning and know that Western Massachusetts is settling into the fall.

I could wax on for quite a while about the scenery and the amazement that it holds for me, like a naiveté for nature as I drive, bike or walk around the campus, as if I had never seen trees before in my 21 years on this planet. By now you must be asking, "Mike, what does this have to do with me?" Excellent question, I must say. I put this notion of the change in seasons down on paper because this time of year is an excellent time to be outside. Besides the obvious activities like walking to and from class, this time of year is great for wandering around town, bicycling, hiking, climbing mountains or any other activity that lets one get outside and feel like a part of nature.

If your five senses aren't enough to capture the essence of autumn, I recommend taking pictures or lying out on the lawn, on campus or elsewhere, assuming it's in the warm part of the afternoon and not in the cold part of the early morning. Some of the best art and photography is from this part of the year, so you, too, can be inspired to be creative while you're creating your own communion with the outdoors. I'm sure not everyone is as excited as I am about this time of year, but for those who are enthused, go out and enjoy it.

While New England autumn is something new and magical for me, I can say that whether it's new or old, there is an intrinsic enjoyment in the season, one that everyone can experience and luckily we are in a place that really brings out the colors and emotions of the fall.

Why John Kerry will win

Rick Volpe

Anybody with a rudimentary grasp of statistics knows that no poll is perfectly reliable. Political polls are taken on samples of the American people and the resulting statistics are extrapolated to represent the opinions of the population. Samples do not always give accurate representations of populations for a variety of reasons. Now, to be fair, repeated sampling reveals a far more accurate representation of the population than does sampling a single time, and despite the shift in momentum from the first debates, both nationwide and swing state polls are repeatedly showing Bush with a small lead.

Yet these polls are almost certainly wrong.

In 1948, every single major poll in the country predicted Thomas Dewey would win the presidential election by a landslide over Harry Truman. The polls were so convincing that all 50 of the leading political journalists of the time reported to "Newsweek" that Dewey would easily win. But by 4 a.m. on the morning after Election Day, Dewey ceded defeat and it became official that Harry Truman was to be the next president.

One of the reasons the polls were so wrong was due to the fact that polling ceased well before the election, and therefore they did not pick up on the snowball effect Truman's sunny persona and enthusiastic rallies were having on voters. But also of great importance was the sampling bias of the polling companies. The samples for the polls were taken largely by telephone and at that time telephones were still considered something of a luxury, found in upscale residences. Then, much like today, the upper class of Americans was dominated by Republicans and therefore Republicans were greatly over sampled resulting in biased polls.

Both parties are claiming huge success in registering new voters, but the largest surges by far have been in low-income areas heavily populated by minorities. You don't have to be Dr. George Gallup to know that Bush doesn't have a lot of support in these places.

Now, in 2004, the polls are drawing inaccurate samples again. I do not believe the bias now is as severe as it was in 1948, but at the same time the polls are not predicting Bush by a landslide; most of them are predicting Bush will squeak by with the victory. The primary flaw in the sampling process this time around is the polling of likely voters over registered voters.

All across the country, but especially in crucial swing states like Ohio and Florida, voters are registering in record numbers. And it's not just a few hundred more here or there than in 2000; it is to the point where town halls are hiring temps to handle the massive overflow. Of course both parties are claiming huge success in registering new voters, but the largest surges by far have been in the low-income areas that are heavily populated by minorities. You don't have to be Dr. George Gallup to know that Bush doesn't have a lot of support in these places. Likely voters are defined as people who have voted repeatedly in the past, and therefore none of these people who are swarming the registration booths are counted in the polls.

Compounding this effect is the increasing prevalence of cell phones. Scientific polls are taken on landline phones only, and therefore people who use only their cell phone are not being polled. Exclusive cell phone use is growing in popularity among all Americans but most significantly among people age 18-29, which means that even the rare poll that samples registered voters will not speak with these people. The polls that have been taken among the 18-29 age bracket show Kerry leading by a large margin.

Finally, if you read the fine print on the Gallup website, you will see that they weight their samples in proportion to the population at large. For each sample, 40 percent of the people they contact are registered Republicans. The problem with that is that according to the 2000 census data, only 35 percent of Americans are Republicans. So above and beyond any of the complications I listed before, the most respected and scientifically sound polling agency in the country is over sampling Republicans.

Of course, I am not the first person to notice any of these polling issues. Even distinguished statisticians have spoken about issues such as the lack of cell phone users in polls and determined that an issue such as that would really only shift the election by a point or two. So suppose that each of the major issues I've discussed are each "minor" and could only shift the election in that tiny way. Then we are talking about subtracting 3-6 points from Bush and adding 3-6 points to Kerry.

Given that, check out the websites www.electoralvote.com and www.electionprojection.com. Both update regularly with polls in the swing states, but one site leans to the left and the other to the right. My point is, according to the extensive polling compiled on these sites, even the "small" effects of these sampling issues translate into Kerry winning Pennsylvania, Ohio, Florida, Iowa, Michigan, and Minnesota without a problem.

The title of this piece must surely come as a shock to a lot of people, since the popular opinion even here in Massachusetts seems to be that a Bush victory in November is a foregone conclusion. The truth of the matter is that no matter how badly the Republican spinsters want us all to believe that Bush will steamroll Kerry, such is not the case.

People may not be passionate about electing John Kerry but they certainly are passionate about seeing George Bush defeated. If you don't believe that Americans are uniting behind Kerry then try to explain the fact that the Kerry campaign had less than 3 million in the bank after the primaries, but went on to raise more money than any non-incumbent in the history of U.S. politics, including George Bush in 2000. Kerry isn't backed by the millionaires and billionaires of this country, so the money had to come from real people, people who can only give a little bit here and there. You do the math.

SPENCER ZIEGLER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

If you put "Coyote Ugly," "Fame," and vomit into a blender and mixed it around, the result would be "Raise Your Voice."

Before I tear this movie apart like a Bengal Tiger pouncing on a poor, defenseless, handicapped squirrel lathering itself in teriyaki sauce, I should come clean — this movie was not made for me. The movie was made to make money, primarily off of young, sentimental teenage girls. This fact became immediately clear to me before Hillary Duff even showed up on screen when the title of the Production Company, "A Chicks Film," shined upon the screen.

'Raise Your Voice'
Directed by Sean McNamara
Starring Hillary Duff, Rita Wilson
Now Line Cinema
Rated PG
1 hour 43 mins.
Grade D

Director Sean McNamara's movie is told in three acts. The first of which shows Hillary Duff's character Terri, struggling to go to a selective Los Angeles music school despite her stubborn father's wishes. Through the effort of her passive mother (Rita Wilson), her conniving aunt (Rebecca De Mornay) and her rebellious brother, played by "Joan of Arcadia's" Jason Ritter, Terri is able to finagle her way into Los Angles so she can sing.

The second part of the movie revolves around Terri's problem of being able to remember how to sing with happiness and spunk. I call this section, "how Hillary got her hudspa back." Terri, distraught by the tragedy in the first act (her brother dies in a car crash so as to provide some emotional weight to the movie), finds herself unable to reach down and sing with all her might, like she used to. What can save her from this trouble? A hunky boy of course! The hunk is interestingly enough a goofy looking British fellow named Jay (Oliver James) whose hair looks like a porcupine with high lights is lying on his head. Once Terri finds this little fella everything is perfect, or is it?

I won't go into too many details about the last section of the movie so I don't ruin it for the one or two or people planning on seeing it, but it is centered on Terri's up and down relationship with Jay and the upcoming recital at the end of the summer that determines who gets a $10,000 scholarship.

Ultimately, the plot of the movie is a small town girl escapes her over-protective father so she can be successful singing in the big scary city. Let's contrast this with the plot summary of 2000's hit Coyote Ugly: A small town girl escapes her over-protective father so she can be successful singing in the big scary city — interesting.

This is not to say that seeing the movie is a complete waste of time; there are parts of the film that are quite enjoyable. For one thing, the music (aside from Duff's singing) is quite good. There's a character named Shuan who is just an incredible pianist. Also, James Avery, better known as Phillip Banks from "The Fresh Prince of Bell-Air" is in the movie, which automatically bumps "Raise your Voice's" grade up a notch.

The real strength of the movie is in its unintentional comedy. Some of the characters are such stereotypes that it is laughable. For example, John Corbett (known for his role in "My Big, Fat, Greek Wedding) plays a rebellious teacher, who in the first scene shows up with long hair, a beard, a leather vest and yes, leather pants. Overkill. Then there is Terri's rival at school, who gets to say such inspiring lines such as "I'm bad ... but I can be badder." The movie had people laughing, just not when it intended to.

There's a line in the movie where professor Torvald (John Corbett) tells Terri, "Artists can be emotional, they make the audience feel what they're feeling." If that's true then director Sean McNamara must have been passing a kidney stone when he made this movie, cause that's what watching the movie felt like.

Classic Cinema Revisited

BY JEFFREY HOROWITZ
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Has there ever been a movie that is utterly perfect? I don't think so, but I can name you films that come close and personify an ideal of greatness. Initially I knew I didn't want to merely review movies — I wanted to review the greatest movies.

With the amount of time we spend on modern trash (although some of it is good trash), how much time do we spend on the classics? How many of us revisit the films from way back when, that made film into an art form?

How many people know the works of Fellini, Ozu, Welles, Bunuel, or Kurosawa? The list can go on forever. Do kids know what they are missing? Sure it's a drag to watch a black and white movie or one with subtitles, but do you know how good some of those movies really are? Have you ever watched one and realized it was truly great? Do you have a favorite film that is foreign? Most kids my age don't know any movie titles from before 1985, and since I am a film lover that intensely loves to share the joy, it disturbs me — it always has. The other day a girl told me she's never seen "The Godfather." "The Godfather!" Of all movies to never have seen, this particular one is my favorite and I am well known among friends to drag someone that I'm aware is ignorant of a masterpiece in front of a television screen and force them to watch it. When the film is done they usually thank me and leave deep in thought; and it's a good feeling.

The objective of this column is to spread the love of truly great movies, and the knowledge of truly great filmmakers. When people read this column,

CrunknB princess releases her debut album

Ciara gives the "Goodies" with a new sound straight from the dirty south.

BY MONIQUE JEMMOTT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Increasingly we find that with R&B songbirds, the hype is major, and the talent is minor. So often in fact that when we are blessed with the occasional Mary J's, Alicia's, and Beyonce's, we are appreciative. Well we just may have been introduced to a new force, Ms. "Goodies" Herself — Ciara.

"Goodies" the debut album by the proclaimed princess of "CrunknB," defined as the gritty dirty south sound made popular by King Crunk, Lil Jon; mixed with smooth R&B vocals, has made it's imprint on the urban music scene, along with the billboard charts, "TRL", and "106 & Park." Much talent has come out of Ciara's hometown of Atlanta, artists and groups such as TLC, Usher, Outkast, Monica and Ludacris, all claim Atlanta as their home, so Ciara is among good company when the topic of talent comes up.

Ciara 'Goodies' Laface Records

"Goodies" is a mix of many things. The album's production, which is grade A, was made possible by the likes of Lil John, Jazze Phae, and R. Kelly is what will keep the album on rotation in the disc changer. The melodic, futuristic beats of Jazze Phae, and the rowdy head banging of the Little John sound, work quite nicely to the backdrop of Ciara's smooth, sexy sound.

Tracks such as the title "Goodies," featuring Petey Pablo, and "1,2 Step," featuring Missy Elliot are examples of this, and are coincidentally the first and second singles from the album. Both have infectious beats, and catchy lyrics as they rely heavily on them even in the lyrics where Ciara croons, "This beat is automatic, supersonic, hypnotic, funky fresh" at the beginning of "1,2 Step."

Along with the danceable tracks are the uniform love ballads that make any R&B album. Done with the sweet innocence of a "young around the way" girl, tracks like "Thug Style" and "Ooh Baby" find their place.

On "Thug Style," we are reminded of the age of Ms. Ciara, 19 to be exact, when she sings "Now my parents are gone, I can't believe it's me who needed to see you" and "I know you got a curfew," as she sings to her love prospect of equal youth. "Ohh Baby" paints the picture of an infatuation with an older guy, to which she sing "Ohh baby I just cant say no to you baby."

Ciara also does a great job representing her hometown of Atlanta, which has increasingly become known for the entire sub culture of its own within hip-hop, which includes, "crunk", and now "CrunknB."

On "Oh" featuring Ludacris, Ciara paints an image of what it's like to live in the dirty south when she sings "Oh, round her we riding slow, getting crunk off in the club gets low."

Although "Goodies" has highlights, and shows much potential for this new comer, it seriously lacked in the task of making an impressionable first album. While the production, and catchy lyrics were quite enjoyable, the album fails to illustrate, exactly who Ciara is, and whether she has what it takes to stay in the game.

There is no real connection between Ciara's lyrics and style, mainly because she doesn't appear to have one. On each track, she sounds like an R&B diva from the past. On "Next to you" produced by R. Kelly, Ciara has an eerily familiar sound made famous by the late songstress Aaliyah; and on "Lookin at you," I had to double check the album to make sure that I didn't accidentally get it mixed it up with my Beyonce CD.

"Goodies" is an album of limitations. Listening to it I can assure you that you will be pleased with the production, you will hear each an every single mudered on music channels, and urban radio, and there will be another album from Ciara. What I am still fuzzy on is, whether or not Ciara can actually sing, and whether Jazze Phae can top himself in this shameless ploy to be super producer for 2005.

Overall, it's not the type of album you will rely on to get you through the rough times and the lonely days. It's not even the type of album you will remember in six months. But what it is is the type of album you put on getting dressed to go to the club, on the ride to the club, and on the ride to breakfast after the club.

Revisiting the greats: 'The Godfather'

Classic movie tells tale of loyalty, pride, and honor.

I can only hope they will go out and discover the classics I glorify. The objective is to spread awareness, knowledge and appreciation of great movies from long ago.

I will start with the greatest movies ever made and work my way back and as a tribute to that girl (who will go unnamed for her own protection), and to myself, I will start with my favorite movie — "The Godfather." As I asked in the beginning has a movie ever been utterly perfect? I don't think so, but if ever a movie came closer then any ever made, it was "The Godfather."

"Never take sides against the family."

"The Godfather" has the weight of a Shakespearean tragedy because it's about a king of sorts and his three sons. Each son has drastically different qualities and the movie is mostly about which one will inherit the kingdom. That the kingdom sits on a throne of organized crime has stereotyped this as a mere gangster film, but it is so much more. The mobster quality is crucial to its success because the film now has dimensions, which would not be allowed in any other context.

Mobsters compete for control of the streets and so the film is about competing factions. There are territories and groups that rule over these lands, they meet around a table at crucial times and try to keep the coexistence between the groups civilized. The film is also, about a war that breaks out between two groups. The Corleone and The Tattaglia's. And here's something to consider — the man that leads these group meetings goes by the name Barzini. He is the head of all mob bosses. If one mob boss wars with another it's bad news, but what would happen if Barzini went to war with one of the other bosses due to a conflict of interest? All the other bosses would join him against the one mob boss, seeing as Barzini is the head. Would the mob boss warring against Barzini stand any chance at all? It's something to think about.

While an interesting question, it is an irrelevant one nonetheless because the war in the basis of the movie is between the Corleone's and the Tattaglia's. The main characters in the film are the Corleone's headed by Don Vito Corleone (Marlon Brando).

The film begins in a stunning opening sequence with an undertaker asking Don Corleone for justice against a crime committed on his daughter. It is the wedding day of the Don's daughter and so this should weigh on his feelings but, pay attention to the way the Don explains his reasoning and why he will or won't fulfill the undertaker's wish. He appears to be very wise.

"The Godfather" is known for it's flawless introduction of characters in the beginning, as much as it is known for its skilled character study. Throughout the opening wedding sequence it introduces every character gradually. Within five minutes of each character introduction we know the kind of person we are watching. Pacino's line, "my father made him an offer he couldn't refuse" story introduces Michael and Kay, but also illustrates their characters as people. Michael does not want to go into a family of crime. He's a college graduate, a war hero and wants a legitimate job. His choices throughout the movie reflect various themes that will haunt every character for the entire Godfather trilogy — fate vs. choice; which will raise the crucial theme, loyalty vs. honesty.

In a few scenes, director Francis Ford Coppola portrays Sonny as the hot head, Tom Hagen as the voice of reason, Fredo as the idiot, and of course the Don as the wise old king that will lead us always down the right path. With the horse's head scene, the way these people enforce their laws is established and the story is set in motion. A new business man by the name of Solozzo is in town and requests a partnership with the Corleones as well as a loan of a million dollars to help start his business. The Don finds out that his business is dealing drugs, which is quickly catching on ("The Godfather" is a period piece set in the 1940's) and will make them lots of money. Both Tom Hagen and Sonny think they should get a piece of the action. The Don politely passes on Solozzo's proposal, "Understand, doesn't matter to me what a man does for a living, but your business is a little dangerous." And later he tells Barzini, "Drugs is a dirty business. It's true I have friends in the courts and government, judges and senators, but they wouldn't be my friends very long if they knew my business was drugs, instead of gambling and women which they consider harmless vices."

His stand is a moral one and so his refusal insults Solozzo and Tattaglia who have already united in the business. They order the assasination of the Don who takes five bullets in the back under the guard of Fredo, and still survives.

I don't want to give away too much of the plot for those who haven't seen it. This is when the sons get involved and finish where their father left off. In short, the war rages and all hell breaks lose. Could anyone foresee the shocking tollbooth scene, which lives in infamy? Could anyone predict the fate of Michael, which takes place in an Italian restaurant with Solozzo and a police chief?

My favorite scene is when Michael walks into an empty hospital at the wrong time to visit his father, and cool under pressure rectifies the problem accompanied by the tear inducing line, "I'm with you now pap, I'm with you now." With countless classic scenes, countless classic sayings that can be attributed to endless inspirations and gags in future films, "The Godfather" is the most influential, memorable and unforgettable movie ever made.

It has one of the most ingenious twists in movie history. It's the best source of character analysis I've ever seen in any art form. The story is unrivaled and is more consistently watch-able then any movie ever made. It is the most popular old film, I think of any movie I will review in this column.

What makes "The Godfather" so appealing is that since the war is within the context of organized crime, we as audience members have been introduced to an entirely different reality. The rules have changed and the laws no matter apply because they don't govern these citizens. Since we have been taken into this world we are part of the club and the film gets us to sympathize with murderers and sometimes justifies murder as the right path.

The ending inter-cut with a religious ceremony is the greatest conclusion to any film in the history of movies because it hypocritically denounces evil, cheats the law by establishing an alibi, and makes a character the new Godfather in two senses. It also takes a naive character and converts him into a ruthless killer and by the end we are routing for him with a proud ideology of murder as an acceptable decision.

The movie is merely a tool of manipulation for the audiences, usually emotional, and never has a movie manipulated our minds, emotions, and thoughts as well as "The Godfather." Convincing us that a group of killers is acceptable as heroes.

Look at the cinematography of this film, breathtaking; the structure, virtuoso, and the performances, brilliant; that haunting Nino Rota score, beautiful. Then stare into the tragic eyes of the Don on the cover who wishes everyone would accept his merciful rule while it lasts — the rule of his son will be anything but.

mate Iattie Bawden drilled home the game winner on the Minutewomen's last shot.

Keeping their winning streak going will be no easy feat with the Wildcats coming to town. Both teams posses similar records and are coming off victories as New Hampshire defeated Northwestern 4-3 on Sunday. Katie White was the hero of that game scoring three goals, two of which came a minute a part, to lead the Cats to victory.

For her efforts she was named the America East Player of the Week.

White should be a familiar name to Massachusetts's field hockey fans. Last year the junior forward posted the game's first three goals as New Hampshire went on to defeat the Minutewomen 5-2. Also returning is sophomore Caitlin Gillen who scored the Wildcat's other two goals in that game. Gillen and White share the team lead in goals scored with Kaitlyn Skelley, all of who have four goals. This trio should pose a very formidable challenge for the Maroon and White defense.

The Minutewomen offense should be in good shape if they continue to keep things simple. Beresin and Monaco will be the key to the Maroon and White attack. The two forwards have been the offensive catalysts of late scoring four of the teams last six goals. Bawden and Borneo have been providing excellent support from the midfield of late and should continue to do so.

despite being 38. Realizes this may be his final go-round with Astros, and silenced critics with his best playoff performance against Atlanta – was 8-of-20 (.400) with a homer and four RBIs. Moved to LF when Carlos Beltran arrived. Regardless, the team's worst defensive player.

Cardinals: Reggie Sanders. Adds occasional pop and speed to attack, but with flair for occasional dramatic hit. Average defensively, but took move from right to left after August deal for Larry Walker without grumbling. Fifth time in the playoffs.

Edge: Astros.

Center Field

Astros: Carlos Beltran. One of the most talented players in the majors, acquired from Kansas City on June 24. Came up huge in first playoff series, going 10-of-22 (.455) with club-record four homers and eight RBIs.

The Cardinals' Edgar Renteria crosses the plate for a run against the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Cardinals: Jim Edmonds. Big second half propelled him into MVP talk along with teammates Pujols and Rolen. Hit 42 homers, one off franchise record for left-handed hitters set by Johnny Mize in 1940.

Edge: Even.

Right Field

Astros: Lance Berkman. Switch-hitter is the most powerful bat in a star-studded lineup. Production fell off a bit after strong start, but bounced back in a big way during the playoff run. Provides a solid glove in outfield, too.

Cardinals: Larry Walker. Three-time NL batting champion was final piece to game's best lineup, thriving in second slot ahead of Pujols. Making only second postseason appearance, and first since 1995 with Colorado. Acquired from Rockies on Aug. 6.

Edge: Even.

Starting Pitching

Astros: RH Brandon Backe, RH Pete Munro, RH Roger Clemens, RH Roy Oswalt. Few teams can boast a 1-2 punch like Clemens and Oswalt – but they won't pitch the first two games after closing out the opening round. Won crucial games for Astros en route to NLCS. Munro started season in minors with Twins.

Cardinals: RH Woody Williams, RH Matt Morris, RH Jeff Suppan, RH Jason Marquis. Instead, Marquis (15 wins), Suppan (16) and injured Chris Carpenter (15) put together career years. Carpenter is still out with nerve damage in his right biceps and Morris has had up-and-down season, leaving Williams as the de facto ace.

Edge: Cardinals – would be different if Clemens and Oswalt opened the series.

making a play on the ball, but I think it proves my point.

DQ: You had two brothers, one of which played hockey at Holy Cross, what if any impact did they have on you athletically?

CT: My brother Greg was a lot older so I really wasn't around for his high school years. My brother John was four years ahead of me and he was really in to ice hockey. I had to travel all over New England to go to all of his games and he was a goalie. So I think the biggest impact was probably becoming a goalie. We didn't have one my freshman year and my coach asked if anyone wanted to do it and I though "Hey my brother's a goalie, I'll try." So that's how I got in to the position.

DQ: Did he ever try to give you advice?

CT: He thinks he can help me (laughs). He didn't really try to. He let me do my own thing.

DQ: What's the first thing you're doing if the Red Sox win the World Series?

CT: I haven't thought that far ahead. I don't want to get my hopes too high, but I will do something!

DQ: Do you believe in "The Curse?"

CT: I don't. I think it's a shame we haven't won in a long time, but I think it can easily be broken.

DQ: What's the best part of being a student athlete?

CT: I would have to say coming to school and having friends already. It made the adjustment of coming to college so much easier. I thought that was great, and keeping those friends and making new ones within the athletic department. I have friends outside, but I think the friends in the athletic department understand where we're coming from, so we're on the same page.

DQ: On the flip side what's the worst part of being a student athlete?

CT: I think it's the stereotype we're given that we think we're cool or we're the big jock on campus. I don't like that.

DQ: Your family owns a plumbing company, what's the best way to unclog a toilet and does jiggling the handle work?

CT: Well my family owns an electrical company.

DQ: Sorry I got some bad information then.

CT: It's my uncle's company, and he's not even an electrician. He just owns it. But to answer your question, I've done it numerous times, my apartment toilet is not so great. Jiggling, no it never works, at least not for us. As far as plunging a toilet, I don't know, you just do it.

MATHEW REDCOLLEGIAN

UMass keeper Christine Tocco has a 2.96 goals against average (GAA), this season.

DQ: It's Friday night and you've got Saturday off from field hockey, what are you doing with yourself?

CT: Focusing on the next game

DQ: Don't lie to me.

CT: Laughs, I try to get out and spend time with friends. You get so caught up in athletics, doing something with your team. I try to venture out from the athletic world and see the other side of life.

DQ: Finally, I ask one loaded question, which you can choose to pass if you want to wimp out. You have ten seconds to explain to my why field hockey players are better than soccer players.

CT: That's horrible. I like the soccer girls.

DQ: Oh here comes the PC answer.

CT: See. I think soccer's better than field hockey. I enjoy watching it more. I think soccer is more aggressive.

DQ: Is it the issue of the skirts?

CT: Oh I hate the skirts. I don't have to wear a skirt and that's cool. One of the reasons I became a goalie is because I didn't like the kilts.

AHL will take NHL revenue

The NHL lockout stands to be the AHL's gain.

With no major league hockey on the horizon anytime in the near future, attention has shifted to the American Hockey League, which is quickly becoming the next best thing.

The AHL is set to begin its 69th season and will do so with an influx of young talent it wouldn't have featured had the NHL started on time Wednesday night.

The league has welcomed hot-shot youngsters like Jason Spezza, Jay Bouwmeester, Joffrey Lupul, Marc-Andre Fleury, Stephen Weiss, Eric Staal, Jordin Tootoo and Scottie Upshall, who are allowed to play in the league because of their limited NHL experience.

And that will work to the advantage of hockey's top minor league just like it did during the 103-day lockout a decade ago that cut the NHL season nearly in half.

"We certainly expect it will," AHL president and CEO Dave Andrews said. "We went through this in '94-95 and experienced some growth in terms of our exposure.

"And short term this time around, it's an opportunity for increased media exposure, it's an opportunity for increased revenues from ticket sales, particularly in markets close to NHL teams."

AHL hockey probably will be at its highest level ever this season, since nearly two-thirds of the 90 players taken in the first round of NHL drafts in the last three years will be on the ice when the league opens Wednesday.

There was fear a year ago that those young players wouldn't be allowed to take part in the AHL during a lockout. But those concerns didn't materialize.

"Obviously, if we had any number of NHL teams determine that they were not going to develop players, it could have had a devastating impact on our league," Andrews said. "The worst-case scenario would have been impacting a number of teams that would not have been able to operate."

Andrews expects a spike in attendance where AHL clubs play near NHL teams.

"We have a number of teams in and around Boston, we have a team in Chicago, a team in Philadelphia, and our team in Hamilton (Ontario) will benefit to some extent," Andrews said. "I think in those areas we'll see a very significant increase in attendance, and in others it remains to be seen. There's really no rationale why we would see greater attendance in certain markets that are distant from NHL teams."

Women's cross country finishes 11th

By Eric Athas
Collegian Correspondent

For the Massachusetts women's cross country team it was Freshman Christina Derosa once again who finished first place for the team and 25th overall, with a time of 18:39. The team as a whole finished 11th out of 45 teams at the New England Championships.

Derosa, who has come in first for UMass in the past four meets, was followed by Alexis Anzelone (18:53) who finished 39th. Cuisle Kierans (19:29) finished at the 86th spot. Amanda Dahlberg (19:31), and Kara Gillette (19:53) was the 129th runner to cross the finish line. Strong performances also came in from Tricia Silva (20:00) and Ashley Davidson (21:20).

Over 300 runners took part in this meet, but it was Lindsey Scherf of Harvard who had a time of 17:22.

So far this season, the Massachusetts women's cross country team has had strong showings at all of the meets they've attended. It is the leadership of seniors Dahlberg and Anzelone combined with the standout performances by the newcomers Kierans and Derosa that coach Julie Lafreniere feels is a main reason to their success.

The women will look to continue their strong season this Friday at the Albany Invitational.

Back on track for UMass

Field hockey set to take on UNH

BY DAVE QUINN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's been a long and frustrating season for the Massachusetts field hockey team, but there is definitely reason to believe that the Maroon and White (3-11, 1-1 A-10) have finally turned the corner.

After playing significantly better in their two games this weekend, there is a good chance that the Minutewomen could end their home stand on a high note as they take on the Wildcats of New Hampshire (2-11) at 7 p.m. tonight at Garber field.

Massachusetts split this weekend's contests dropping one Saturday to West Chester 3-2 but defeating La Salle 3-2 in penalty strokes on Sunday.

After a scoreless first half against West Chester (2-10), the Minutewomen broke the game open by scoring two quick goals early in the second half. The first came via Trish Bortoo on a pass from Marije Tigchelaar at 32:56. Four minutes later teammate Caitlin Beresin scored her fourth on the season thanks to an assist from Gina Sanders. Unfortunately for the Maroon and White the Golden Rams countered with three unanswered goals of their own in route to a 3-2 win.

UMass was able to create more scoring opportunities than it's accustomed to, firing 18 shots in the game.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen were having so much fun they decided to play extra frames with the Explorers (5-8). Massachusetts took a 2-1 lead right before halftime on Adrianne Monaco's second goal of the game, but midway through the second half, Colleen Nesbitt tied the game at two all. Neither team could produce another score through regulation or two overtime periods for that matter, as the game would be decided by penalty strokes.

Adrianne Monaco and La Salle's Amy Dalrymple both knocked in their teams first strokes, but their teammates were unable to convert on their next three attempts. Becky Letourneau saved La Salle's fifth and final shot by Emilie Stewart and then watched as team-

An interesting talk with a pure keeper

BY DAVE QUINN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It takes a special breed to be a goaltender. Cat like agility, a flexible frame, and a willingness to sacrifice life and limb to stop a moving object are just part of the job description. You also need a short memory. A goalie can never get too high after a save or too low after a goal because the next chance to prove themselves could only be seconds away. They are the stopper, the savior and sometimes the goat, even if their defense lets them down.

To better understand the "goalie" who better to ask than one of the top in the nation, Massachusetts own Christine Tocco. I sat down with her to talk about life in front of the net, being a teammate, growing up, and living as a college student:

DQ: Aside from field hockey, you played several other sports in high school including ice hockey. That's not surprising, but what is surprising was the fact that you were a forward. What gives?

CT: I wanted to score. I was sick of being stuck in a little circle watching my teammates attack the other goalie. I wanted to be that person for a change so I was the center. It was fun for a year.

DQ: Did you model your playing style after any other goalie, whether it be a professional in the National Hockey League or somebody you watched in field hockey?

CT: Before high school I had never seen a field hockey game played before, so the only person I could think of is the person who was a head of me in high school. She was very aggressive and very good in net. I took what I learned from her and made my own style from that. I try not to compare myself to other goalies.

DQ: Do you get even a little pleasure out of taking out an offensive player who comes a little too close to you in the circle?

CT: I love it. There's something about seeing the girl hit the ground that gets me a little excited (laughs). I never do it intentionally, I'm just

Minutewomen get in a groove

Last Friday, in the midst of a neck-and-neck battle with the Richmond Spiders, Massachusetts soccer coach Jim Rudy remained seemingly calm and collective.

While Spiders head coach Peter Albright continued to raise his voice at everything and everyone, Rudy was busy letting loose a wisecrack.

Brendan Hall

"Settle down, you sound like John Daly," Rudy shouted across the sideline to him, cracking a smile.

In one fell swoop, Albright went from sixty to zero on a dime. "The golfer or the coach?" he hollered back with a chuckle.

So how, in the middle of a race to qualify for the postseason — not to mention a crucial Atlantic 10 Conference match up — can he remain so tranquil? Look no further than the play of the Minutewomen during their recent five-game homestand, which included a 4-1 thumping of the Holy Cross Crusaders and an overtime thriller over the Temple Owls 3-2.

The Maroon and White lost that fateful game to Richmond 1-0, but bounced back two days later to down the George Washington Colonials 2-0, concluding a homestretch in which they went 3-2 (they also lost to St. Joseph's on Oct. 1). With Sunday's win over GWU, the Minutewomen have equaled their win total from a year ago (four wins), with still half of the A-10 season to go.

Like its upset of Central Connecticut State three weeks ago, leaving Amherst to hit the road having won three of their last five has proven to be a momentum-changer for UMass.

And the players are thrilled.

"I thought this weekend would be our biggest A-10 weekend," junior midfielder Lindsey Bellini said. "We've got Dayton and Xavier [this] weekend. Dayton's pretty good, so hopefully we can carry some of this momentum into that game."

"This was a huge turnaround," sophomore goalkeeper Kristin Walker said of the success at home. "We knew we had to come out hard, particularly since we're going to be on the road for a while. We knew that with [five] home games in a row you have to come out with at least more wins than losses. This is big."

Walker, of course, recorded her first shutout in that last game against George Washington after a series of hits and misses, earning her A-10 Rookie of the Week honors this week. It is a sign of an improvement along a defensive front that is allowing the offense to take more shots than ever.

Enter factor number one: the Minutewomen are converting more shots into goals. At the beginning of the season, you could see the frustration on players' faces: wide left, wide right, off the crossbar, it was enough to make Scott Norwood feel at home.

How did they respond to their frustration? Practice — and lots of it. They focused heavily on making their shots in practice, and it slowly began to pay off. The Maroon and white got their first taste of redemption against the CCSU Blue Devils when Adair Blyler and Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather each tallied their first goals of the season after many misses in previous games. The Minutewomen went up 2-0 on what is regarded as one of the premier teams in the northeast, and never looked back.

The thrill of victory caught up with them again in the crunch 12 days later behind the feet of freshman and leading scorer Britt Canfield. Down 2-1 late in the second half against Temple, Canfield slipped one by netminder Jackie Mauro through a scrum to tie things up. Then, in the ninth minute of overtime, she knocked a feed from Liz Weinstein through Mauro and into the left corner of the net to seal a comeback victory.

UMass took 32 shots to Temple's seven in that game. That means they converted almost a whopping 11 percent of their shots. Practice indeed does make perfect. And it's coming from more than just one or two players.

Enter factor number two: the Minutewomen are staying relatively injury-free. Well, for the most part. Seniors Carly Turman and Erica Wideburg are done for the season, Kristin Rutland now dresses but still feels the effects of her abdominal tear, and from time to time a player or two will be out. But compared to last season's astronomical plethora of injuries, some freakish, having just one or two players sidelined might feel like a relief.

Amy Maffuci has started every game this yar for the Minutewomen. UMass will travel to Dayton on Friday for a 7:30 p.m. kickoff.

Men's XC comes in 21st

BY MARTHA POWERS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Disappointed is the only way to describe the Massachusetts men's cross-country team after last Friday's New England Championships. The Minutemen finished 21st out of 48 teams in a field of 315 runners.

The team was hoping to continue the momentum it had from its previous race, when the Minutemen finished first in the Orange County Classic beating rival Syracuse.

"We did awful," Captain Matt Clark said. "I haven't been this upset about cross-country in a long time. This proves that we are not yet a good team because a good team would've pulled off a decent race and we didn't."

Finishing first for Massachusetts was Ryan Corbett, 59th place (26:01). Matt Clark finished 114th (26:48), Matt Klypka 115th (26:49), Sean Corbett 129th (27:00), Nils Fischer 144th (27:14), Paul Noone 159th (27:25), and Andy McCarron 163rd (27:27).

At first glance, it may appear that even though the team didn't finish well, they were running together as a pack because there was 74 seconds between the top five runners. But, during the first meet of the season, that time was only 36 seconds. "This is not a good sign," Coach O'Brien said.

"I felt as though we would do considerably better," O'Brien said. "Going into the race it felt comfortable. You never really know why this happens."

Even though O'Brien didn't think his team would do so poorly, he wasn't completely surprised.

"This was our first championship race, and there are unique challenges with each step you take up. Only 3 out of our twelve runners ran this meet last year, so this race was uncharted waters for most of the team," O'Brien said.

Some of the runners mixed up their race numbers, which according to O'Brien "showed just how nervous they were before the race." In a meet that included such powerhouse running schools like Providence, the young Massachusetts team couldn't keep up.

"The excitement of competing with so many runners and so much talent results in a very fast first mile," O'Brien said. "Inexperienced people can lose their focus in the big crowd. As an athlete, you have to know how you are doing without relying on outside stimuli. In a big meet, inexperienced runners who have depended on outside stimuli suddenly find that they have disappeared."

Even though the Minutemen had an off day on Friday, Clark is still optimistic and knows that the team "needs to pull together." Hopefully the team will in time for their next meet this Saturday in Albany.

A glimpse at the NLCS matchup

FIRST BASE

Astros: Jeff Bagwell. Hit .318 with two homers and five RBIs in series against Atlanta, by far the best playoff performance of his career. Battled through shoulder pain all season, yet was one of the team's most reliable hitters in final month.

Cardinals: Albert Pujols. One of the game's top offensive powers. he's only third player in major league history to drive in 500 runs in his first four seasons. .

Edge: Cardinals.

SECOND BASE

Astros: Jeff Kent. Four-time All-Star holds major league record for homers at position and remains a dangerous hitter. The 36-year-old is a liability on defense, but hustles to make up for limitations. Other than Roger Clemens, is the team's fiercest competitor.

Cardinals: Tony Womack. Resurrected career after a spring training trade from the Red Sox that netted Boston only a minor league pitcher, and has sparked the top of the lineup.

Arm strength no longer a factor after weak start following off-season elbow surgery.

Edge: Astros.

SHORTSTOP

Astros: Jose Vizcaino. Versatile 38-year-old who boasts World Series experience with Yankees in 2000. Productive at plate (.274, 33 RBIs in 138 games) and is one of team's best defensive players.

Cardinals: Edgar Renteria. Had slight drop-off offensively, batting .287 after a .330, 100-RBI year last season. Still, among the team's top clutch hitters. Good range, strong arm.

Edge: Cardinals.

THIRD BASE

Astros: Morgan Ensberg. Struggled this year after hitting career-high 25 homers last season. Didn't connect until July 2 this year, finished with 10. Back spasms limited effectiveness in September and was replaced in lineup by Mike Lamb for 21 games.

Cardinals: Scott Rolen. Likely would have been NL MVP at All-Star break, and cleanup hitter was key to team taking control of Central. Dogged by injuries to left knee, left calf in second half and enters series in 3-for-29 slump. Defensively, has no peer.

Edge: Cardinals.

CATCHER

Astros: Brad Ausmus. Former two-time Gold Glove winner is dependable and consistent but offers little more. Hit .248 with little power, often replaced offensively in late innings.

Cardinals: Mike Matheny. Among best defensively at his position and prized for his handling of pitching staff. Light hitter bats eighth and had career-best 50 RBIs, but tied Pujols for team lead in RBIs (5) in division series.

Edge: Cardinals.

LEFT FIELD

Astros: Craig Biggio. Still one of the game's best leadoff hitters

'Fahrenheit 9/11' is example of changes in documentary field

BY SHERRY LANARD
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Documentaries such as "Fahrenheit 9/11" and "Hijacking Catastrophe" are examples of new developments in the way documentaries are produced, developments that may be the "best and the worst of worlds," according to Professor Martin Allor of Concordia University.

A well-known scholar in the field of documentaries, Allor spoke in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center on Wednesday afternoon. Allor said the "boundaries of the term 'documentary' have always been contested," but even more so recently with changes in mode of documenting material.

There is more work in the field of documentary production, but the people who entered the field originally to make documentaries feel disconnected from what they had once been doing, said Allor.

The serial modes of production have been altered in so many ways, and money and funding is harder to find unless the documentary is to be a mainstream production.

Popular reality TV shows and large theatrically released documentaries like "Fahrenheit 9/11" have changed the way documentaries are produced. In contrast, single author films that have not been funded and produced by large broadcasting agencies.

Allor said that documentary producers now are finding it increasingly difficult to get funding unless they pitch the idea to a broadcasting company and have a broadcasting license first. Therefore, there have been an increasing number of short series made for TV in place of feature-length documentaries.

Some new forms of documentaries that have arisen recently include the docu-soap. This is a blend of documentary of soap opera and documentary where short clips are captured and put together in a way that it feels almost as if the viewer is watching a simultaneous grouping of events when in actuality, the weekly hour could be events from an entire week.

However, smaller producers are lighting back. There has been a recent localization movement in the making of documentary films. Small independent documentaries have become increasingly easy to make with new video, computer and Internet technologies.

The makers have noticed that the cheap and quick editing software make it easy to do most of the work on their own and make it able to be posted on the Internet minutes or hours later.

Allor said one of his career goals is to open a center for documentary media with a colleague. The center would be for mediation and intervention with documenters.

Allor received his PhD at the University of Illinois. He then taught at the University of New Hampshire before working as a professor at Concordia University where he was the Head of the Communications Department

Alternative energy sources to be explored in Friday talk

BY MICHAEL PARRISH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

As global warming becomes a growing concern, the search for alternative energy sources is becoming more important. Scientists are working to find technologies that could replace current energy sources such as fossil fuels or batteries.

Assistant Professor Erin Baker of the Mechanical and Industrial Engineering Department at the University of Massachusetts has contributed to advancing a policy for alternative energy sources.

Her recent collaboration of papers, "Uncertainty and Learning in a Strategic Environment," which deals with resource and energy economics and "Optimal Technology R&D in the Face of Climate Uncertainty," which deals with climate changes and investing in alternative energy sources, will be discussed Friday at the Isenberg School of Management in room 112 from 11 a.m. to noon.

The paper was a collaboration between Professor Baker, Leon Clarke of the joint Global Change Research Institute and John Weyant a professor at Stanford University. They submitted the paper to Climatic Change earlier this year.

The broad subject of Baker's presentation on this paper will deal with climate change and global warming. She is trying to push for policies on alternative energy sources so that firms may invest in them. More specifically, Baker is trying to find the best alternative energy sources for firms to invest in and whether they should invest in them. Alternative energy sources she'll be discussing are from solar energy to hydrogen powered sources as opposed to fossil fuels.

Baker says the current energy sources people use create carbon monoxide a gas emission released by the burning of fuel, such as an automobile or a power plant. These emissions cause a greenhouse effect and in turn are a contributing factor in global warming.

Baker has taught at UMass for two years. She received her PhD from Stanford University in 2002. She has worked in the actuarial sciences, and taught math in Ghana and at a junior high school in America.

Baker says most importantly, she is trying to achieve something socially relevant in her career. Her speech is part of the INFORMS speaker series, which is a series to promote interest in and provide a means of communication between people in the fields of operations research and management sciences. The series is hosted by the INFORMS organization, which is a collaboration of students in the Isenberg School of Management, the College of Engineering and the departments of resource economics and mathematics.

Professor Donald Fisher of the Mechanical and Industrial Engineering Department gave a speech on Oct. 1 as part of the series titled, "How a Philosopher Became a Psychologist Who Fell in Love with Operations Research."

Two soliders killed in suicide attack; Driver ran car into U.S. convoy

A civilian car burns after a bombing in Mosul, Iraq on Monday. It was the second deadly suicide attack in the past three days.

BY ROBERT H. REID
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A suicide attack and roadside bombings killed six American soldiers, the U.S. command said Wednesday, as U.S. and Iraqi troops staged raids in Ramadi and Baqouba, stepping up pressure on Sunni insurgents before this week's start of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan.

A suicide driver plowed into a U.S. convoy and blew up his car Wednesday in the northern city of Mosul, killing two American soldiers and wounding five, according to the military. It was the second deadly suicide attack against American convoys in Mosul in the past three days.

In Baghdad, Iraq's interim prime minister also warned that U.S. and Iraqi forces will launch military operations in the main insurgent stronghold Fallujah if residents do not hand over Jordanian terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, whose group has kidnapped and beheaded numerous foreigners.

During Wednesday's raids, U.S. troops swept into the Sunni stronghold of Ramadi and joined Iraqi police and National Guardsmen in raids in Baqouba after a day of fierce clashes in militant enclaves stretching from the gates of Baghdad to the Syrian border.

Last year, insurgents sharply increased their attacks against U.S. and coalition forces during Ramadan, expected to start at the end of this week. Extremists believe they win a special place in paradise if they die in a jihad, or holy war, during Ramadan.

Three of the U.S. deaths occurred late Tuesday when a roadside bomb exploded near a U.S. convoy in eastern Baghdad, the U.S. command said. Another American soldier died in a bombing before dawn Wednesday in western Baghdad.

Two soldiers were killed Wednesday in the Mosul attack and five were wounded, two of whom returned to duty later in the day, the military said. One U.S. soldier was killed Monday in a similar suicide operation.

More than 1,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops launched two simultaneous raids Wednesday around Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, to clear the area of insurgents.

One of the early morning operations took place just south of the city, in the village of Daliabbas, said Capt. Marshall Jackson, spokesman for the 3rd Brigade, 1st Infantry Division. Several people were detained. The other operation also took place in Baqouba though no location was given.

"Basically, it's a pre-Ramadan operation just to clear up some of the area around Baqouba," Jackson said.

The city has been relatively peaceful in recent months, but U.S. commanders noted an upswing in insurgent activity during last year's Ramadan in Diyala province.

A police captain was killed Wednesday in a drive-by shooting near Baqouba, officials said. Insurgents regularly target Iraq's security forces, which are seen as collaborators with the United States and its allies.

In Ramadi, 70 miles west of Baghdad, U.S. troops sealed off key streets and searched buildings after days of clashes, residents reported. The U.S. command had no comment on the operation.

On Tuesday, Iraqi government soldiers supported by U.S. Marine and Army units raided seven mosques in Ramadi, detaining four people and seizing bomb-making materials and pro-insurgent literature, the military said.

The Association of Muslim Scholars, a Sunni clerical group suspected of links to the insurgency, condemned the mosque raids as an example of alleged American hostility toward Islam.

The U.S. command said the raids followed an increase in insurgent attacks in Ramadi and accused the militants of violating the sanctity of the mosques by using them for military purposes. Marine spokesman Maj. Francis Piccoli said U.S. troops provided backup for the Iraqi soldiers but did not enter the mosques.

In the north, Iraqi soldiers patrolling Tal Afar on Tuesday detained 18 suspected militants, while a joint U.S.-Iraqi operation in Mosul netted five suspected rebels wanted for mortar attacks on military bases and "intimidating local civilians," the military said in a statement. Two more suspects were arrested southeast of Samarra, the statement said.

U.S. and Iraqi forces have used a mix of diplomacy and pressure to try to suppress Iraq's mounting insurgency in time to hold nationwide elections in January.

A wave of deadly bombings, mortar and rocket attacks, kidnappings and shooting sprees has forced the United States to divert funds from reconstruction to security.

In Tokyo, U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Armitage acknowledged that the United States was initially too slow in channeling money to Iraq, telling a donor's conference in the Japanese capital that "it took longer than necessary to get our act together prior to turning over sovereignty" on June 28.

Last day to drop classes without "F"

University of Massachusetts undergraduates and Continuing Educations students have until Monday, October 25 to drop a fall semester course and receive only a "W" on their transcript.

Dropping the class will have no impact on one's cumulative average. A "W" is almost always preferable to an "F" on a transcript.

Students are encouraged to consult their academic dean for advice and appropriate procedures in order to drop a course.

However, students should be aware that in they must carry at least 12 credits for financial aid and health insurance purposes.

Republican voters on decline in Bay State

BOSTON (AP) — The number of registered Republican voters in Massachusetts has dropped to its lowest level since February 2000, despite attempts by GOP Gov. Mitt Romney to rebuild the party in a heavily Democratic state.

The figures released Tuesday by Secretary of State William F. Galvin show that the GOP rolls have dropped to 315,860 voters, down about 13,000 since Romney was elected in 2002.

Meanwhile, the Democratic Party enrolled more than 36,000 new voters over the same period, and the Libertarian and Green-Rainbow parties each added more than 2,000. The number of unenrolled voters fell by about 50,000, The Boston Globe reported.

The Democratic Party now has 1,479,055 voters, the highest number since at least 1948, the earliest year that the secretary of state's office published figures.

Republican Party enrollment in Massachusetts reached a high point of 743,736 in 1954.

Galvin said he thinks the decline reflects President Bush's slipping popularity in the home state of his rival, Sen. John F. Kerry.

"I'm not saying it's insignificant that (Republican enrollment) went down, but I think it's more reflective of feelings about Bush, and not Romney," said Galvin, a Democrat.

Romney has worked to recruit Republican legislative candidates to challenge Democratic incumbents, who hold an overwhelming majority in both the House and Senate.

Party officials downplayed the new enrollment numbers, saying the governor's efforts have focused on recruiting candidates, not registering new GOP voters.

"We continue to face the Democratic monopoly, and this is bad for the people of Massachusetts," said Tim O'Brien, GOP executive director. "If we are going to restore a healthy democracy, we need to focus on electing more Republican reformers to the (state) Legislature."

Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney

As a percentage of the total number of votes in the state, Democrats have actually lost ground since the 1980s, while the proportion of unenrolled voters has increased.

The percentage of unenrolled voters increased from 44 in 1990 to 49 now, while the Democrats' share of the electorate fell from 42 percent in 1990 to 37 percent today. Republicans have hovered around 13 percent.

Wednesday was the last day to register to vote in the Nov. 2 election. Galvin predicted that overall enrollment would increase by several thousand when the final figures are tallied for this election season.

Israel plans to limit access to holy site during Ramadan

By Karin Laub
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) — Israel said Wednesday it would severely limit the access of Muslim worshippers to Jerusalem's holiest site during the holy month of Ramadan, claiming it could collapse.

Angry Muslim clerics dismissed Israeli's claims, saying Arab engineers assured them the Al Aqsa Mosque compound was stable. They accused Israel of exaggerating the danger in hopes of increasing its control over the site, which is administered by the Islamic Trust.

Israeli police and archaeologists warned that because of a recent earthquake, part of the compound, Islam's third holiest shrine, might collapse under large crowds of believers during Ramadan, which begins this weekend.

The sacred hilltop, revered by Jews as the site of their biblical temples, is one of the most sensitive spots in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and riots there in 2000 escalated into the current round of fighting. Israeli attempts to restrict the number of worshippers could lead to more Palestinian protests.

Israel's police minister, Gideon Ezra, said he wants the Islamic Trust, or Waqf, to declare the southeastern corner of the holy site compound off-limits.

If the Waqf does not agree, "we will view this as a real and immediate threat and we can't let this happen ... we will have to limit the number of worshippers to 50,000 or 60,000," Ezra told Israel Army Radio. The compound holds about 250,000 people and is often filled to capacity during the main Ramadan prayers.

The chief Muslim cleric, or mufti, of Jerusalem, said he would not go along with the Israeli request. Egyptian and Jordanian engineers who inspected the walls after the earthquake said that "there is no real danger," the mufti, Ikrema Sabri, told The Associated Press.

After nightfall Wednesday, an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at a group of militants near Beit Lahiya, a town in the northern part of the Gaza Strip, witnesses said, killing one person. Hamas officials said he was Hassan Shakfi, 24, a member of the Islamic group. The Israeli military had no immediate comment.

Around the same time, an Israeli attack helicopter fired a missile in the Rafah refugee camp at the other end of the Gaza Strip, along the Egyptian border, Palestinians said. No one was hurt. About 20 tanks were seen massing at the edge of the camp.

Earlier Wednesday, Israeli troops captured the Hamas chief in the West Bank city of Hebron after surrounding his hideout. The fugitive, Lymad Qawasmeh, was ordered to strip to ensure he was not armed, and was led away blindfolded and in his underwear.

Afghan election marks a fresh start

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — The successful Afghan election "spells the end" of the rule of the gun in the war-battered country, the top U.S. commander here said Wednesday, although he added that American troops would remain for the foreseeable future.

The upbeat assessment came as a panel of foreign experts began to work through a total of 43 complaints of irregularities received by the 16 candidates in Saturday's first direct presidential vote.

Craig Jenness, a Canadian who is one of the three panelists, said the committee had reviewed 37 of the complaints and recommended ballot boxes from 10 sites be quarantined as a result. Vote counting, which still hasn't begun four days after the vote, cannot start until all 43 complaints are reviewed.

Jenness did not say when the review would be complete, but he said that counting would begin "very quickly" after it is. Jenness said election officials have given candidates until Thursday to file additional complaints, but that vote counting would not be held up for those new complaints. Final results are not expected until late October.

Eight people stranded for 24 hours since a helicopter sent to retrieve ballots crash-landed at high altitude in northeastern Afghanistan were rescued Wednesday, said U.N. spokesman Manoel de Almeida e Silva. The crash slowed collection of ballots from the region.

Lt. Gen. David Barno, the top U.S. commander, said the election was an important milestone.

"This turning point spells the end of more than two decades of the rule of the gun in this nation and confirms the bright hope of all the Afghan people in a democratic future centered on the rule of law," he said.

Germany worried over U.S. plan for Afghanistan

By Paul Ames
Associated Press

POIANA BRASOV, Romania (AP) — Germany's defense minister rejected a U.S. proposal to have NATO take over the U.S.-led military mission in Afghanistan, saying Wednesday that his country wants to focus on stabilization.

Peter Struck spoke on the opening day of a meeting of NATO defense ministers. The proposal would combine the NATO peacekeeping force in Afghanistan with the 18,000 strong U.S.-commanded combat mission fighting remnants of the Taliban and al-Qaida.

"We are against a merger of the two mandates," Struck told German radio. "The German government sees its engagement primarily with the ... stabilization mandate."

NATO currently commands the International Security Assistance Force in Kabul, the Afghan capital, and it has set up five Provincial Reconstruction Teams in northern Afghanistan. Its troops do not conduct combat missions as U.S. forces do.

Nicholas Burns, the U.S. ambassador to NATO, had told reporters traveling with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld on Tuesday that the United States wants the two missions combined under an alliance commander, possibly as early as 2005.

"It's a very complicated issue, how you put these two very different military missions together," Burns said. "But there will be a number of people who will support — we will certainly support — a direction to the military leaders of the alliance to go and look at this question."

Burns said he expects the alliance's military leaders to present answers at a planned February meeting of defense ministers in Nice, France.

Since August 2003, NATO has run a peacekeeping mission in the Afghan capital, Kabul, separate from the U.S. combat mission. In recent months, NATO has expanded the mission into northern provinces in Afghanistan and is now seeking to increase the 8,000-troop force to move into a western sector.

Mount St. Helens' rising lava gives off an eerie glow at night

By Peggy Andersen
Associated Press

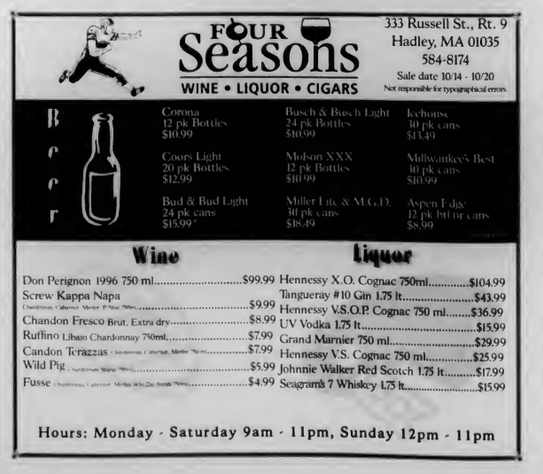
SEATTLE, WA (AP) — The molten rock rising inside Mount St. Helens is giving the peak an eerie red glow at night.

Lava has been climbing to the surface at nearly 1,300 degrees for the past few days in a process that scientists said Wednesday could go on for days, weeks or months. At night, low-hanging clouds and the steam rising from the volcano reflect the glow of the red-hot stone inside the crater.

Scientists said they do not know how long the eruption might continue, or whether it will be marked by explosive blasts. But they said any eruption would probably be far less dangerous than the cataclysmic explosion in 1980 that blasted away much of the mountaintop and killed 57 people.

The area immediately around the mountain remains closed.

The molten rock, or magma, rising inside the mountain has been depositing itself on the crater floor inside the volcano, halfway up the 8,634-foot peak, creating a "fin" of rock estimated Tuesday at 60 to 90 feet tall and 150 to 180 feet wide.



The fin, at about 750 degrees, has a pinkish cast "like medium roast beef," geologist Tina Neal of the U.S. Geological Survey said.

Massachusetts imposes restrictions on flu vaccine

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The state Department of Public Health on Wednesday issued an order limiting distribution of the scarce influenza vaccine to people considered "high risk" for the virus.

Public Health Commissioner Christine Ferguson said the state, facing an unparalleled shortage of flu shots, had to direct vaccinations to people most likely to die from the illness, such as very young children, seniors over 65 and people with chronic medical conditions.

"It's not rationing," she said. "It's being rational about how to reduce the number of deaths that could result from a serious flu season."

The order also requires health care providers to report flu shot supplies to the state. Ferguson said the state had no plans to take over private supplies, though she said, "It's not impossible." Rather, she said, the state can better lobby for its share of the 22.4 million doses the federal government plans to distribute if it has a handle on its own supplies.

Health care providers who defy Ferguson's order face a maximum penalty of a $200 fine per infraction and six months in jail.

A state order controlling what the private sector can do with its own medicine is "unprecedented," and makes it difficult for public flu shot clinics to continue, since many can't verify a "high risk" status for patients, said Dr. John Foster, medical director of the North End Rehabilitation and Nursing Center, a nursing home. But he added the order is needed.

"I think it is a public health crisis," he said. "They can't wait and give vaccines out to people who shouldn't get it."

About 60 percent of the state's flu vaccine is generally distributed by doctors, health clinics and other private parties, Ferguson said. The rest is given out by the state.

Last week, British regulators unexpectedly shut down a major U.S. vaccine supplier, Chiron Corp., citing concerns about bacterial contamination. The move froze shipment of up to 48 million flu shots.

THE "HIGH RISK" GROUP INCLUDES THE FOLLOWING:

— Children ages 6 months to 23 months.

— Adults age 65 and over.

— Anyone six months and older with chronic medical conditions, such as heart disease, asthma and diabetes.

— Out of home caregivers and household contacts of children younger than six months.

— Residents of nursing homes and long term care facilities.

— Children six months to 18 years on chronic aspirin therapy.

— Health care workers who have direct contact with patients.

Implantable chip provides medical info and privacy issues

COURTESY UVA

An implantable computer chip can track medical history.

By Diedtra Henderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Medical milestone or privacy invasion? A tiny computer chip approved Wednesday for implantation in a patient's arm can speed vital information about a patient's medical history to doctors and hospitals. But critics warn that it could open new ways to imperil the confidentiality of medical records.

The Food and Drug Administration said Wednesday that Applied Digital Solutions of Delray Beach, Fla., could market the VeriChip, an implantable computer chip about the size of a grain of rice, for medical purposes.

With the pinch of a syringe, the microchip is inserted under the skin in a procedure that takes less than 20 minutes and leaves no stitches. Silently and invisibly, the dormant chip stores a code that releases patient-specific information when a scanner passes over it.

Think UPC code. The identifier, emblazoned on a food item, brings up its name and price on the cashier's screen.

The VeriChip itself contains no medical records, just codes that can be scanned, and revealed, in a doctor's office or hospital. With that code, the health providers can unlock that portion of a secure database that holds that person's medical information, including allergies and prior treatment. The electronic database, not the chip, would be updated with each medical visit.

The microchips have already been implanted in 1 million pets. But the chip's possible dual use for tracking people's movements, as well as speeding delivery of their medical information to emergency rooms, has raised alarm.

"If privacy protections aren't built in at the outset, there could be harmful consequences for patients," said Emily Stewart, a policy analyst at the Health Privacy Project.

To protect patient privacy, the devices should reveal only vital medical information, like blood type and allergic reactions, needed for health care workers to do their jobs, Stewart said.

An information technology guru at Detroit Medical Center, however, sees the benefits of the devices and will lobby for his center's inclusion in a VeriChip pilot program.

"One of the big problems in health care has been the medical records situation. So much of it is still on paper," said David Ellis, the center's chief futurist and co-founder of the Michigan Electronic Medical Records Initiative.

As "medically mobile" patients visit specialists for care, their records fragment on computer systems that don't talk to each other.

"It's part of the future of medicine to have these kinds of technologies that make life simpler for the patient," Ellis said. Pushing for the strongest encryption algorithms to ensure hackers can't nab medical data as information transfers from chip to reader to secure database, will help address privacy concerns, he said.

Appeals court throws out anti-abortion protesters case

BOSTON (AP) — The 1st U.S. Court of Appeals on Tuesday denied a second appeal by anti-abortion protesters challenging the legality of a state law creating a "buffer zone" around abortion clinics.

In arguments earlier this year, a lawyer for the three protesters argued that the buffer zones, which extend in an 18-foot radius from a clinic's entrance, have unfairly become a place where only abortion-rights rhetoric can be uttered.

The court ruled that law has been enforced fairly.

"There is no evidence that the police have enforced this statute in anything other than an evenhanded way," Appeals Court Judge Sandra Lynch said.

This is the second time the case has come before the court. In the first appeal, the anti-abortion protesters argued the statute was an unconstitutional infringement on free speech. A federal district court agreed, but the appeals court overturned that decision.

In the latest appeal, protesters said that the statute was unconstitutional in the manner it has been applied, with clinic workers essentially allowed to advocate for abortion rights as they escort patients into the clinic. The court ruled that police officers have acted fairly by addressing this type of behavior any time it has been brought to their attention.

Lawmakers began pushing for a buffer zone after John Salvi fatally shot two female workers and injured others at two Brookline abortion clinics in 1994.

The law, passed in 2000, prohibits anyone from coming within six feet of patients within an 18-foot radius of a clinic entrance. The law created an exemption for clinic employees as long as they're "acting within the scope of their employment."

The protesters' lawyer, Mark Rienzi, did not immediately return calls for comment about whether the decision would be appealed.

Abortion rights advocates applauded the decision, saying that the buffer zone law has once again proven it can stand up to judicial scrutiny.

"It's a shame that anti-choice protesters are wasting the court's time by challenging this law," said Melissa Kogut, executive director of NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts. "We worked hard to pass the buffer zone bill and we know that it passes constitutional muster."

Massachusetts Citizens for Life, which opposes abortion, said the buffer zone law continues to deny women and their unborn children the protection they deserve.

"What this always brings to mind for me is, what's wrong with information?" said Marie Sturgis, executive and legislative director for the anti-abortion organization. "There has to be some sort of a statement made at that moment as the final piece before she goes in to obtain an abortion. To deny that is a violation of the humanity for that woman."

Attorney General Thomas Reilly, who was the lead defendant in the case, said the decision was a tribute to the state's efforts to balance competing interests.

"This law is a common-sense measure that protects public safety and women's access to health care while still respecting free speech rights," Reilly said in a statement. "This decision clearly affirms the work of my office and local police to assure that the law is enforced in a fair and evenhanded way."

In the case, Lynch said there was evidence that clinic workers tell patients that they do not have to listen to the protesters, that they have tried to drown out the words of the protesters, and that they have taken anti-abortion leaflets out of patients' hands.

She wrote, however, that there is no evidence that this has been done without the patients' consent or that any of these actions, on their face, would violate the statute. Further, Lynch found that "even if the plaintiffs have produced some evidence that pro-abortion individuals violated the statute, they are stymied because there is no evidence that the police turned a blind eye toward pro-abortion speech while not turning a blind eye to possible transgressions by plaintiffs."

Survey says Americans are holding back on weight gain

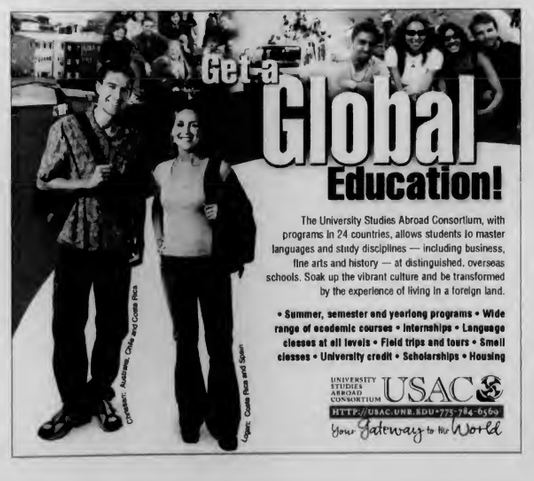
Obesity is still an epidemic problem in the United States, despite a multi-billion dollar diet industry and better calorie awareness.

By Michael Hill
Associated Press

Americans are more calorie-conscious and holding the line on weight gain after years of expanding waistlines, according to a market survey released Wednesday, but nutrition experts were wary of the findings.



The NPD Group's annual survey on eating habits found the portion of overweight Americans holding at 62 percent for a second year. The percentage had increased every year since 1995, when the Long Island, N.Y.-based market research firm began tracking weight trends.

While the results seemed promising, academic researchers said the company's figures should be approached with caution.

"I want to be a little cautious before we run out and say, 'Hey, Americans have changed their diet!'" said Barry Popkin, who heads nutrition epidemiology at the University of North Carolina. NPD, which sells its annual Eating Patterns in America report to businesses, found a number of encouraging signs about Americans' diets.

Twenty-seven percent of people surveyed said they were aware of calories in their meals, the highest level since 1999. The percentage of Americans concerned about sugar in their diets was up and a majority said it was important for their foods to be fresh.

Survey participants also held the line on snack meals, eating 250 per person for the year, down from 253 five years ago.

Looking for an Opportunity to Make a Difference?

CIA's Directorate of Intelligence will be interviewing candidates for Analyst Positions.

Representatives from CIA's analytical arm, the Directorate of Intelligence, will be interviewing for analyst positions in Boston during the week of November 15th. Analysts work on the forefront of protecting national security, quickly assessing how rapidly changing international developments will impact US interests at home and abroad. They use information from classified and unclassified sources from around the world to develop and provide the reliable intelligence that is essential for US policymakers to make informed decisions. The DI is hiring for the following positions:

- Analytic Methodologist
- Collection Analyst
- Counterintelligence Threat Analyst
- Counterterrorism Analyst
- Economic, Political, Leadership and Military Analysts
- Science, Technology and Weapons Analyst
- Medical Analyst
- Psychological/Psychiatric Analyst
- Crime and Counternarcotics Analyst

Candidates must have at least a bachelor's degree with a minimum GPA of 3.0. Language skills, previous foreign area residence or travel, and relevant work experience are pluses. Candidates must successfully complete a medical examination, polygraph interview, and an extensive background investigation. All positions require US citizenship and relocation to the Washington, DC area.

There's more to Oz than Finding Nemo

World Perspectives

Jennifer Kim

It was a cold and stormy night. The wind was blowing, the sea crashing. A dark silhouette of a man appeared in the mist. Like a quick flash of lightning, the figure disappeared into thin air. This is the way in which I imagined the re-enactment of this Houdini-like story. No, mates, this was not a show performed by David Blaine (although, I'm sure he could pull this trick out of a hat blindfolded and tied up to the North Pole), but in fact the Prime Minister of Australia.

In 1967, the Prime Minister of Australia went out for a swim one day and never came back. Just like that, he vanished. No one has heard of him since or the existence of any shape or form like him. People were in awe and wonder about this bizarre phenomenon for a moment (give or take a week) and then just like the vanishing act, the story disappeared. The Australians, with their easygoing attitude, approached this saying, "It's no drama. He'll be apples." The translation of this message is something like "It's nothing big. He'll be alright." How is it that the media didn't make this a bigger deal than it could have? And how is it that I, as an American, never even heard of such a thing when clearly the Australians know much more about America than I do myself.

It's funny how Australia is the only continent in the world that is also a country and yet no one ever hears or knows about what is going on in the Down Under. Heck, who knew that Australia had a prime minister (John Howard)? I know I sure didn't! Still, Australians are so keen on America and the government, but we don't even give the Australian government a second glance. Although, when have we ever given another country's government a second glance? It seems to me that our darling motherland can be naive and a bit egocentric. I first-handedly witnessed my ignorance to the Australian government and other political matters in America with the elections this year.

I remember being confronted with various questions from some of my Aussie friends on my opinion of whether or not Kerry would win in the race against Bush. I was quite surprised that they actually knew who John Kerry was. In all honesty, I had no idea who John Howard's principal adversary was (Mark Latham). To develop my ignorance even further, I decided to watch Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 911" with some of my Aussie friends who were very eager to watch it.

Never before have I been that embarrassed in a movie theatre. It was incredibly hard for me to sit still throughout the entire movie without itching with disgrace of my incompetence of the American government. When the clip of Britney Spears appeared, popping her bubblegum and commenting on George Bush, it didn't help alleviate my embarrassment one bit. Given, it was a propaganda film and the main point was for exploitation. However, imagine a theater full of Australians laughing along Michael Moore's sarcastic statements about the U.S. government and George Bush. OK, guaranteed if I were back in the states watching this, I would be freely chuckling along as well. Due to the fact that I was the only American in the entire theatre, I felt a mix between embarrassment and shame.

...Who knew that Australia had a prime minister? I know I sure didn't! Still, Australians are so keen on America and the government, but we don't even give the Australian government a second glance.

The worst was probably the ride home when my friends began asking me even further detailed questions of whether I knew this and that about the U.S. government. The only portrayal they receive about our government is through the media but the fact that the Aussies are so curious with our country strikes me as odd. I rarely think about Australia other than the fact that "Finding Nemo" was based in this country or Bart getting the "boot" in a "Simpsons" episode (oh by the way ... the Aussies get a lit when referring to the stereotypes depicted in that episode).

Now that I'm actually here in Australia, I hope I can think outside the box that I was so comfortable with, and essentially discover what is happening in the country I'm presently living in.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CONSEQUENCES OF DRINKING

Alcohol can bring you the best of times and the worst of times. I am sure most of you reading this have had a few drinks during your stay here at UMass and you know what I am talking about. We college kids drink all the time. And why not? We are only going to be in college for four years, (some of us five or six), and then we will be in the "real world" with "real responsibilities." So why not live it up now and drink all the alcohol you can in your short stay here? I'll tell you why not. One night of excessive drinking and poor judgment can change your whole life. Let me tell you the story of my good friend Jim.

Jim was a pretty good student, and he was hoping to go to medical school after graduation. On a Friday night, early last semester Jim decided he was going to get drunk. He told me he had a bunch of exams that week and he was stressed out so why not get wasted. Later that night, as Jim polished off the bottle of Rubinoff, we somehow lost each other in the crowd at some party. A few minutes later there was a fight on the other side of the party from where I was and I didn't think much of it, but after a few minutes I found myself where the fight took place and found Jim bloodied on the lawn. He was ok, just a little sore. A couple of bystanders told me that Jim had started the fight over a spilled beer. Before we could even try to get out of there the cops showed up and took Jim and the other kid away in handcuffs.

Although you might be thinking to yourself that this isn't so bad, and that fights like that happen all the time, it was that bad for Jim. He was arrested for assault and battery and disorderly conduct. He was put on probation for a year with random drug and alcohol tests and a few other stipulations, but this isn't the worst part. Jim went on a few interviews with potential medical schools, and although he had the grades to get in, he did not get accepted. He felt it was the arrest on his record that kept him from getting in.

That one night of drinking changed his life. Although there are other ways that drinking can change your life far worse than what happened to Jim, I am sure he would tell you that what happened to him was no small potatoes either.

I am not preaching to everyone here and telling you all not to drink, because that would be like telling a hungry bear not to eat. I am just saying that taking it easy and staying in control wouldn't be the worst thing to do this weekend.

ALL MUST CRY OUT

As a white person, I was deeply saddened and disturbed by Zach Oelschlegel's column ("Redefining racism is cliché" Oct. 12), as I have also been deeply saddened and disturbed by previous articles and columns appearing in the last few weeks that defend the inexcusable actions of Higgins et al, demonize ALANA and its members, and ignore the fact that the mass mobilization on campus that cries out "racism" has moved far beyond just ALANA (and people of color, for that matter).

Oelschlegel misses the boat. Why are we debating the validity of ALANA's use of the word "racism"? Why are we even entertaining a discussion on whether or not campus leaders should pay attention to students' of color concerns? This is outrageous! Imagine what possibilities could exist if white students and administrators' first response was not to defend and critique, but rather to shut up and listen.

The language of powerlessness

David Lewis

There is a growing trend of mainstream American culture taking over the subcultures that criticize and oppose it. By providing a forum, capital, and a broader audience, the mainstream lures fresh and potentially revolutionary subcultures into its folds until the two are no longer distinguishable. In the same way that the white mainstream stole jazz, blues, and rock from African-Americans over 50 years ago, the artistic expressions of the disenfranchised American youth are systematically hijacked by the industry of popular culture, and then subsequently sold back to the youth for profit. This is what became of the hippy, skater, grunge, and even house/techno and rave cultures. Similarly, the central elements of hip-hop (rap, graffiti, and breakdancing) have been so entirely commercialized that one can legitimately argue that hip-hop no longer belongs to itself.

The trend toward commercialization can be viewed as an inevitable function of capitalism or as a systematic attempt to undermine potential forms of empowerment. Either way, the result is still the same. People without a voice naturally must begin to develop a form of expression to speak for them. The minute that form of expression cultivates enough popularity to come under the radar of the mainstream, the massive corporate pile-on ensues. Cultures that lack the means to become established and self-sustaining are unable to defend themselves against the swarm of speculator jackals that hunger for the next fad to market and resell. Most of these subcultures were not intended for such a broad audience, and they are not equipped to explain their message to a mainstream society that doesn't want to listen and wouldn't understand anyway.

Subsequently, these subcultures make their peace with being misunderstood by accepting the proverbial bone that pop culture offers them essentially in exchange for their souls. It is not a fair deal. Speaking on behalf of countercultures in general and hip hop specifically, we shouldn't be forced to sell out simply because our form of expression is meaningful only to us. It happened to become popular to an audience that it was not even intended for. The irony is that we do want our subcultures to be economically viable and self-sustaining, but without losing the messages at the cores of their identities. We do want success, but on our own terms. We do not want to be ruthlessly exploited and have our culture re-packaged and resold while excluding the most important aspects.

The reason this process is so exploitative is because of the fact that the subculture itself does not receive a fair cut of the profits compared to the big corporations, and the fact that the subculture is stripped of any power that it once contained. Since the need to gain power and a voice was the central motivating factor in the creation of the subculture, it is understandable that we should be bitter when this power and message is gutted and the skin is sewn back together and sold for profit.

Within this context, it is a natural extension to see and understand the way in which our language and the tools we use to construct our realities are also taken over by the mainstream culture. A form of dollar destruction, pop culture pimping, and mass market mugging that is often overlooked is the way that the language of counterculture has been turned against itself. The language employed by the intellectually marginalized has become so cliché that the most important conversations sound tired and inane. Pointlessly overused to the point of near-extinction by pundits who misuse our language and misinterpret its significance, it is now practically impossible to discuss the state of the world in any meaningful way without sounding played-out and pretentious.

Thus, we can now add "globalization," "privatization," "commercialization," "institutionalized," "disenfranchised," "mainstream," "capitalist," "counterculture," and "revolutionary," to the list of words that have been systematically overused until they become essentially meaningless. They are sucked dry of all of the power and potency that they once contained. The words we use are absolutely essential to communicate and derive meaning from our dialogues. Without an appropriate and relevant language with which to describe the world, we are effectively left once again without a voice, just like "equality," "diversity," "social justice," "community," and "spirituality" have been reduced to meaningless catch-phrases over the last quarter-century, so too has our post-modern vocabulary been drained of substance and discarded leaving words that are just empty shells taking up space.

There is a McDonald's commercial in which urban youth are rapping and playing basketball in roller blades, kneepads and helmets. I know that this has nothing to do with hip-hop, but is simply an empty skin marketed to vaguely resemble a culture that McDonald's has no connection to. Nowadays when I hear discussions about globalization, I hear words that once contained meaning and relevance for a whole generation of disenfranchised people that are now simply another means of power for the very people that they were originally aimed against.

Teams deserve support

Ben Feder

Our football team needs your help. Better yet, all of UMass athletics needs your help. Over the years I've noticed a significant lack of interest on this campus when it comes to sporting events. Sure, for the first couple of games students are more than eager to root for the home team, but once they start to lose, the crowd turnout becomes dismal. Then what happens? The teams continue to lose and any wins seem meaningless.

Now, this campus does have some all-star teams. Softball, hockey, and men's lacrosse come to mind. Sometimes I feel that half the students don't even know where these teams play, let alone what their record is. Does anyone even know what conference we're in?

The truth is, the average student does not know why they should have pride in their sports teams, or what an actively interested student body can do for a university. Take the football team for example. These are a great bunch of guys who are currently trying to break out of a 2-4 slump. Out of those two wins, though, one was at home against Colgate, who bumped UMass out of the playoffs last year, with a 30-20 victory. UMass' performance was excellent. I've never seen the team play like they did and I've been to every single home game since the 2000 season. The stadium was completely filled. More eager fans even poured in after the first half. We made the football stadium rival that of any Division I-A school, and what did we receive in return for showing up: a pumped-up team that rose to the challenge, came out victorious, and tasted the sweetness of revenge. I was excited.

The next Saturday, however, the stadium was back to its usual half-enipty, indifferent self. Not only did the team lose, but they also lost their undefeated home record. That's right, for those of you who forgot, the football team went undefeated at home all last season. Why was this? Because once the team started winning, people started showing up to more games, and the team kept getting better.

More student and fan support is all it takes to get better teams. This would help not just the football team, it would help all of the UMass teams. Would you perform better if you had 100 people watching you, or 10? Wouldn't you want to try harder if you had a packed stadium instead of an apathetic audience?

We made the football stadium rival that of any Division I-A school. What did we get in return for showing up? The pumped up team rose to the challenge, came out victorious and tasted the sweetness of revenge. I was excited.

Want a better reason to show up to sporting events? As I said, the more fans at a game, the better a team will play, and the more they will win. The more they win, the better the school looks, and then better athletes will want to play for UMass. With more athletes, the team has a better opportunity to win championships. With championship wins, the school gets better facilities and more private donations from alumni and other outlets. Sure it's not as straightforward as this, but it is a step in the right direction.

Also, consider this. In December of 2003, the Athletic Department hired a company to assess the feasibility of moving the football program from Division I-AA to I-A. (For those unfamiliar, Division I-A includes schools like LSU and Ohio State.) Right now, the only thing stopping the football team from I-A is our stadium that cannot seat a I-A crowd. The report researched factors such as student, alumni, and state support for a I-A football program. They found that because of huge budgetary concerns affecting our university, and lack of student and alumni support, our school simply cannot support a I-A football team.

Check out it out on the web (http://www.umass.edu/umhome/athletics/football/report.pdf).

If we however became actively interested in our athletics, as I stated earlier, the teams will perform more like Division I teams play. In my opinion, this will reverse the state's view of UMass since many of our alumni work in government positions. With sports teams that give alumni something to be proud of, more private funding will flow through campus. It's a reciprocal relationship and it begins with us.

If you won't do it for me, at least do it for the marching band. We already have a Division I-A marching band, over 350 members strong, and frankly I think they're hungry to show what they've got to those Big Ten, Big East, and Pac-10 bands. They've outgrown their 17,000-seat stadium and have dreams of bigger and better things. I know for a fact they could massacre Texas A&M's band and they wouldn't even need help from the tubas. They also play a pretty mean "Crocodile Rock."

I for one get pretty annoyed when I flip through Sports Illustrated inserts and think that UMass could definitely get on its pages. So let's help the band, sports teams, and all UMass athletics on their way by showing up and cheering our souls out. Despite the cold and the fact that they might lose a couple times, the morale of the teams will be lifted and they will rally back with some weird, turnaround play that New England sports are so well known for.

Another Day for Northampton

Musician returns to the Pioneer Valley

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

Essentially, singer/songwriter Howie Day is a lot like your average 23-year-old. He loves music, he likes to have a good time and he spends most of his nights hanging out with college students.

"After high school, I decided to skip college, but wound up spending a lot of time touring college campuses," Day said in an interview for the bio section of his Web site. "Four years later, I'm releasing a new record instead of getting my degree," he joked. The new release he speaks of is the album "Stop All the World Now," released last October on the Epic label.

Including songs like "Collide" and "Perfect Time of Day," "Stop All the World Now," has also become a quiet success for the singer-songwriter. Still, influenced by what most young acoustic guitar performers are these days — love — Day has managed to create tunes infused with elegance and affection.

Like most artists, Day began his musical career playing the college circuit. He toured local bars and campuses, such as the University of Maine near his home in Bangor. Later, his manager Shawn Radley would discover Day at a show where he held the opening spot for Ziggy Marley.

In 2000, Day independently released his first album, "Australia." At the green age of 19, the emerging songwriter financed the CD in its entirety. Little did he know that it would sell 30,000 copies, and he probably never would have guessed that Epic Records would sign him — which they did in 2002 — boosting the sales of "Australia" to over 100,000 copies.

Day will bring his live performance skills to Northampton for a show at the Calvin Theatre on Sunday. While he is no virgin to the Calvin's stage, this is the first time that Day will be bringing a band with him on the road.

"I've been looking forward to taking a band on the road for such a long time," Day said. "I love playing solo, but I can only take the songs to a certain point. I think a lot of people are going to be surprised by how big some of the old songs sound with a band behind me."

The bluegrass trio Nickel Creek will be joining Day for his show at the Calvin. Nickel Creek, featuring the brother/sister duo of fiddle player Sara Watkins and guitarist Sean Watkins, as well as mandolin player Chris Thile, have created a genre that many fans have affectionately named "newgrass".

In 2002 the band released an album titled "This Side" produced by country legend Alison Krauss. The release debuted at number 18 on Billboard's Top Album Chart. It has also sold over 400,000 copies and earned a Grammy for Best Contemporary Folk Album.

Singer-songwriter David Berkeley will also be performing in support on Saturday.

The show starts at 7 p.m. and tickets are $25 for everyone.

Comic to feature first HIV-positive sidekick

By Anthony Breznican
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP)— Along with fighting alien menaces and criminal masterminds, the "Green Arrow" comic book will now feature a sidekick engaged in a more personal struggle — this one against HIV.

It's the first major comic book to deal with HIV, and a dose of hard-edged reality to the usually fanciful world of costumed crime fighters.

In the latest issue of "Green Arrow," set for publication Wednesday, a teenage runaway named Mia — who has been in the care of the title hero for two years — discovers that her time spent as a street-dweller and prostitute has resulted in her picking up the virus.

Writer Judd Winick, who oversees the "Green Arrow" story line, said this is a way to explore socially conscious themes while also giving the Mia character extra motivation to make a difference in the world.

"We've been hinting all along the way that she's interested in taking up the mantle, being a sidekick, getting out there in the streets and helping out," Winick told The Associated Press. "Green Arrow won't hear of it."

The news that she has HIV leads her to push Green Arrow even more. Fighting crime, Winick said, is what she wants to do with her life. "So he allows her to slap on a costume and become his sidekick, which has the silly name of Speedy," Winick said. "It's not as a death wish, but she can't fool around anymore. This isn't about an abbreviated life span. It is about life having focus," he added. Speedy was originally a boy sidekick, but the character is now grown up and goes by the more mature name of Arsenal.

Winick may be known to some from his stint on MTV's roommate reality-show, "The Real World" 1993, on which he appeared with Pedro Zamora, who died the next year after a public battle with AIDS.

That experience, along with other friends who have contracted the virus, made the Mia story line a personal one for the writer. He said he wanted to approach HIV from the point of view of other young people.

"Mia is coming to terms with it in the way most young people are. It isn't about death and dying. Young people, for good or for bad, are still pretty fearless. With drug combination therapy people are living a very long time," Winick told the AP. "She seems to be unafraid of death, she's mostly feeling like no one is ever going to love her. She's HIV-positive and who's going to want to be with her now?" Mia won't be lonely for long. As Speedy, she will later join the popular "Teen Titans" DC Comics series alongside Robin, Cyborg and Raven in the popular youth hero series.

Although some may perceive the HIV story line as a downer, Winick said it's important for comics to address real-world matters.

"Comics have a long history of telling lessons," he said. "They tell stories through metaphor, but sometimes I feel we don't need the metaphor. Why should it be that Mia contracts some alien virus?

Fashion on campuses show change from high school style

By Elizabeth Wellington
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Abercrombie & Fitch fashions are a lot like Gap's this fall: lots of denim, polos and soft cardigans.

But to the college-age shopper, Abercrombie is "so over;" Gap is what's up.

"Abercrombie lost it when they became a little 'too white' with their advertising. They lost and alienated a lot of people who didn't see themselves or their friends represented," explains David Morrison, founder and chief executive officer of TwentySomething Inc., a Radnor-based firm that analyzes the shopping habits of the 18-to-35 set.

Morrison helps the nation's top fashion, electronics and food brands market themselves so they stay on the minds of consumers in their teens and 20s.

It's six weeks into the fall 2004 semester, and young people are rewriting the "hot" brands list because of more reserved fashion trends and a still-weak economy. Dunkin' Donuts is creeping up on Starbucks. Mitsubishi is edging out Honda.

Fashion-wise, college kids are leaving behind the late-'90s low-riders and sliding into tweeds with ribbon-trimmed preppy style. Tommy Hilfiger, Polo and J. Crew are "riding high," Morrison says. LaCoste, with its brightly colored mini-polo shirts and tennis dresses, is hip, too.

The vintage craze has made Converse All Stars the tennis shoes of choice. Adidas are a cool second. Pumas, Morrison adds, are on the cusp of hotness, thanks to their old-school-rap connection. Nikes, namely Air Force Ones, and Reeboks are falling off.

"This market won't wear those as much, unless they're (ball) players," Morrison says.

College students would rather be caught dead than wearing shoes from Payless, but they want shoes from DSW Shoe Warehouse.

They love Target and Wal-Mart, but can do without Kmart.

Philosophy's cinnamon bun, blueberry pie, and orange sherbet-scented shampoos, conditioners and bath gels are the preferred shower-caddy fillers, pushing aside long-popular Bath & Body Works. (We can thank the nesting trend for that.) Also, Morrison says, Burt's Bees all-natural makeup is a must-have.

Revlon and Avon are beating out MAC and Bobbi Brown, because they are more affordable, yet college girls would rather spend big money on a dress they bought from a boutique. (Think Nicole Miller or Nanette Lepore.)

"They are super-expensive, and teens aren't convinced that these (makeup) brands are any better than what they can get at the drugstore," Morrison says. " ... but when they get dressed up, they are going really high end."

Today's young adults have gobs of disposable income, but they have attention deficits when it comes to brand loyalty. As with the Generation X-ers and baby boomers before them, cost and packaging are the No. 1 factors that drive spending habits.

These youngsters, however, are picky about how they receive sales pitches. They prefer to get them through their e-mail in-boxes, music videos, video games, or on Web sites. They have little time for casual conversation and magazines.

They are marketing-savvy and understand business, Morrison says, even if it's on a superficial level.

"They not only know what focus groups are, chances are they've been a part of one."

Morrison has followed college students' spending habits since his days at Haverford. Back then, he had an out-of-a-dorm-room business selling electronics — VCRs, radar detectors and CD players — with customers on 14 campuses.

He grew up with entrepreneurship and marketing: His father is a retired vice president of marketing for Lipton; his mother is an independent college guidance counselor.

Morrison started TwentySomething Inc. when he was 22. At the time, he thought major businesses were full of 50-year-old executives trying to understand people in their 20s.

If you ask Morrison, TwentySomething Inc. was one of the first consulting companies to niche-research the youth market — before Soul Kool and Teenage Research Unlimited.

His first projects included refining programs at the Entrepreneurial Center at the Wharton School of Business and helping Vibe Magazine fit into urban and suburban worlds. His company developed a strategy for Nokia cell phones to market color faceplates. (He's tight-lipped about other work he's done because of nondisclosure contracts.)

Morrison has five employees and keeps satellite offices in Mexico City, Sydney, Australia, and Seoul, South Korea, to pick the brains of teens across the globe.

He spends his days talking to his target market in the malls and setting up focus groups across the world. Right now, he says, he's working with more than 60 companies, more than half of which have made the Fortune 500.

Morrison's book, "Marketing to the Campus Crowd: Everything You Need to Know to Capture the $200 Billion College Market" (Dearborn Trade Publishing, $25), has sold 3,500 copies. That's a really good number, says Courtney Goethals, a spokeswoman for Dearborn Trade, because its market is so specific.

The book is required reading for the 20-plus directors at the National Association of College

Eve faces her big fear

Original Sin
Eve

My therapist simplified my problem in five obvious words: "You are just not ready." He was absolutely right. I am not ready to be in a relationship. That is, I am not prepared to invest my heart, my time or my energy, or even the possibility that one day one of us might get hurt.

How much longer can I run away from this natural reality? And why alter a full year of living the single life, am I still entirely unprepared?

As hard it is to admit to myself, I had been seeing someone seriously since August, and I confessed I needed a break last week. Why? I may be terrified. Or maybe I just prefer being single. I don't know.

We met one night at a bar I regularly go to in Boston. My summer fling happened to be spinning that night as the new guy approached me. I was uncomfortable until I asked him if he knew this DJ.

He smiled and said, "Of course! We grew up together. Our parents are old friends. You know him too?" I stopped mid-step and realized the severity of the situation. I was about to cause drama between best buddies, and from that moment on, there was nothing I could do about it.

Throughout the next few weeks he pursued, and I avoided him at all costs. Until one evening, when I decided to give him a chance over coffee. Until I found out he goes to this school. Until I realized he is one of the most wonderful guys I had met in a long time.

So I gave into his charm, and I had no choice but to tell him about my past relationship with his friend.

He didn't take the information very well, but I needed to be honest. They both spoke, they both argued and then they both fought, but they didn't necessarily fight over me. I believe it was the breach of trust between the two that was disheartening for all of us.

Yet even with this new knowledge of my past connection with his friend, he remained committed to the idea of me. Our relationship reminded me of an over-dramatic romantic comedy pushed on fast forward. He saw me, he won me over, he lost me, and maybe one day he will have me again. We are just not at that part, not just yet.

As we moved further into the serious stage, he decided to pose the fated question.

"Will you be my..."

"Hey, the funniest thing happened today..."

He looked frustrated, but listened to my story anyway. But in my head, the beauty of our simple romance was ruined. From that very moment on, I became an anxious mess. I suddenly felt like a middle-aged man who had been married too long, and I was looking for something exciting. I fantasized about my co-worker. I gave my lab partner the eyes, and I even thought about giving the delivery boy my number.

My behavior said it all. Committing to one guy at this time is impossible, but how much longer can I continue like this? He was everything I had hoped for while I was single, and when he arrived I wished him away. I am hoping this wish may benefit the both of us in time.

Sometimes I wonder if getting what I want might turn me off. Maybe he made it too easy, or he was too perfect, or maybe it was too good to be true.

Is it possible that I fear that somewhere along the line I might see a flaw? That the dream I had of the perfect guy is unreal? Why can't I believe something so ridiculous? This dream gets me out of bed in the morning; it keeps me motivated when I go out at night. Perhaps some dreams are not ever to be fulfilled. On the other hand, I might simply not be ready.

And if that is the case, my therapist should get a raise.

Walken's next 'Bend'

By Glenn Lovell
San Jose Mercury News

SAN FRANCISCO — Christopher Walken works a lot. As best he can figure, he has made "about a hundred movies" since appearing in "Annie Hall" and "The Deer Hunter" in the late '70s. That's an astounding number, given that the average Hollywood star makes one film, possibly two, every 18 months or so.

"Work? It's my favorite thing to do, and I don't really have anything else that I do," says Walken, 61, during a stopover in San Francisco to talk up "Around the Bend," an oddball reunion picture in which, for the first time, he plays a grandfather — with an unsavory past, of course.

"I don't have kids, I don't have hobbies," continues the actor, who commutes between movie sets and homes in New York and Connecticut. "And I don't play golf. A lot of actors play golf. It's amazing how many actors play golf."

Here, Walken's voice trails off, as it does frequently during our conversation. Is this an affectation, that studied insouciance that has caused him to be typed as dangerous crazies ("At Close Range," "True Romance") and comic crazies ("Mouse Hunt," "The Stepford Wives")? Or is it something more, a hint of wistfulness for the road not taken?

Before you start feeling sorry for the guy, consider this: He's having a blast. He loves the monetary rewards and adoration that come with being Hollywood's most in-demand character actor. This afternoon he shares a story about an airport baggage handler who turned out to be a huge fan.

Of Walken's psychologically damaged Vietnam vet in "The Deer Hunter," which brought the supporting-actor Oscar in 1978? Or maybe of his broken father in "Catch Me If You Can," which brought another Oscar nomination in 2002?

Walken smiles that slow, mischievous smile. (Fans of The Continental, his serial seducer on "Saturday Night Live," will know it only too well.)

"No, no — this guy was shouting, 'Frank White! Frank White!'" Walken recalls. "That's the character I played in 'King of New York.' They don't talk about 'Deer Hunter'; they talk about this little crime movie, and it was really off-the-cuff stuff where we literally said, 'What are you going to say next? All right, then I'll say this.' That usually doesn't work, but we had Laurence Fishburne, Wesley Snipes and David Caruso, and it was good."

Other memorably quirky Walken performances fuel "Pulp Fiction," "At Close Range," "Batman Returns," "The Dead Zone" and, of course, "True Romance," where his sadistic crime boss shares the screen with another great scene-stealer, Dennis Hopper. The pair went to dinner after work. Hopper: "We did a good scene today." Walken: "Yes, I know."

Walken felt the same way after the kitchen face-off in "At Close Range," where Sean Penn as the son puts a gun to his father's head. Just before shooting the scene, Penn said, "Excuse me for

Hollywood: not just for acting anymore

By Douglas J. Rowe
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — "If you want to send a message," movie mogul Samuel Goldwyn once said, "call Western Union." Translation: The job of entertainers is entertainment. Leave politics to the politicians. Controversy just alienates the audience.

Goldwyn is dead 50 years, and in 2004, his maxim has been buried with him. This year more than ever, artists are using their art to make a difference in the electoral process.

"Fahrenheit 9/11" has smashed the box-office record for documentaries. In arenas around the country, music stars are performing with the hope they'll get people to vote — the way they want them to. Even punk rockers have gotten back into the act, while painters and sculptors have been infused with an election-year muse.

Some of the politicization of entertainment is neutral. "America (The Book): A Citizen's Guide to Democracy Inaction" by the writers of "The Daily Show" tops the best-seller list, while Jon Stewart's Comedy Central program mocks both candidates equally.

Many in the entertainment industry are sending a partisan message, and they're not relying on Western Union. Lopsidedly, their candidate is John Kerry over President Bush. It remains an open question whether they will sway any voters.

"It is more likely that someone who hears a celebrity speak out for a specific candidate will form a new opinion about that celebrity as opposed to forming a new opinion about the candidate," maintains Robert Thompson, a professor of media and culture and director of the Center for the Study of Popular Television at Syracuse University. "Political opinion tends to run deep, and one celebrity is unlikely to change that in any but the most fickle and truly undecided."

Kevin M. Scott of Elizabethtown (Pa.) College also doubts Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9/11" or Bruce Springsteen's "Vote for Change" tour will change any minds. But he suspects it "might get a Kerry supporter to become more involved, volunteer time, and this might lead to more voters."

And that winds up being a de facto rebuttal to the criticism it's all just "preaching to the choir," says Kathy M. Newman, associate professor of English at Carnegie Mellon University.

"As a wise mentor once pointed out to me, most preaching is to the choir," she says. "In other words, like the preaching of a favorite pastor, political culture energizes the base, cleanses the soul, reinvigorates the congregation, allows time for reflection and contemplation, and provides a gathering place."

Terry Paulson, a psychologist and author of "The Dinner: The Political Conversation Your Mother Told You Never to Have," sees the rash of movies, concerts, book, comedy tours and TV shows as "a reflection of suppressed anger

'The Attorney' takes on ID theft

Ask the Attorney
Michele L. Leaf

Q: I just got a letter that I won the Spanish Lottery and that the winnings will be deposited into my bank account. The letter was sent by a Spanish attorney. It looks official and it sounds legitimate. All I have to do is provide my bank account information so that the money can be deposited directly into my account. The attorney also said I will need to fax a copy of my passport information to verify that I am the same person who won. I never bought a Spanish lottery ticket so I don't want to get in trouble for now pretending that I did, but I can certainly use the money.

A. If you provide the information to the attorney you will most certainly get in trouble, but not for "pretending" that you bought a lottery ticket. In fact, buying foreign lottery tickets in the U.S. is illegal, but this is not the issue here. The writer of the letter has no intention of depositing any money into your bank account. Instead, they are seeking to gain access to identifying information and your bank account to perpetuate further fraud. They are hoping that you will not report the fraud because you would then have to "admit" your participation in the foreign lottery. This is a common fraud that is often promoted through the Internet, as well as by mail. It is very important that you keep your credit card and bank account numbers to yourself. Scam artists often ask for this information with the intention of use it fraudulently.

Identity theft is one of the fastest growing problems in the United States. It occurs when someone makes use of your personal information, to fraudulently establish credit card accounts, purchase goods and services or commit crimes in your name. It is extremely important that you take steps to safeguard your identity and that you never give out personal information, including your Social Security, driver's license number, passport number, credit card numbers, or bank account information to anyone who makes an unsolicited request.

Although it can be embarrassing to admit that you have been a victim of a scam, it is important that you take action as soon as possible. Report the incident quickly so that law enforcement agencies can try to shut the fraudulent operations down. You should file a report with your local police department to establish a record of the crime and file reports with national organizations and government agencies. There is a centralized Internet fraud complaint center under the jurisdiction of the FBI, which monitors Internet scams. In addition, victims should immediately alert credit bureaus as well as banks and credit card companies where they maintain accounts.

one second," and left the room. "He knew how scared I am of guns, and he made me think he had returned with a loaded gun. You can see the fear in my face."

It ranks as one of the most intense father-son confrontations ever shot.

Adds Walken now: "That was a very generous thing for Sean to do. Actors help each other like that. When I saw the scene, I knew we had nailed it. That's a great feeling — exhilarating."

But to have the kind of career Walken has had the went from character roles to leads in "Dead Zone" and "Dogs of War," then back to character parts), you have to love what you do.

"I do enjoy my work — I tend to be someone who enjoys himself," he says. "The fact is, when you get to be my age and you've been around as long as I have, if people don't recognize you, come up and say hello, you start to worry."

Then, too, he worries about working too much, not being selective enough in his roles.

"There's something to be said for being selective. There are actors who believe in that: They wait for the material and the director ... They want all the elements to be as copasetic as possible. But I have never been that way."

Walken sees potential where others see problems. Which means you work more, but you're also in a higher percentage of dogs. tWalken's filmography includes "Joe Dirt" and "Gigli.")

"I look for good possibilities in movies. I don't look for perfection. And a lot of movies I do get fixed as they go along."

Walken attributes his work ethic to his father, who was a baker in Queens, N.Y. They were close, unlike two generations of fathers and sons in "Around the Bend," which finds Michael Caine playing Walken's dad.

"I'm probably the way I am because of my father," the actor says. "He went to his bakery seven days a week. He loved baking: he couldn't get enough of it."

Despite an ornery, anti-social streak, Walken's character in the new film turns out to be a relatively nice guy. Ditto his characters in "Man on Fire" and "Catch Me If You Can." Is this the dawning of a kinder, gentler Walken?

"Could be," he replies. "But it also has something to do with age. I'm now at the place where I'm starting to play fathers and uncles — and, in this case, a grandfather."

Worse, a grandfather who's dying of kidney failure. Hence, the gray-green cast to his skin.

"I saw the movie and I thought, 'Geez, you look terrible.'"

He pauses, beams, then concedes, "But it's a big juicy part. It's a leading part. And I don't do that a lot."

Actor Christopher Walken, pictured in 2001, will star in the new movie "Around the Bend."

Celebs get political

over the contested election of George W. Bush in 2000 that has finally been free to surface."

The "selected not elected' mantra that was so strong early was silenced by the need to rally in support of a leader facing the 9/11 tragedy and a war against terrorism," Paulson says. "But the questionable war on Iraq and the lack of weapons of mass destruction has unleashed that early anger with a passion that spills over into popular movies and a public ready to see them."

So entertainers can help frame and propel election year discourse.

Jim Farrelly, director of film studies at the University of Dayton and pop culture expert, credits Moore "with teaching the media how to cover a president and his politics with both insight and panache."

"His early assault on President Bush ... has clearly shown that a popular culture icon is better equipped to capture and expose the mendacious world of politics to viewers in ways that no seasoned anchorperson or prize-winning, live and on-the-scene journalist is even willing to attempt."

Moore and his fellow filmmakers — with such movies as "Silver City," "Going Upriver: The Long War of John Kerry" and "Bush's Brain" — have their work complemented by the likes of "The Daily Show." Farrelly notes.

"Add to the mix the antics of Letternan, Leno," he says, "and you've got a TV version of 'Fahrenheit 9/11' playing in our living room five nights a week." Certainly "celebrity politics" is not a new phenomenon in American history. During World War II Hollywood stars sold bonds, entertained the troops, even enlisted. In the 1960 presidential election, Frank Sinatra famously supported John F. Kennedy.

In the past, celebs typically would simply speak out on their pet topics. At the 1973 Academy Awards, Marlon Brando refused to accept his best actor Oscar for "The Godfather" to protest treatment of American Indians, and Vanessa Redgrave collected her statuette for 1977's "Julia" while railing against "Zionist hoodlums" challenging her pro-Palestinian sympathies.

In the late 1960s and throughout the '70s and '80s, many of the world's biggest music stars organized concerts that attacked the Vietnam War, nuclear weapons, world hunger, environmental destruction and corporate greed.

For a long time, people in the entertainment industry bent over backward to be apolitical, too.

The old Hollywood studio bosses, including Goldwyn, were careful not to engage in politics except to frame a "perfect" America through their movies, points out Allan Saxe, a University of Texas (at Arlington) associate professor of political science. "They went out of their way mostly not to alienate anyone," he says. "They understood the importance of Hollywood and the effects it could have."

Hartwick College political science professor Andrew Seligsohn in Oneonta, N.Y., sees one of the most important developments during the 2004 presidential election as the willingness of entertainers to support specific candidates, rather than issues. In the past, he says, they "sought to avoid the impression that they are shilling for someone."

Syracuse's Thompson sees that change, too.

"One could argue, for example, that a great percentage of the rock 'n' roll music industry during the late '60s and early '70s was all about politics," Thompson says. "It was the soundtrack of the counterculture during the Vietnam era. The difference here, of course, was that most of the counterculture was supporting neither candidate in, say, 1968."

"The Daily Show" anchor Jon Stewart is one of many public figures who has taken an active role in politics for this year's election.

Stores, an organization that tracks the success of college bookstores.

"Those of us who've gone to college, we tend to base our paradigm of what college students want today ... on what we wanted as students," says Marianne Wascak, vice president of marketing at the association.

"But David does a good job at pointing out that students these days are different. They don't trust corporations like we used to. Just because you give a college student something for free doesn't mean they are going to buy it."

On a recent afternoon, Morrison stands in front of the University of Pennsylvania's Barnes & Noble campus bookstore. At 37, he has strawberry-blond hair that's graying at the temples, but his face is line-free.

He talks at a rapid clip, totally excited about his recent trip to New Orleans, where he launched a campaign to hip up a fast-food chain. Ask him the specifics, and he gets cagey. An experienced businessman, he refuses to divulge key details.

In the store, current best-sellers are on the bottom floor, near the magazines, and in the back is every laptop accessory imaginable, from label makers to cameras.

Young consumers are making buying decisions based on how healthy they perceive a product to be, how well it fits into their lifestyle, and how diverse the advertisements are, he says. Right now, this age group is on a health kick.

Williams hires agent

it would take three to six weeks for Bonds to rehabilitate the knee and he should be able to resume working out in November.

CLEVELAND (AP) — The Cleveland Indians declined to pick up Omar Vizquel's $5 million contract option for next season, making him eligible to become a free agent when the World Series ends.

The 37-year-old shortstop has said he wants to return for a 12th season in Cleveland, but the Indians are targeting a starting pitcher.

The Indians will pay Vizquel's $1 million buyout and could sign him to a new deal or enter salary arbitration with him by Dec. 7.

COLLEGE FOOTBALL

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. (AP) — Wide receiver Mike Williams, turned down in his attempt to return to play at Southern California after the courts kept him out of the NFL draft, has hired an agent — again.

Williams, expected to be a first-round draft pick next April, will be represented by Tony Fleming and Mitch Frankel of Impact Sports Management.

Williams caught 95 passes for 1,314 yards and a school-record 16 touchdowns as a sophomore last season to help the Trojans (12-1) win the national championship. He finished eighth in the Heisman Trophy balloting.

TENNIS

MOSCOW (AP) — Venus Williams defeated Russian qualifier Alina Jidkova 6-4, 6-4 in the opening round of the Kremlin Cup in her first match since losing in the fourth round at last month's U.S. Open.

Williams, beaten by Lindsay Davenport at the U.S. Open, served five aces and doubled-faulted six times against the 27-year-old Russian.

Elena Dementieva was one of four Russian players ranked in the top 20 who advanced. Runner-up in the French and U.S. open, the fifth-seeded Dementieva beat Patty Schnyder 6-2, 6-3; sixth-seeded Vera Zvonareva defeated Nathalie Dechy of France 6-0, 6-2; eighth-seeded Nadia Petrova topped Paola Suares of Argentina 7-5, 6-4; and unseeded Elena Bovina defeated Daniela Hantuchova of Slovakia 6-2, 6-3.

VIENNA, Austria (AP) — Olympic champion Nicolas Massu defeated Karol Kucera 6-4, 6-7 (5), 6-4 at the CA Trophy tournament.

In the final set, the second-seeded Massu broke Kucera's serve at 2-all and then closed out the match.

Massu won the Olympic gold medal in singles and doubles at the Athens Games. The Chilean advanced to a match against South African qualifier Rik de Voest.

Pedro skips introductions again

By Mike Fitzpatrick
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — When the teams were introduced before Game 1, Boston pitcher Pedro Martinez came out of the dugout wearing a gray sweat shirt and lined up with his teammates along the third-base line.

Martinez skipped his interview room session with reporters earlier in the day. He did the same thing in Anaheim last week — and didn't come onto the field for introductions.

ALUMNI GAME

Alex Rodriguez isn't surprised Doug Mientkiewicz became a Gold Glove first baseman.

"Good hands," A-Rod said of his former teammate at the Westminster Christian Prep School in Miami.

Of course, that was Rodriguez the quarterback, talking about Mientkiewicz, the tight end, on the high school football team. Rodriguez and Mientkiewicz played together on the 1991 squad that went 9-1, but Rodriguez gave up football to concentrate on baseball after the '92 season, the year Mientkiewicz graduated.

"He could've played in the NFL," Mientkiewicz said.

Instead, Rodriguez became one of the best all-around players in baseball, leading the New York Yankees into the AL championship series against Mientkiewicz' Red Sox on Tuesday night.

Even though they're on opposite sides of a bitter rivalry, both were happy to point out that at least one Westminster Warrior will be in the World Series.

KEEPING THE PEACE

Yankees manager Joe Torre isn't happy with the way some television stations have promoted the AL championship series, replaying lights between New York and the Boston Red Sox.

"I don't like it," he said Tuesday before the opener. "You're inciting the fans in my mind."

He also doesn't like some of the computer baseball games.

"You have guys sliding into second base and punching the second baseman when he gets up," Torre said.

"I think that's disgraceful that we have licensing things going on in Major League Baseball that promote the violence."

WAITING GAME

Yankees manager Joe Torre said Orlando Hernandez felt fine Tuesday, a day after he threw about 60 pitches in a bullpen session.

Torre won't decide until Thursday whether El Duque, who hasn't pitched since Oct. 1 because of a tired shoulder, or Javier Vazquez will start Game 4 on Saturday at Fenway Park.

"The good news is he feels good," Torre said. "We may have an extra pitcher that we didn't have last time around."

STEPPING IN

Kenny Lofton was the Yankees' designated hitter Tuesday night in Game 1 instead of Ruben Sierra because Lofton entered 7-for-23 (.304) against Boston ace Curt Schilling.

"Lofton has some numbers against Schilling," New York manager Joe Torre said. "You really have to do the little things against both he and Pedro (Martinez) to try to get things done."

The speedy Lofton batted ninth.

Sierra hit a tying, three-run homer in the eighth inning last Saturday to spark New York's clinching victory in Game 4 against Minnesota. He's 2-for-7 lifetime against Schilling.

Torre didn't add Jason Giambi to the active roster for this series, staying with the same 25 players he had in the first round.

The Red Sox replaced third baseman Kevin Youkilis with reliever Ramiro Mendoza, who used to pitch for the Yankees.

ANOTHER CHANCE

The New York Yankees gave new Mets general manager Omar Minaya permission to interview Willie Randolph for their manager's job.

Randolph, the Yankees' bench coach, said Tuesday that he had not yet spoken with Minaya about setting up the interview.

"They've had some tough times," said Randolph, who played second base for the Yankees from 1976-88 and finished his career with the Mets in 1992.

Henry hopes Sox can duplicate success of Kraft's Patriots

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — The owners stood side by side in front of the dugout — John Henry of the Boston Red Sox and Robert Kraft of the New England Patriots.

The Red Sox hope to win the World Series for the first time in 86 seasons. The Patriots have won two of the last three Super Bowls and set an NFL record last Sunday with their 19th straight win, including playoffs.

"Any team in sports would like to emulate them," Henry said of the Patriots before Tuesday night's first game of the American League Championship Series against the New York Yankees.

The Red Sox would have to take some serious steps to do that. Johnny Damon would have to cut his flowing black locks, Pedro Martinez would have to clip his curls and Bronson Arroyo would have to ditch the cornrows.

Patriots coach Bill Belichick probably wouldn't stand for that on his clean-cut club, would he?

"I don't know," Henry said. "You'd have to ask him."

Hairstyles aside, there are plenty of similarities between the clubs — both have a strong camaraderie and an unflappable quality. That could help the Red Sox knock off the Yankees and reach the World Series for the first time since 1986.

"It's very exciting what's happening here," said Kraft, a graduate of nearby Columbia University who nevertheless said Tuesday's trip to Yankee Stadium was his first. "These guys are very special. They find a way to win."

Of Boston's 98 wins, they came back in 47 of them. Then, in the clinching third game of the AL division series, they won 8-6 on David Ortiz's two-run homer in the 10th inning after Anaheim tied the game at 6 with five runs in the seventh.

One fan wearing a Yankee shirt made a clear distinction between the Red Sox and Patriots.

"Hey, Kraft," he yelled. "Keep your winning streak with the Patriots, not with the Red Sox."

But Boston's braintrust thinks it has a team that won't wilt under the pressure of playing its longtime rivals with a chance to erase several generations of post-season futility.

Curt Schilling cool throughout the 2001 World Series when he was with Arizona. He went 1-0 with a 1.69 ERA and started the seventh game when the Diamondbacks beat the Yankees for the championship.

"He's totally unflappable and can eliminate the circus-like atmosphere around him," Boston general manager Theo Epstein said. "He focuses on the catcher's mitt. He sets a great example for his teammates."

Epstein learned what a wily, calculating veteran Schilling was when he visited the pitcher's Arizona home the day before last Thanksgiving to try and convince him to accept a trade to the Red Sox.

The next day, after they reached a contract agreement, Epstein had to put it in writing.

"It wasn't until I went into his home office and started typing up the contract that I saw 'Negotiating for Dummies,'" in the room, Epstein said. "I wish I'd known that before."

Red Sox president Larry Lucchino was president with San Diego when the Padres were swept in the 1998 World Series by the Yankees.

"Our guys were struck by the romance and history of Yankee Stadium," Lucchino said.

Cryonics lab ordered to turn over records

MESA, Ariz. (AP) — The Scottsdale cryonics firm holding the remains of baseball legend Ted Williams has been ordered to make public court records it had hoped to keep sealed.

Alcor Life Extension Foundation has never publicly acknowledged keeping Williams' remains, but the facility is widely known to be the one where Williams' body was sent.

Williams' nephews, John and Samuel Williams, sued Alcor to force the organization to show whether it obtained legal permission to store the body. Alcor had sought to keep the documents sealed.

But Maricopa County Superior Court Judge Thomas Dunevant III ruled against Alcor, saying it's already "public knowledge" Williams' body is stored at the facility.

"The essential content of the documents, including the identities of the clients, is already known," the judge wrote in a three-page ruling issued Oct. 7. "The 'right' of confidentiality is at this point a pure fiction."

A timeline for the disclosure of the documents has not been set, said the nephews' attorney John Heer.

Legal permission to store the remains is required under the Arizona Anatomical Gift Act. A former Alcor manager has claimed the company didn't have proper authorization to freeze Williams' remains.

The nephews are among family and friends of Ted Williams who have sought to have the remains of the famed Boston Red Sox slugger cremated.

Alcor stores human bodies and severed heads in vats of liquid nitrogen in the hope that someday science will be able to bring them back to life.

Dolphins got physical with Pats' Brady

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — The Miami Dolphins couldn't put a blemish on Tom Brady's winning streak so they put one on his face.

The New England Patriots' cover boy quarterback had a sore right shoulder and four stitches on his ever-so-cutely dimpled chin after he was hit in the mouth during Sunday's 24-10 victory over the Dolphins. His mouth was still sore on Wednesday, when he strained a little to speak to reporters.

"It's fine. I'll be ready to go," said Brady, who landed on the injury report as probable for Sunday's game against the Seattle Seahawks. "You just get sore from the bumps and bruises. You get landed on, but you just have to get up and get treatment. It does feel better today."

The stitches will come out eventually, leaving behind a scar that will no doubt make Brady appear more rugged to the women who have flocked after him ever since he went from a fourth-stringer to Super Bowl MVP during the 2001 season. He bagged that honor again last year.

But the bigger problem facing Brady this week is the scar on his record because of his performance against Miami. Without two of his top four wide receivers, Brady played conservatively and not very effectively, completing 7-of-19 passing for 76 yards, two touchdowns and an interception — the fewest completions and fewest yards he's had in 56 career starts.

"Sometimes it doesn't always go the way that you planned it, but that is life and that is being a quarterback," he said. "You just believe in what you are doing and try to keep going back out there and keep trying to get the job done and hopefully win some games."

Brady has done plenty of that, posting a 38-12 record as a starter in his career — running off an NFL record 19 consecutive wins, including last year's Super Bowl and four straight to start this season. Even last week, when his stats suffered, Brady was able to manage the game well enough to win against a Miami team that never mounted a serious threat.

"I don't think you can count on that," Seahawks coach Mike Holmgren told reporters. "If you guys don't think he played up to his potential, that makes me nervous because I don't think he's going to do that too often."

Since taking over when starter Drew Bledsoe was injured in 2001, Brady has become a staple of the gossip columns. He has dated a supermodel, hung out at the Playboy Mansion and been a guest of first lady Laura Bush at the State of the Union. He even had an audience with Pope John Paul II in the Vatican.

Oh, and he's won two NFL titles and two Super Bowl MVPs.

He has graced the cover of his share of sports magazines, as well as crossover publications like TV Guide. Next month's Men's Journal has him on the cover surrounded by snow-capped mountains, tossing a football in the air, with a feature on "The 50 best jobs in America" inside.

"Come wake up on Monday morning and tell me if that is the job you want," said Brady, who is also on the cover of Sports Illustrated's Oct. 18 issue — his second Sports Illustrated cover this season. "That is pretty neat actually. You can see why a lot of people would want to play quarterback. It is a fun position. Even with stitches and bumps and bruises and everything that goes along with it."

Schilling to need ankle surgery

NEW YORK (AP) — Curt Schilling needs surgery on his injured right ankle, but the Red Sox hope he will still be able to pitch Game 5 of the AL championship series Sunday.

Schilling lasted just three innings and 58 pitches in Boston's 10-7 loss to the New York Yankees in Tuesday night's opener, allowing six runs, his poorest playoff performance since 1993.

The Red Sox said the sheath that covers a tendon in Schilling's ankle is torn.

"The tendon is snapping over the bone," Red Sox physician Dr. Bill Morgan said Wednesday.

Schilling will undergo surgery after the postseason and will need about three months to recover. If the injury occurred during the season, Morgan said Schilling would have been on the disabled list.

Schilling pitched with a brace Tuesday and had a shot of painkiller in the ankle. Still, he had trouble pushing off the rubber with his right leg.

The Red Sox hope a better brace will help, but if not, Schilling's season will be over. π

Minutemen look to claw UNH

169.9. Additionally, he's completed almost 70 percent of his passes for 1346 yards and 16 touchdowns, while being intercepted just twice and averaging over 300 yards through the air per game.

However you add it up, defending Santos will certainly be a tall order for UMass.

"I'm not sure [if UMass matches up well with UNH]. I just don't know that answer," Brown said. "It all depends on when we get in the game and see how the matchups go, and then evaluate it from there.

"Santos has a lot of great receivers. I think Ball is a top-rate receiver in this league, and he's going to try and make things happen. It's up to us to make plays and keep that from happening."

On the other side of the coin, UMass enters the game with a quarterback situation that is anything but settled. After starting the season on fire in leading the Minutemen to two consecutive wins, junior Tim Day has struggled mightily in his team's four consecutive losses, scoring an anemic offense to just 35 points in the four games.

What has been most disheartening for UMass fans, however, has been the fact that despite his team's stellar play on defense that has presented the offense with numerous opportunities to win games, Day has not only been unable to capitalize, but has hardly come close at times.

Heading into this weekend, Brown will stick with Day under center. However the seed has been planted in his mind to consider lifting the redshirt from freshman quarterback Liam Coen in hopes of possibly getting the La Salle (R.I.) Academy product some game experience.

"We're evaluating [the quarterback position], and we're going to create competition there," Brown said. "We're going to do whatever we can to win. We're going to look at tape and analyze what we think we need to, and take it from there."

Despite Day's troubles on offense, Saturday's match up will undoubtedly come down to play on defense — an area where UMass is significantly banged up after the loss to IMU in which numerous key players went down within the unit.

Out this weekend are starting defensive tackle Jason Leonard (separated shoulder) and outside linebacker Charles Walker (knee), who is the team's leading tackler. Brown has said that Brad Anderson will slide over to fill Walker's spot, while L.A. Love will move into the starting lineup in Anderson's usual position.

Also questionable are starting cornerback R.J. Cobbs (sprained neck and sore ribs), reserve defensive back Julius Walker and defensive lineman Andrew Blumenthal.

Santos rises from unknown to lead No. 7 New Hampshire and he has recently been named one of the 16 candidates for the Walter Payton Award which is given out to the top offensive performer when the Division I-AA season concludes.

These are some solid accolades for someone who hadn't played in a football game since Thanksgiving Day 2002 as a senior at Bellingham High School, especially with the bizarre circumstances that forced Santos into the starting role.

In fact, Granieri saw his first game action in similar circumstances back in 2001.

Ryan Day, who is UMass quarterback Tim Day's older brother, was injured in the first half in a game against the Minutemen.

Grantieri stepped in and completed a Hail Mary at the end of the first half on his way to leading UNH to a comeback victory over UMass.

Ryan Day was able to recover to get his job back before the season ended, something that still remains to be seen with Granieri this year because McDonnell doesn't think it would be fair for his quarterback to lose his job due to an injury.

With Granieri's record of 8-15 as a starter, the decision shouldn't be that difficult.

Junior tailback Steve Baylark looks for yardage during the Minutemen's 21-7 loss to Delaware.

UMass in for a Cat fight

Struggling Minutemen look to right ship against UNH

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Forget four straight losses, and never mind the fact that the chance for an Atlantic 10 championship and a Division I-AA playoff birth has gone by the wayside. Push the nightmares of a month's worth of atrocious offensive performances away, and don't consider the lack of size on defense that has been exploited to an unacceptable degree in recent games.

For the Massachusetts football team, none of these various aspects that have contributed to one of the worst stretches in recent memory should be allowed to play a factor this weekend. When UMass travels to Cowell Stadium in Durham, N.H. on Saturday to face No. 7 New Hampshire at 12 p.m., there's only one thing that each of the Minutemen can do: to have a chance to finally end their troublesome skid. Just play football.

"We know that our chances to do what we wanted to do this season aren't there anymore, and I just want the guys to go out and play," UMass coach Don Brown said. "I told the guys to get away Monday and just not worry about football, and when we get back we'll be ready to play. Play the way we're capable of playing, go out, let it rip, have fun and just fly around. That's what it's all about, and it's why you do all the practicing and the weightlifting, to go out and play.

"The bottom line is that it's still the game that we all love, and that's enough to play for right there."

Considering the season that the upstart Wildcats are having, Brown's team must come to play if it has hopes of upsetting what has evolved into an offensive juggernaut. After raising eyebrows with an impressive win at the home of defending National Champion Delaware on opening night, redshirt freshman quarterback Ricky Santos, a native of Bellingham, has continued to put up flashy numbers.

Since stepping in for starter Mike Granieri, who injured his knee against Delaware and is out for the season, Santos has led UNH to four wins in five games, including a 35-24 victory over Division I-A Rutgers and a combined 96 points in his teams' last two wins over Dartmouth and Villanova.

"He's done a tremendous job up there," Brown said of Santos. "He's got a strong arm and a lot of confidence, and he moves around well in and out of the pocket.

"It's tough to come in as a freshman like he has, but he has adapted well to what they're trying to do, and he's played quality football."

Numbers-wise, what Santos has been able to do in his first year as a starter has been impressive. He currently leads the Atlantic 10 in total offense at over 327 yards per game, and is second to Northeastern's Shawn Brady in passing efficiency at a whopping

Freshman quarterback leads Wildcats in surprising season

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

After suffering through six losing seasons in the last seven years and having an overall stagnant program, the New Hampshire football team has suddenly found a diamond in the rough that has resuscitated a broken team.

Twenty plays into the Wildcats' season opener against defending national champion Delaware, quarterback Mike Granieri tore the ACL in his left knee and was sidelined indefinitely.

Backup Hassan Noble wasn't available to play in that game due to a high ankle sprain he suffered in a preseason scrimmage, and Matt Skoby, who was the planned third-string quarterback heading into the season, bailed on the team to play baseball for Mississippi State.

All of a sudden, coach Sean McDonnell was hollering at redshirt freshman quarterback Ricky Santos to grab his helmet and step in for Granieri for his first collegiate action in front of a packed house full of 22,000 Delaware fans.

In what should have been a tough situation for someone this young, Santos kept his cool, completed his first five passes and went 10-11 overall for 146 yards while not committing a single turnover. With UNH trailing 21-17 in the fourth quarter, Santos hooked up with wide receiver David Ball for a 44-yard touchdown pass which turned out to be the game-winning score.

The Wildcats have a 4-1 record so far this year, and their freshman phenom is still taking snaps under center while Granieri watches on the sideline wondering if he will ever get his job back.

It will be tough for McDonnell to give the ball back to Granieri since no New Hampshire football team has started 4-1 since 2000, and if the Wildcats beat Massachusetts on Saturday, it will mark the first time that UNH has started 5-1 since the school's last NCAA tournament team of 1994.

"He is throwing the ball with a lot of confidence," UMass coach Don Brown said. "(UNH) does an awful lot of things by set, and he is in a pretty good comfort zone. I'm not sure you're going to get him out of rhythm at all."

UMass will have a tall task in trying to shut down Santos, a Bellingham native, as he has put up stellar numbers through his first five career games. Santos has completed 122-177 passes (68.9 percent) for 1546 yards since taking over the starting job.

Even more remarkable, he has thrown for 16 touchdowns and only two interceptions while trying to learn a different, and faster, game. He is ranked fourth in Division I-AA in total offensive yards per game with 327.6 yards, and his passing efficiency rating of 169.9 is also fourth best in the country.

Santos has completed an average of 24.4 passes per game, which is good enough for seventh in the nation among signal callers.

"He is very confident in the way he throws the ball," Brown said. "He is a good quarterback. He's as good as there is right now."

While everyone around Division I-AA football had begun to hear the whispers of what Santos had been doing, he may have let all of those people know that he was the real deal during his record setting performance on Oct. 2 during New Hampshire's 51-40 win at Villanova.

Santos set school records for passes (55), completions (38), passing yards (538) and passing touchdowns (6) against a Villanova defense that is considered to be one of the toughest in the country. The 538 passing yards were also an Atlantic 10 freshman record.

For his performance, he was named the College Sports Television Offensive Player of the Week, just one of numerous awards and accolades that Santos has won over the past month-and-a-half.

He has been named the Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week twice, the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week three times, The Sports Network Co-Offensive Player of the Week Charge!

Defenders spring from goaltender Christine Tocco's net during a Massachusetts field hockey game earlier this season. Last night, the Minutewomen beat New Hampshire for the first time in four tries by the score of 2-1. Kara Murphy scored her first goal of the season, and it was the game winner for the Minutewomen, who improve to 4-11 on the season, and 2-1 in the Atlantic 10.

NHL dishes out fine

NEW YORK (AP) – The NHL fined one of the owners of the Atlanta Thrashers $250,000 for saying the league would use replacement players next year if a new collective bargaining agreement isn't reached, The Associated Press has learned.

Steve Belkin, a member of Atlanta Spirit, LLC — the group that bought the Thrashers earlier this year — was given the hefty fine for comments he made over the weekend to the Boston Herald, said an official within the league speaking on the condition of anonymity.

Belkin, a Weston businessman, said the NHL had a solution for next fall if a new collective bargaining agreement wasn't reached.

That was more than enough for the NHL to hear. The league has already dished out other large fines to those on the management side who have spoken out of turn during the labor dispute with the players association.

BASEBALL

NEW YORK (AP) — Hours after jetting back from a funeral for relatives in Panama, Mariano Rivera stopped the surging Boston Red Sox, who had cut an eight-run deficit to one.

Rivera got Kevin Millar to pop out to strand the tying run at third base in the eighth inning, then finished out a thrilling 10-7 win for the Yankees in the opener of the AL championship series.

The star reliever arrived at the ballpark just before 9 p.m. EDT, midway through the second inning, with the Yankees already up 2-0.

Rivera wept, sang and prayed at the funeral in Puerto Caimito, Panama, his hometown about 40 miles from Panama City.

The cousin of Rivera's wife, Clara, died along with his 14-year-old son Saturday at Rivera's house. Officials said Victor Dario Avila and his son were electrocuted, apparently when electrical cable fell into the water as the younger Avila was in the pool and his father tried to save him.

CINCINNATI (AP) — Barry Larkin's stellar 19-year career with his hometown team ended with a one-sided phone call.

The Cincinnati Reds informed their captain they aren't interested in keeping him around for another season. Instead, the Reds will replace the 40-year-old shortstop with two unproven youngsters.

Larkin was at his home in Orlando, Fla., when general manager Dan O'Brien and manager Dave Miley — a former teammate — called with the decision.

Larkin's 19 seasons with one team was the longest current streak in the majors. He had hoped for a 20th and was willing to discuss returning in a utility role, but the Reds ruled it out.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Barry Bonds underwent arthroscopic surgery on his left knee and is expected to be at full strength when the San Francisco Giants open spring training in February.

The slugger underwent a 20-minute arthritis cleanup procedure performed by San Jose Sharks team physician Dr. Art Ting at the Fremont Surgery Center.

MULTI-CULTURAL FRATERNITIES AND SORORITIES HOLD "MEET THE GREEKS"

Autumn Event this Saturday

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

More than 4,000 college-bound high school students and their parents are expected to attend the University of Massachusetts campus open-house "Autumn Event" on Saturday.

Registration will begin at 9 a.m. in the Mullins Center. The day-long program will feature various tours of the college's different departments, classrooms, dining halls and residence halls.

The prospective students will have the chance to speak with hundreds of UMass staff, faculty and current students to ask questions and try to get a feel of campus life.

"People will be coming from all over," said Joanne Horrigan, director of the New Student Program and Autumn Event coordinator. "These include Texas, Georgia, California as well as the New England states."

Horrigan added that the event is a great opportunity for prospective students.

"The Autumn Event is a great opportunity for prospective students to visit the campus and learn about the different sides of life at UMass Amherst. Once the students get a real view of the quality academic programs and student life activities, we think they'll decide that UMass is the best place for them."

The Autumn Event will include a University welcome by UMass President Jack M. Wilson at 10 a.m. The greeting will be followed by an address by UMass Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

Lauren Fowler, a double-major undergraduate in Psychology and Spanish, resident assistant and athlete will be the student speaker at the event. Fowler will be graduating with the UMass Class of 2005.

"I'm excited about the opportunity to address seniors for the prospective Class of 2008," commented Fowler. "I feel fortunate to be the speaker of the event. I know a lot of hard work was put into this event."

Horrigan explained the purpose of the Autumn Event is to "showcase the academic and exciting college life here."

"Its an exciting opportunity for prospective students and parents to see our campus. There are probably 200 students and 400 faculty involved with the program," said Horrigan. "So it truly is a campus effort."

The Autumn Event includes Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano as the program emcee. Gargano expressed optimism with the upcoming day.

"We're excited that we're going to be welcoming nearly 4,000 students and parents who have shown a real interest in attending UMass Amherst next fall semester after they graduate in the spring of 2005. Students and their families are getting to ready to embark on one of the most important steps of their lives," Gargano said.

He also stated the Autumn Event is needed in providing the right information to students who are thinking of attending the college.

"In addition to providing a very hospitable campus on Saturday to students and parents, we want to not just give them information, but good information," Gargano explained. "And that attending UMass Amherst is the best chance they can make. It's an opportunity for them to meet with deans, faculty, staff, and other students and get their most pertinent questions asked."

Students and families visiting on Saturday will have chances to visit resident halls, University Health Services, the Durfee Conservatory, the W.E.B. Du Bois Library, the Student Union, as well as the schools on campus. With meetings commencing at 11:50 a.m., these include the College of Humanities & Fine Arts, Natural Sciences and Mathematics, Natural Resources & the Environment, and many more.

"Students will head over to whatever school they are interested in during the event," added Horrigan. "There will be information sessions provided for students at these."

Entertainment and art will also be available for students and parents to view at the Autumn Event. Entertainment and demonstrations by Student Groups such as Mission IMPROVable, the Juggling Club, Vocal Suspects, Fencing Team, Tae Kwon Do Club as well as others will take place on the steps of the Student Union from 12 p.m. to 2:30 p.m. At the same time in Herter Hall, an Art Gallery Exhibition will take place of mixed media called "HOME GROWN." It will showcase recent works by incoming and current Master of Fine Arts students.

Students to rally against racism

By Brian Duffy
Collegian Staff

A group of concerned students are expected to hold a rally on the ramp of the Whitmore Administration Building today at 2:45 p.m. The students are then expected to enter Whitmore and present witness statements to Dean of Students, Jo-Anne Vanin.

These witness statements, one hundred in total, verify that each witness has seen the pictures of the controversial "KKK-9" photos, which feature former and current members of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association and SCERA. The participants of the rally are expected to claim that these photos have led to personal experiences of racism.

Students who have put this movement together are doing so because of what they refer to as "inaction," on the part of the administration in response to the photos. They hope these witness statements will lead to the successful prosecution of students who are they say are making minority students feel unwelcome and unsafe on campus.

Organizers say that an allegedly racially charged light two weeks ago involving UMass football players outside McKimmie Hall as well as a call from an Aryan Nation sympathizer to the office of ALANA Affairs, have also contributed to this idea.

"All the administration has done is stalled and protected the students involved," said organizer Marisha Leiblum.

Leiblum believes that race related incidents of hate have increased dramatically since the pictures have been released.

"The administration needs to send a message to students that these racially motivated activities are unacceptable," Leiblum said.

Andres Gomez, also an organizer and member of Take Back UMass, stated that the administration legally has four months to respond to the witness statements. Gomez said that minority students are feeling increasingly less safe and uncomfortable at UMass.

Leiblum and Gomez encourage all interested members of the UMass community to join them today outside of Whitmore.

Fresno, Calif. now nation's capital in illegal drug use

By Juliana Barbassa
Associated Press

FRESNO, Calif. (AP) — The nation's capital of intravenous drug use is not New York or Miami, not Chicago or Detroit – but Fresno.

It is an unlikely distinction for a city of fewer than 500,000 people in the heart of one of the nation's richest agricultural regions.

The percentage of people shooting up heroin and other drugs in Fresno is nearly three times the national average, fueled by a boom in methamphetamine use, according to a study issued last month.

"This town is so full of meth," said Amy Wilson, 28, who was ordered into rehab after her daughter, now 3 1/2 months old, tested positive for methamphetamine at birth.

"My grasp on reality was gone," she said. She described drug use in California's Central Valley as "like a cancer."

Law enforcement agencies and treatment counselors say they are overwhelmed by the scope of the problem, which is compounded by HIV and hepatitis C infections that come from sharing needles.

The Fresno area has become home to Mexican drug cartels that operate in its rural expanses, where the farm chemicals used to make meth are readily available and the noxious fumes are less easily detected. According to a 2001 estimate by the Drug Enforcement Administration, 80 percent of the country's meth comes from the cartels.

Part of the problem in the Fresno area is also poverty, said Samuel Friedman, a research fellow at the National Development and Research Institutes in New York and primary author of the study in last month's Journal of Urban Health.

Fresno County, where farmworkers get paid rock-bottom, seasonal wages, is one of the poorest counties in the nation. More than 20 percent of its residents live in poverty, according to Census estimates, and the per capita income is just $15,495 a year.

In the study, Fresno was found to have 173 IV drug users for every 10,000 people; the national average is 60 per 10,000 people. Three other urban areas within 200 miles also made it into the top 10 – San Francisco, Stockton-Lodi and Bakersfield.

It is a problem that has been costly for the government. Fresno County spends $20 million a year on drug treatment programs that served more than 9,000 people in 2002, and the programs are straining to keep.

"Now at least we have a waiting list," said Dennis Koch, administrator of Fresno County's Alcohol and Drug Program. "Before, we used to not have these programs. There was nothing to wait for."

Last day to drop classes with a 'W' on transcript

University of Massachusetts undergraduates and Continuing Education students have until Monday, October 25 to drop a fall semester course and receive only a "W" on their transcripts.

Dropping the class will have no impact on one's cumulative average. A "W" is almost always preferable to an "F" on a transcript.

Students are encouraged to consult their academic dean for advice and appropriate procedures in order to drop a course.

However, students should be aware that they must carry at least 12 credits for financial aid and most health insurance purposes.

War documentary screening

By Dan Koffman
Collegian Staff

Smith College will be holding a re-screening of the documentary "Poetry in Wartime" this coming Monday. The film will be shown in the Weinstein Auditorium at Wright Hall on the Smith campus in Northampton at 7:30 p.m. Admission is free and all are welcome to come watch the screening, which is sponsored by the Poetry Center at Smith College.

Ellen Dore Watson, director of the Poetry Center and an accomplished poet, calls the film "extraordinary." The first screening at Smith, which took place on Sept. 11, with other Smith events going on simultaneously was watched by a sizable crowd.

The re-screening could bring in even more people, Watson said. Some of those in attendance the first time were so moved by the documentary that they asked Watson to screen the film again so they could bring their friends to see it.

"The film is a really interesting look at how war has changed over the centuries and how civilian populations are more impacted by war today," Watson said. She went on to say how the film truly demonstrates how "everyone who goes to war is a different person than when they come back."

Watson believes that it is important for students to make the trek to see the movie because we are at a "turning point" in history where political consciousness is vital. With the war in Iraq bringing talk of war to us in the present day and the word draft being thrown about in conversation, the documentary can help to raise one's awareness of the realities of war.

Watson was also impressed with the "intersection of war and poetry" within the movie. These are two things which do not appear to go hand-in-hand, but the filmmakers show there is a noticeable connection.

The documentary is a collection of images of war and poetry read by poets. War is profiled through the centuries and the poets are diverse. Famous poets of yesteryear like Emily Dickinson, Langston Hughes, Wilfred Owen, Siegfried Sassoon, Walt Whitman, and Homer have their writings used in the film. Also featured is more current poetry from Rachel Bentham, Ali Habash, Marie Howe, Marilyn Nelson, Hasham Shafq, and many others.

The film also contains commentary from non-poets. "Soldiers, journalists, historians and experts on combat interviewed in Poetry in Wartime add diverse perspectives on war's effects on soldiers, civilians and society," the film's official maintains.

Makers of the film are planning on it being released to theatres sometime in early 2005. In the meantime, the only chance to watch this unique film on war and poetry is at the re-screening. Watson recalls how viewers felt after the first screening. "After the film everyone seemed quite affected."

For more information on the documentary, visit www.poetryinwartime.org. For more information on the screening itself, visit www.smith.edu/poetrycenter.

Green Zone suffers attack

By Nadia Abou El-Magd
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Insurgents penetrated Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone and detonated explosives at a market and a popular cafe Thursday, killing 10 people, including four American civilians, in the first bombings inside the compound housing the U.S. and Iraqi government headquarters.

A top Iraqi official said the attacks appeared to have been suicide bombings. The attack was a bold assault on the heart of the U.S.-Iraqi leadership of the country and a district seen as one of the few relatively safe refuges for Americans in the capital.

Witnesses said two men, each carrying a backpack but not required ID badges, entered the Green Zone Cafe full of Americans and other patrons at around lunchtime, drank tea and talked to each other for nearly half an hour.

One of them then left and soon after an explosion was heard, then the man who remained in the cafe detonated his bomb moments later, ripping through the building, said an Iraqi vendor who was in the cafe at the time. A bomb was found and defused at the same cafe last week.

Harvard University student found guilty of manslaughter

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — A Harvard graduate student was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to six to eight years in prison yesterday for stabbing a young man to death in a fight that heightened the generations-old tension between the Ivy Leaguers and working-class Cambridge.

Prosecutors had charged 26-year-old Alexander Pring-Wilson with murder in the slaying last year of Michael Colono, arguing that Pring-Wilson attacked the 18-year-old Colono for ridiculing him as he stumbled home drunk.

"Michael Colono made fun of the defendant and it cost him his life," prosecutor Adrienne Lynch said.

Pring-Wilson said he pulled a four-inch folding knife and stabbed Colono in self-defense after Colono and his cousin brutally beat him.

The jury deliberated over five days before finding Pring-Wilson guilty of the lesser charge. Judge Regina Quinlan could have given him 20 years behind bars.

The case represented a collision of two worlds.

Pring-Wilson, the son of Colorado lawyers, was studying for his master's degree in Russian and Eurasian studies and planned to attend law school. Colono, a high school dropout, had earned his equivalency diploma and was working as a cook at a Boston hotel. He died the day before his daughter's third birthday.

Defense attorney Ann Kaufman, in tears as she asked the judge to sentence Pring-Wilson to probation, said he had been unfairly portrayed as a product of an elite upbringing.

"He's worked all of his life. He comes from a family where all the children in the family worked," Kaufman said. "This isn't about race, or class or privilege or wealth. ... What it's about is what happened on that street between three people."

Alexander Pring-Wilson in court for yesterday's verdict.

After the verdict, Colono's mother, Ada, broke down in tears outside court and was comforted by her family.

Pring-Wilson's mother, Cynthia Pring, said she understood the Colono family's pain. "I feel for them so strongly," she said. "My son feels for them so strongly.

Israeli tanks pull back from town

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

BEIT LAHIYA, Gaza Strip (AP) — Israeli tanks and bulldozers pulled back from this Palestinian town yesterday after tearing up roads, flattening greenhouses and knocking down dozens of houses in a devastating two-day raid, part of Israel's expanding invasion of the northern Gaza Strip.

The Israeli offensive is in its third week and Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told legislators Thursday that the campaign would continue and even be broadened.

Since the Sept. 29 start of the offensive, triggered by a deadly Palestinian rocket attack on an Israeli town, 105 Palestinians have been killed by Israeli army fire, including 18 under the age of 16.

Five armed Palestinians and an elderly civilian were killed in three separate missile strikes, starting Wednesday evening. Witnesses said Israeli aircraft on Thursday fired two more missiles at targets in the Jebaliya refugee camp.

Sharon told parliament's Defense and Foreign Affairs Committee that one objective of the campaign was to ensure calm during Israel's planned withdrawal from Gaza in 2005. When asked to clarify, however, he said he was not making an end to Palestinian attacks a prerequisite for the withdrawal.

Sharon also said Jewish settlers in Gaza would be removed from their homes by summer. Israel Radio initially quoted him as saying the removal would begin in May. However, participants in the closed-door meeting said Sharon was not that specific.

Palestinian militants have continued to fire rockets and mortars at Israeli border areas and Jewish settlements in Gaza. Israeli military commentators wrote Thursday that while an offensive might appease Israeli public opinion, it would not stop rocket fire.

Palestinians say much of the Israeli destruction in Gaza has been wanton.

For the past two weeks, hundreds of armored vehicles have patrolled a five-mile stretch of northern Gaza, including the towns of Beit Lahiya, Beit Hanoun and the Jebaliya refugee camp. At times, tanks remained on the outskirts, at times they moved deep into densely populated areas.

On Thursday morning, armored vehicles pulled back to the outskirts of Beit Lahiya after a two-day operation that left a wide path of destruction. The demolitions focused on outlying farms, the center of town and old Beit Lahiya.

The army said the goal of the raid was to prevent militants from launching rockets, and that trees, farm buildings and other structures were destroyed to deprive them of cover. With tanks moving through narrow alleys, some of the destruction was unintentional, the army said.

Dozens of houses in Beit Lahiya were badly damaged and no longer safe to live in. Armored vehicles tore up roads, destroyed water and sewage pipes and knocked down electricity poles.

Palestinian author Omar Khalil Omar, a Beit Lahiya resident, said two houses belonging to his extended family were damaged, and two cars were crushed. He said his mother's grave, on a family plot near his home, was torn up.

Scientists make strides in search for malaria vaccine

By Emila Ross
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) — Scientists have made important progress in the quest for a malaria vaccine, showing for the first time that childhood shots can prevent nearly one-third of cases and slash the risk of severe, life-threatening attacks by almost two-thirds.

Experts say the findings, outlined this week in The Lancet medical journal, provide robust evidence that the dream of developing a vaccine that will get babies through the most vulnerable period of infancy could become a reality by the end of the decade.

Researchers have been working on a malaria vaccine for more than 20 years, but until now none of the candidates showed promise. If this research bears fruit, it would be the first human vaccine against a parasite.

Specialists agree that, at least for the foreseeable future, there is no prospect of a vaccine that would wipe out malaria like the smallpox vaccine did for smallpox, or even provide lifelong immunity.

A vaccine that would turn the disease into a mostly mild infection would make a huge dent in the effort to control malaria, which kills a child every 30 seconds and poses a threat to half of all people on the planet. About 500 million episodes of malaria occur every year, mostly in the developing world. It is the leading killer of children under 5 in sub-Saharan Africa.

"We think a vaccine is important because as quick as you can make new drugs, there's resistance and [delivery of] bed nets has not been as simple as one would have hoped," said Melinda Moree, director of the Malaria Vaccine Initiative, which backed the latest study. "We've been trying to apply our existing technologies and the number of malaria deaths is rising. We need some new tools."

The vaccine, which GlaxoSmithKline Bio has been developing for 20 years, was tested in 2,022 children aged 1 to 4 in Mozambique, where the mosquito-borne disease is endemic.

Afghanistan counts 10.5 million ballots in election

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — Vote counting in Afghanistan's presidential election got under way Thursday, five days after a landmark vote meant to cement a new era of stability after more than two decades of strife.

A top election official said about three-quarters of the 10.5 million Afghans who registered for the election turned out to vote.

Ballot boxes have flooded in to the counting centers by road, air and even donkey from across the rugged, impoverished country. The head of the Afghan-U.N. electoral commission cut the seal on the first box opened in the capital, Kabul, to begin the tallying process to determine the country's first popularly elected head of state.

Counting also started in four regional centers: the northern cities of Kunduz and Mazar-e-Sharif, eastern Gardez and the main southern city of Kandahar.

The remaining three counting centers were expected to begin work by Saturday. U.N. spokesman Manoel de Almeida e Silva said 95 percent of the ballot boxes have reached the counting centers.

Reginald Austin, the top adviser to the joint election commission, said the first "substantial" results could emerge in about a week.

Austin said initial information from polling stations indicated that "nearly eight million" people cast ballots, a turnout of between 75 and 80 percent.

One person in Afghanistan is counting many ballots cast in that nation's landmark presidential election.

Karzai, who enjoys strong international backing and is seeking to bridge the war-ravaged nation's deep ethnic divides, is widely believed to have won, possibly with the absolute majority needed to avoid a run-off.

Officials had stalled the start of vote counting while a panel of foreign experts sifted through several dozen complaints of alleged irregularities from the 16 candidates, including front-running, U.S.-backed incumbent Hamid Karzai.

None of their complaints appear serious enough to invalidate final results expected by Oct. 31.

Some ballot boxes have not retrieved yet from far-flung regions, and the count may take time even after they do. Most election workers have received only a few hours of training.

Staff in Kabul went through a final drill on procedures before Zakim Shah, the president of the Joint Electoral Management Body, snipped the green seal on a plastic box containing hundreds of ballots to begin the process there.

Many election centers likely will close for Friday, the first day of the Islamic fasting month of Ramadan, election spokeswoman Silvana Puizina said.

The chances for a solid result improved following the appointment of a panel of three foreign experts to investigate complaints from Karzai's rivals.

The panel said Wednesday it was forced to quarantine ballots from only about 10 polling stations, indicating that any problems with the vote may be limited.

Election staff were supposed to mark voters' left thumbs with indelible ink, but some apparently used pens meant for marking the ballots or ink meant for stamping them instead.

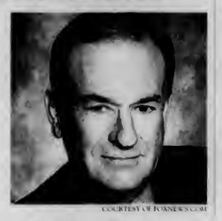
Bill O'Reilly sued for sexual harrassment

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Fox News Channel's Bill O'Reilly made a TV talk show appearance on what he said was "the worst day of my life" Thursday, vowing to fight sexual harassment charges by one of his producers.



Accuser Andrea Mackris spoke publicly for the first time, saying she felt threatened by her former boss, who filed a lawsuit charging the woman and her lawyer with extortion.

Mackris, 33, said O'Reilly made a series of sexually explicit phone calls to her. Mackris, an associate producer on Fox News Channel's top-rated "The O'Reilly Factor," said he advised her to use a vibrator, told her about sexual fantasies involving her and engaged in unwanted phone sex.

During an appearance to promote his children's book on "Live with Regis and Kelly," O'Reilly said he'd been repeatedly threatened with lawsuits and bodily harm over the past few years. He said he knew that by filing his lawsuit, he could perhaps ruin his career.

"If I have to go down, I'm willing to do it," he said. "I'm going to take a stand. I'm a big mouth on the air and I'm a big mouth off the air."

On his own show Wednesday, O'Reilly called the case "the single most evil thing I have ever experienced, and I've seen a lot. But these people picked the wrong guy."

Bill O'Reilly, host of Fox News Channel's "O'Reilly Factor."

Mackris, who worked for O'Reilly for four years, said on ABC's "Good Morning America" that she took his actions and statements as a personal threat.

"I think my actions have been borne out in their actions toward me since I came out with it," she said.

ABC's Bob Woodruff asked Mackris if she knew what she was up against. O'Reilly "is no shrinking violet," he said.

Federal government says mad cow disease safeguards are sufficient

By Diedtra Henderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Federal health advisers unanimously agreed yesterday that current safeguards on blood donations in the United States are sufficient despite the disclosure that a second British resident most likely acquired mad cow disease through a tainted transfusion.

"The United States is not Great Britain," said Dr. Stephen DeArmond, a University of California-San Francisco pathology professor. DeArmond pointed to the lack of evidence that so-far symptomless mad cow infections suspected in thousands of British residents are an issue in this country.

The Food and Drug Administration advisory committee agreed that donor restrictions are still warranted. But it stopped short of asking for additional safeguards in the United States to further prevent the risk of transmission of mad cow disease through blood.

The agency already bars blood donations from people who lived more than three months in Great Britain or who received transfusions there after 1979.

In both confirmed British infections, recipients got blood from donors who were young and apparently healthy at the time of donation. The chances that two confirmed infections among people who received blood was caused instead by eating mad-cow tainted beef were remote - 1 in 80,000 to 1 in 1 billion, the panel was told.

Getting the human form of mad cow disease, variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, through tainted blood "is a reality. And we've got to treat it like that," said Steven Anderson, an FDA risk assessment expert.

The new case involves a woman in her 80s who died from an unrelated medical condition early this year, according to Dr. Robert Will, a neurologist who founded the British mad cow surveillance team.

Because the woman had received a blood transfusion in 1999 from a donor who later died from variant CJD, the woman's doctor did a more thorough analysis after her death.

The woman had no outward signs of neurological disease and her brain, spinal cord, tonsils and appendix were normal, Will told the panel. In her spleen and cervical lymph nodes, however, the woman harbored malformed, infective prion proteins.

Mad cow disease occurs when normal proteins found in the brain, known as prions, change shape and coax adjacent healthy prions to do the same. When enough prions are altered, they deposit a plaque on the brain and surround the mark with spongy holes, killing the victim.

By testing 14,964 appendices of normal surgical patients in England, researchers learned that three were tainted with the infective proteins. That implies 257 people per million British residents - or 3,808 people age 10 to 30 - could silently incubate mad cow, Will said.

G. Michael Fitzpatrick, chief policy officer at America's Blood Centers, acknowledged worries about a potential second wave of mad cow cases in England.

Still, current safeguards appear to be working in the United States, Fitzpatrick said. Already, the nation's major blood suppliers, ABC and the American Red Cross, estimate current deferrals block 400,000 previous blood donors.

Instead of additional donor restrictions, the FDA should consider an "exit strategy" that would set thresholds for ending the blood supply sapping measures, Fitzpatrick said.

The federal advisers soundly reject that notion, agreeing unanimously that the current donor deferral strategies are still warranted to reduce mad cow risk in blood.

Before the second blood transfusion infection was reported in England, Dr. Arthur Bracey wondered whether restrictions in the United States might ease.

"I think that would be premature now," said Bracey, associate chief of pathology at St. Luke's Episcopal Hospital in Houston. He pointed to anecdotal information sent to the committee about a high-risk donor thwarting restrictions in order to sell his blood.

Springfield celebrates 100 years of Rolls-Royce autos

By Trudy Tynan
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — With the glint of old chrome and a touch of gold plate, this city is celebrating the long-ago decade when it was the American home of Rolls-Royce.

The New England city where the American automobile industry was born became an outpost of British glitz when Rolls-Royce, which is celebrating its 100th anniversary, opened an American plant here in 1921.

"The object of Rolls-Royce was to build a car that would last a lifetime, not a decade," said Ed Lake of Ludlow, a founding member of the Rolls-Royce Owners Club. He'll be among dozens of owners showing off their cars at the Connecticut Valley Historical Museum on Saturday in a gala tribute.

Lake has a 1930 Phantom I made in Springfield. "It is an amazing machine," he said. "When I got it in 1948 it had 80,000 miles on it. I've put on another 80,000 and it's still going very well."

At least one original owner, M. Allen Swift of Hartford, Conn., now 100, still has the two-tone green 1927 roadster he had built at the Springfield factory, said automotive historian John Webb DeCampi.

DeCampi estimated that well over half of the Springfield-made 1,703 Silver Ghosts and 1,241 Phantoms – a new model with one-third more horsepower introduced in 1927 – are still in existence.

Rolls-Royce initially provided only a chassis. The well-heeled owners then commissioned elegant one-of-a-kind bodies from famous coach makers, DeCampi said. An even higher percentage of those vehicles have survived, he estimated.

Springfield, the center of the nation's gun industry, caught the eye of Rolls-Royce because of its leadership in both the precision machine and automotive industry, as well as its proximity to New York and Boston, DeCampi said.

"We think of it now as an old industrial city," said Guy McLain, director of the Connecticut Valley Historical Museum, which has a special exhibit marking the decade and the city's impact on the transportation industry. "But in 1920 it was the cutting edge."

The 1928 Springfield Phantom I, Brewster Piccadilly is one of several Rolls-Royce automobiles celebrated by auto enthusiasts.

In 1895, brothers Charles and Frank Duryea launched America's first mass-produced gasoline-powered automobile in Springfield.

Six years later champion bicycle racer George Hendee and engineer Oscar Hedstrom began the American motorcycle industry with the Indian Motocycle. By 1920 Indian's Springfield plant was the largest motorcycle manufacturer in the world.

Jackson case developments

By Tim Molloy
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. (AP) — A judge yesterday rejected a defense request to throw out the indictment against Michael Jackson, saying prosecutors had presented enough evidence of child molestation and an attempt to silence the alleged victim's family for the case to go forward.

Judge Rodney S. Melville rejected arguments that the indictment should be thrown out because of prosecutorial misconduct, improper legal instruction and insufficient evidence.

The decision came after perhaps the most unusual of a string of media restrictions in the secrecy-shrouded case against the pop star: Reporters and other members of the public were prohibited from talking in court, even before the proceedings.

One fan of Jackson's was tossed by bailiffs for talking to the person next to her moments after she entered the courtroom. Reporters silently scribbled notes to each other, like students in class, as they questioned the legality of the rule.

The bailiffs rescinded the rule after a midmorning break in yesterday's hearing, saying there had been a misunderstanding. They did not explain what it was.

The rule was imposed after Santa Maria Times news columnist Steve Corbett spoke with Santa Barbara County Sheriff's Sgt. Ross Ruth about a judge's order barring reporters from conducting interviews during breaks and hearings. Corbett argued that it was hard to say what constituted an interview, and Ruth responded by ordering his deputies to keep everyone silent.

How many students does it take to change a light bulb?

How many to change the world?

Even something as simple as a light bulb can change the world. Compact Fluorescent Lamps (CFLs) produce the same bright light, use two-thirds less energy and last 6 to 10 times longer than incandescent bulbs.

Students can be a part of the light bulb revolution by switching to ENERGY STAR® qualified CFL bulbs. It's a small but powerful step towards reducing energy usage.

In fact, if every U.S. household makes their next light an ENERGY STAR qualified CFL, we would:

- save 8.4 billion kWh in electricity
- reduce pollution levels equal to removing 1.2 million cars from the road for one year
- save enough energy to provide electricity to more than 808,000 U.S. homes for one year
- save up to $800 million on the country's annual energy bill

Bombarded by liberal bias

Michael Busack

The cashier at Wal-mart doesn't give me advice on school. I don't expect my mechanic to tell me the best way to get a date. The reason why? You go to Wal-mart to get a good deal on a 6-pack of Hanes 100 percent cotton, not to raise your GPA. You go to the mechanic to get your muffler fixed, or to get a bigger spoiler put on your '92 Civic. This seems like a simple formula, but somewhere along the line this theory got lost in translation with regards to UMass professors.

Okay, so I know this school is waving the liberal flag free and proud. I understand that most college students think that John Kerry is the greatest thing to happen to politics since Al Gore stopped making out with Tipper in public, but professors, for my sake, I don't need to be force fed it in the classroom as well.

When I enrolled for classes this semester I was excited at the notion that I was taking some classes that really sparked my interest. I was psyched to know that I was finally going to get down to some of the nitty gritty course requirements for my majors. Instead, I have found nothing but one professor after another with a slanted view trying to tell me how much the President lied to me. Yes, everyone is allowed an opinion. This is one of the very virtues that helps to make this country so magnificent, but in a classroom, this is unacceptable.

Okay, so I know this school is waving the liberal flag free and proud ... but professors, for my sake, I don't need to be force fed it in the classroom as well.

I started to notice the worst example of this situation in a course entitled "Readings in Journalism." The online course description for this class says that we will learn about "the muckraking journalists of the turn of the century to the online journalism of the late 1990s." Now, correct me if I am wrong, but I did not hear anything about the 2004 Presidential election in this description.

The professor, Stephen Simurda has done a wonderful job at facilitating the class, and I do feel as though I have learned about the course materials. However, Professor Simurda has often times revealed his political beliefs to the students in the course. Not only does he divulge his liberalism, but he often times spouts it as if it were truth.

Earlier this week in class, we were speaking about the ability of a reporter, or person in general to influence a large group of people. We talked about manipulation and the fact that these "truths" did not necessarily have to be true in order to manipulate people.

In the same breath, Professor Simurda used an example of President George W. Bush. He said that Bush, in a sense, manipulated citizens of this great nation by using the current conflict in Iraq to divert attention from who was responsible for Sept. 11. He continued to tell us that the conflict in Iraq was long premeditated by the president and that he had been caught in his actions.

I cannot stress any more: this is a cardinal sin for any teacher. Not only did he force his opinion on many students that could very likely disagree with his view of the situation, but he made it seem as if his opinion were truth. This act in itself is manipulation. From a professor, this is not acceptable.

I was encouraged when one student in the class raised her hand and asked if during the next class session we could discuss the wrong doings of John Kerry. She then furthered her point by saying that Professor Simurda may perhaps be the manipulator in this conversation.

Putting a student in a situation like this in a classroom is unprofessional. No student should be forced to defend their political beliefs in a course about readings in journalism.

Now this class is just an example. In a school where the mass majority of the students, faculty and administration share the same political beliefs, it is difficult not to find some bias in the ways that the materials are presented.

I think the presentation of this bias should somehow be monitored. I think it is the responsibility for each teacher to provide an environment that will foster progress, learning and most of all the ability to formulate intelligent and progressive opinions that are unique to each and every student.

Every person has an opinion, even teachers. God bless that right. You can have that opinion on your own time, but in case you have forgotten, we pay you to be unbiased.

Rocking the vote, the GOP way

Johnny Donaldson

Should the person who registers you to vote allow his or her own political affiliations impact their job, or should these registrars simply take a non-partisan stance despite individual beliefs?

Some may think it's a stupid, "no duh" question, but it's really a valid one to ask. I believe that that is the kind of job which should not be tainted by subjectivity, that the ethical and responsible thing to do is to cast aside personal beliefs – whether they lean towards the left or the right – in the greater good of getting people to vote.

I shouldn't be surprised that in the era of George W. Bush, king of the smear campaign, that a Republican-affiliated group would throw out such quaint notions as "ethics" and "responsibility" in favor of a win-at-all-costs attitude.

The organization in question is called Voter Outreach for America. It's a private voter registration firm based out of Nevada, one of the year's hotly contested swing states. Its job is to collect registration for the state, an easy enough job, but the company that set them up, a Phoenix-centered consulting firm called Sproul and Associates, has received major donations from the Republican party: as in $500,000 in donations. Spokespeople for Sproul have said, and I quote: "it is safe to say we are trying to register Republicans."

The problem with all that is that a former employee, Eric Russell, has come forward to accuse supervisors of willingly tampering with registration forms. Democratic registration forms.

Russell charges that a supervisor ripped up Democratic forms before his eyes. Nathan Sproul, head of the company, says that the allegations are false. But this a company that is also under investigation in Oregon for "alteration and destruction of voter registration cards" (Anne Martens, spokeswoman for Oregon Secretary of State Bill Bradbury). Apparently, a canvasser refused to register anyone other than Republicans, saying that's how he made his commission.

The problem with all that is that a former employee, Eric Russell, has come forward to accuse supervisors of willingly tampering with registration forms. Democratic registration forms.

Right now, Secretary of State Dean Heller is investigating. Jon Summer, spokesman for the Nevada Democratic State Committee, said he will pursue a lawsuit.

The Republican Party naturally disavows any kind of connection to the matter. No matter that they fund the company and that the destroyed voter registration cards were for Democrats. No matter that in Oregon, the controversy swirled around Democrats being shunned by registrars.

It's called plausible deniability. It's a nicely Machiavellian tactic, one that allows the Republicans to engage in their brand of not-very-kosher behavior without ever being in danger of being liable in any individual case. Fund a private firm and get them to toss out the registration cards antithetical to their own goals. When the proverbial excrement hits the fan, deny all culpability, disavow any knowledge and find a scapegoat. You know, some misguided fool who did not act in the best interests of either party. That way no can credibly point a finger at you, if they do then they are just being reactionary and zealous.

Yep, some of you reading this column will write in and respond and say that I'm just looking to exploit this news story in order to dump on the Republicans yet again. Some will scoff and snicker and wonder what any of this has to do with Bush, that there is no proof to connect him to this alleged crime. (I do hold out hope that for the ever-dwindling decency of the GOP, that this crime turns out to be a lie.) I know what all the responses will be. And you all are, for the most part right.

There is no proof connecting the GOP to this little scandal out West. It could just be the actions of a few idiots undermining our democracy. But the Republican sponsorship is troubling and curious. It sends my red flag up, especially with the ghostly specter of plausible deniability hovering over it. It's a tricky little gambit that the Republicans have long since perfected. Let's hope that this little incident well help to finally trip them up.

Postcard from Red Sox Nation

Matt Brochu

Dear Nomar,

Greetings from Massachusetts! I'm sorry it took so long for me to write. You know how crazy things get in October for everyone in Red Sox Nation. Unlike you, we don't get the month off. There's nothing really new here, except for the fact that I broke my ankle this past weekend at a cheesy club in Montreal in front of about 40 French Canadians.

Anyway, how've you been? I was doing fine until the other night. I don't know if you were watching, but the Red Sox just lost to the Yankees in Games 1 and 2 of the ALCS. I know what you're thinking – if you were still with Boston, maybe they could've won the games. I don't blame you. I mean, your stats were spectacular against New York in the ALCS last year (.241 with 1 RBI).

As much as it pains you to hear me say it, the losses weren't Cabrera's fault, or Schilling's. Actually, the person who lost the first game for the Sox wasn't even on the field that night. That person was in my apartment. That person has never thrown a sweaty jock-strap at a teammate after a game. That person was my friend Jodie.

Now don't get me wrong, Jodie's not only a beautiful girl, but she's also one of my good friends. For these reasons, my roommates and I let her watch the Sox with us whenever she wants. Granted, Jodie makes an innocent comment every once in a while, so when she says things like, "If you buy season tickets, can you go to away games too?" or, "Why does Ortiz's helmet have a chin-strap?" we just let it slide. Despite her limited knowledge of the game, she gives great advice to the players like, "I think Manny should hit a homerun right now," or "Johnny Damon should shave."

But as nice as Jodie is, when it comes to the Red Sox, calling her bad luck would be an understatement. Just look at the statistics: The Yankees scored 10 runs against the Red Sox in Game 1 and she was in the living room for all 10 of them. The Sox, on the other hand, scored 7 runs on the Yanks and she was present for none of them. Yet, the jackass kept coming back into the room, and what's worse, we let her.

But enough about my friend, the losses don't even make me nervous, Nomar, and here's why: because Jodie will no longer be allowed in our house on game days; because Pedro is going to pitch a hell of a series, as his contract, his career, and more importantly his pride will be made or broken by it. And, no matter how well he pitches, he will be chained to the dugout from the eighth inning until the game ends.

For the last half-century, Red Sox fans have been perfesonified as the little boy in 'The Polar Express.'

Because, I can buy your Red Sox jersey at TJ Maxx for $8. Because I'm dating a Yankees fan, and if that isn't a reverse jinx, then I don't know what is. Because zero out of the eight people who designed the "Star Wars" intro before Game 1 have lost their virginity; because as the t-shirt says, "Posada is a little bitch." Because we no longer have any players who pay more attention to their batting rituals than their teammates.

Because Orlando Cabrera, Dave Roberts, and Doug Mientkiewicz wouldn't sit on the bench in a pivotal 13-inning game against the Yankees instead of sacing up to help their team.

Because, in case you haven't noticed Nomar, things haven't been the same in Boston since you left.

As a matter of fact, things have been much better. The Fenway standing ovations that were once wasted on you alone are now given to every single member of the team, even to scraggly, 170-strike-out Mark Bellhorn, simply because we're in on a little secret that no one else has the capacity to understand.

The secret is ... things are just different this year. For the last half-century, Red Sox fans have been personified as the little boy in "The Polar Express." As children, we not only hear that bell, but we love that bell, just as we love our team. But with the passing of each year, as pitchers blow games in late innings, as balls trickle helplessly through first basemen's legs, as disappointments build and unspoken promises are broken, that bell rings just a little bit softer. Eventually, we no longer believe, and eventually, it fails to ring at all.

But not this year: midway through the season, after Varitek kicked A-Rod and you were traded to Chicago, we began to hear something we haven't heard in a while, and it's been ringing louder ever since. I can hear it. My roommates can hear it. The players sure as hell hear it, and deep down, there's a part of us that wishes you were still in Boston to hear it with us.

Wish you were here,
Matt

Confessions of a music snob

Erin McNamee

Pop music is doomed, and it's not because of greedy record company executives or the death of American radio. It's because of Alanis Morissette.

Okay, I'm exaggerating just a bit, but allow me to elaborate. Back in 1996, Alanis Morissette released the single "Ironic," off her "Jagged Little Pill" album. Besides the unforgivable grammatically incorrect chorus, the song misuses the concept of irony. Irony is, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, "A figure of speech in which the intended meaning is the opposite of that expressed by the words used." So, having "two spoons when all you need is a knife" is nothing more than a mistake, and it's certainly not ironic.

Morissette's innocent misuse of irony spawned a cultural phenomenon. Suddenly coincidences, Murphy's Laws, and plain bad luck were reclassified, in error, as instances of irony. Irony also became an adjective to describe members of our generation. I've heard friends say, "Oh I don't actually like pop music, I just listen to it, ironically." Huh? You either like a type of music or you don't.

I'm sure you've met these irony-obsessed people; they claim (at least until you get a look at the music they have on their computers, iPods, or stored in a giant CD case under their bed) to listen only to music that about five other people have ever heard.

Now, don't get me wrong, I like most indie music. It's just that I have a problem with the kind that's so minimalist I'm not sure you can classify it as music at all. Give me a melody, people, not a bunch of electronic blips and bland chord strumming that goes on and on for hours.

I'm all for discovering new bands and I hate the way pop music has seeped into seemingly every facet of public consciousness, but I'm not cool with those indie lovers who are so pretentious, snobby and elitist that you wish you could slap them across the face every time they make a comment about the fact that you happen to like a song that's currently in the "Top 40."

The horror!

Music snobs have been around as long as music itself, and I'm sure people in the Baroque period debated the merits of Bach over Vivaldi, but recently things have gotten way out of hand. I know people who have lost friends and lovers and are estranged from their parents just because they decided that said friend, lover and/or parent's musical tastes weren't up to snuff.

Apparently diversity doesn't make a music snob's world go 'round.

I'm not entirely innocent from my own accusations, however. Once upon a time I too considered myself to be a music snob. This phase lasted for an entire six months about a year ago. However, once I began fraternizing with people of similar musical tastes, I began to recognize the pure ludicrousness of my cultural leanings.

I wasn't any happier because I had defied the status quo, nor was I any more spiritually fulfilled. I didn't feel like I was doing the right thing by not listening to Justin Timberlake, nor did I feel as if I was contributing in any way to the purification of popular culture. I was making myself miserable by listening to those miserable bands, and I knew it had to stop.

I decided to ban faux-irony from my life by rediscovering the giant CD case left to the mercy of dust bunnies under my bed. I can hardly describe the joy I felt at rediscovering albums by the likes of *NSYNC, U2, Jay-Z, and Missy Elliott.

I felt good again. I didn't give a damn if the music I listened to wasn't necessarily considered "good" by elitist music critics and I certainly didn't care if some of the stuff was hopelessly cheesy. I loved it, and I felt guilty for denying myself that beautiful ear candy even for a mere six months.

Now I consider my music collection to have reached the perfect equilibrium: I only listen to music I enjoy (and the more I can sing along, the better), but I haven't completely banned indie music. I have a good number of albums by those bands that only five or ten people have ever heard of, but I refuse to deny myself the "Top 40" any longer.

You shouldn't either, and please for the love of God stop pretending to be ironic by listening to pop music!

Think about it: you learned the wrong definition of irony from the "Top 40" in the first place. Now that is irony, don't you think?

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

FORMER SORORITY MEMBER DEFENDS HER SISTERS

I am writing in response to Paige Cram's article on "Greek Sisters don't speak for every woman." I am not a member of a sorority; in fact, I am a former member. I feel that comparing a sorority's community service to having a "wet T-shirt contest on your front lawn in order to raise money for a kick-ass Halloween party" is a disgrace to an organization that does a lot to support many causes.

I feel that her analysis on the Sigma Kappa lingerie show for the Everywoman's Center is short-sited. She spent all of her time ridiculing and putting down the sorority instead of focusing on the collaborative partner, the Everywoman's Center.

I personally question the decision of the EWC to participate in a lingerie show to raise money. In addition, Cram states that the EWC has "one goal in mind: to change how this community thinks about women so that things like sexual harassment, rape, domestic abuse and sex discrimination will come to an end." The EWC sponsored this event; why wasn't the EWC critiqued in her article? Why was all the blame placed on Sigma Kappa? Because they are an easy target?

I take issue with the EWC sponsoring such an event. Perhaps, Sigma Kappa shouldn't have participated in this event, either. However, the EWC's mission on our campus is to raise awareness, reframe concepts of body image, educate about sexual violence, etc.

Who at the EWC approved this event? Why haven't they been called to task for initiating and sponsoring an event that Paige describes as a "clear exploitation"?

In the future I hope the EWC has better judgment on the programs in which they participate. I also hope that Sigma Kappa stands up for themselves and let's the community understand their intentions in the matter.

DITCH: ULTRA LOWRISE PANTS
SNAG: FORM FITTING TROUSERS

At the height of super-low-rise-pants mania, you couldn't watch girls sit in a chair, bend over to pick something up, or tie their shoes without getting an unwanted eyeful of crack. Plumber's crack is not, and never will be fashionable. It's time to say goodbye to those phantom breezes across your behind, cluing you in that, once again, you've just exposed your buttocks.

Enter, the "new" trouser. Form fitting trousers have an element of sexiness with curve hugging lines, but leave something to the imagination with a slightly higher waistline. Don't worry; you're not going to be belting your pants up under your ribcage. These pants are low enough to pair with a clingy top for going out, but high enough so that you have the option of actually tucking your shirt in.

DITCH: '80s JEWELRY
SNAG: GLAM RHINESTONES

We all felt that surge of nostalgia when retailers started rolling out jelly bracelets, day-glo earrings, and chunky plastic rings. For most of us, the 80's were the golden years, when the Electric Slide was considered timeless enough to be taught in gym classes and the Coreys (Feldman and Haim) were heartthrobs, not has-been heroin addicts. So we piled on the bangles and jumbo enamel hoops ready to rock out to our copies of Prince's "Purple Rain".

Until, that is, we got to the bar, looked in a mirror, and remembered that shock yellow isn't flattering on anyone.

Thankfully, this fall it's all about rhinestone brooch; drop earrings, and cocktail rings that scream sophisticated and funky at the same time. You always knew there was a reason you coveted all your grandma's costume jewelry when you were nine; everyone looks good in sparkles.

DITCH: TRUCKER HATS
SNAG: SEXY FEDORAS AND CLOCHES

Don't fool yourself into thinking that you looked hot in that trucker hat emblazoned with witty pop-culture references like "Girls Gone Wild"- 'cause you didn't. But it's not too late to save your fashion soul: just back away from the trucker hat, and promise not to let it happen again.

After you and your girlfriends have burned those evil trucker hats in a ritualistic bonfire, pick up a wool fedora with a retro vibe or a fun cloche with grosgrain ribbon trim. These hats will keep your head warm, hide your greasy ponytail on a bad hair day, and make you look utterly glamorous. Bonus points: pin a rhinestone brooch and a feather to the brim for the evening.

Comedian Jimmy Fallon left "Saturday Night Live" somewhat unexpectedly last spring to pursue other endeavors. "Taxi" is his first film since leaving the "Weekend Update" desk, and it is loosely based on the 1998 Luc Besson French film of the same name.

Tim Story, who led the creation of the "Barber Shop" films, also directed "Taxi."

Many critics agree that the French film is far superior. However, the fare for "Taxi" is actually not that bad, but the road gets rather bumpy along the way.

The story centers around the bike messenger Belle (Queen Latifah), who after saving up enough money enters the cabbie business. However, her cab is definitely not the standard automobile. She modifies her taxi so the end result resembles something directly from MTV's "Pimp My Ride." With her souped-up-car, she zips around New York performing crazy stunts with bit of comedy mixed in.

Meanwhile, Officer Washburn (Jimmy Fallon) is a good, wholesome cop with one major downfall: he can't drive whatsoever. When a bank robbery occurs, Washburn is the closest officer to the scene, so he flags down Belle's taxi and gives her permission to go as fast as she wants and break any laws that she needs to. She of course then breaks many and the chase ensues.

The film subsequently follows the hunt for the four Brazilian models responsible for the numerous bank robberies around the city. One of the four models is the pretty Gisele Bundchen, a Victoria's secret model who plays Vanessa. The models do not speak much, and it's obvious their acting skills aren't what brought them to the project.

However, as much as this film may seem like a masculine movie, with cars and chicks, the film does not feel overly manly. This perhaps balances out with Fallon, whose character can best be described as a little dweeb. In addition, the chemistry between Fallon and Latifah is surprisingly good. This odd couple produces many laughs throughout the film. The one-liners hit more than miss.

The funniest scene in the movie involves Washburn's Daewoo compact car, and his attempt to make it out of a parallel parking spot. He ends up bumping the cars in front of and behind him numerous times until Belle takes over and shows him how to do it properly.

Director Tim Story previously did the popular "Barbershop" and is currently involved with the production of the "Fantastic Four." This film however is a typical mediocre comedy that many up-and-coming directors eventually end up having in their repertoire.

The film is not meant to be groundbreaking cinema in any way. The plot has been done before and the characters are stereotyped, but in the end, it is fairly enjoyable. Viewing this film with low expectations in mind, this film is in fact surprisingly good. The jokes are funny providing extended laughs. Latifah and Fallon, as a team, produce an adventurous romp around New York with decent car stunts and some honest humor. The ride is ultimately worth the fare.

Nirvana and Cobain remembered with a new box set

By Bill Donovan

This upcoming holiday season, Nirvana will finally release the box set titled, "With The Lights Out" on Universal Records. The three-disc collection will be released on Nov. 23 and will feature over 40 unreleased tracks. It will also contain a DVD of the first live performance by the band in 1987, as well as a 60-page booklet.

"It's a win-win situation for the band and for fans," said Nirvana bassist Kurt Novoselic in an Aug. 2002 Rolling Stone interview. "The music will finally come out."

Nirvana was one of the alternative rock bands that gained major mainstream attention in the early-nineties with their hit song "Smells Like Teen Spirit." According to the Web site for Rolling Stone magazine, the band knocked Michael Jackson's "Dangerous" album off of its number one spot on Billboard Charts in Feb. 1992.

Led by lead singer and guitarist Kurt Cobain, the group's distorted music spoke of feelings of alienation, teenage angst and rebellion. The seminal band opened the doors to other nineties rock bands such as Smashing Pumpkins, Pearl Jam, Alice in Chains, and Soundgarden.

Unfortunately, Nirvana came to a crashing halt when Cobain took his own life in 1994.

Fortunately, the remaining band mates Krist Novoselic and Dave Grohl sought to put out a boxed set of unreleased songs and rarities in 2001. "With The Lights Out" would have been released to fans on the tenth-anniversary of the Nirvana's breakthrough album "Nevermind." However, Cobain's widow Courtney Love took the band to court and pursued a legal battle. In return, Novoselic and Grohl counter-sued Ms. Love.

Love claimed that she did not want "You Know You're Right," the last song Nirvana recorded while her husband was alive, to be put out as part of a box set.

Eventually, Love and the remaining band mates made a settlement and the song was released on a greatest hits collection titled "Nirvana" in Oct. 2002.

A variety of tracks are promised to Nirvana fans with the set's release in November. Bassist Novoselic stated in a 2002 Rolling Stone interview that the collection will include material from, "KAOS radio 1987, BBC Peel Sessions, studio outtakes, sessions that we did in north Seattle, Rio de Janeiro, 'In Utero' outttakes, and live stuff." Studio demos, jams and rare B-sides also will appear on the collection.

"With The Lights Out's" DVD will include footage of Nirvana playing early in their career at a Raymond, Wash. house party in 1987. The web site www.nirvanaguide.com states that tracks from the band's first album "Bleach" were performed, such as "Downer," as well as Led Zeppelin covers "Heartbreaker" and "How Many More Times."

Since his suicide in 1994, many of Kurt Cobain's songs recorded with Nirvana, have been stored. Forty previously unreleased songs are se to be released as a part of a box set.

DITCH: UGG BOOTS
SNAG: FRYE CAMPUS BOOTS

No doubt, UGG boots are completely comfortable and indisputably warm. However, now that they're not sold out and the coveted brand has started making purple boots, clogs, and (gasp!) purses, the allure of the UGG boot is substantially diminished. Besides, as soon as Payless starts making knockoffs, you know the trend is on its way out. So pack up your UGGs, but don't throw them out. These will definitely make a comeback and you'll be glad you tucked them away.

Instead, this Fall, invest in another boot staple: the Frye campus boot. Frye boots have been popular since the 1800's for their durability and style. Kate Moss and Sarah Jessica Parker have been seen wearing the classic boot. Pair them with a denim mini skirt, wooly tights, and a chunky sweater for that Ally McGraw circa "Love Story" look. Plus, like UGGs, when they become too trendy, you can pack them up and break them out a few years later.

DITCH: POINTY-TOED HEELS
SNAG: '40s INSPIRED PUMPS

If you own more than one pair of impossibly high and impossibly pointy heels, it's time to rethink your footwear. Not only are pointy-toed heels falling from fashion, they are especially bad for your feet. While all high heels can damage your feet, podiatrists point the finger at pointy heels as being particularly bad offenders. Get rid of all of them except for a pair of basic black, and welcome the return of round-toed pumps.

Fall shoe collections are filled with 40's inspired round-toed pumps, with demure ankle straps and accents of faux lizard skin and suede. In rich fall colors like hunter green and deep purple, these heels look great peeking out from under a pair of pressed trousers or paired with patterned stockings and a tweed skirt. And, while you might not be able to save your knees from the irreparable damage of wearing high heels, you can save your toes from being squashed and look stunningly hip at the same time.

Jazz greats spice up Northampton

Cancel your plans: the Pioneer Valley has appropriated a tantalizing weekend of eclectic, abstract jazz sounds for your listening pleasure.

Well, not just your listening pleasure. Bring your friends; otherwise, they won't believe you when you tell them about the impressive compositions, thrilling improvisations and virtuous musicians you came into contact with over the course of two extraordinary nights.

This evening, the quirky Jazz Passengers invade Northampton's Calvin Theatre (their performance begins at 8 p.m.; tickets are $15). The brainchild of musicians Roy Nathanson (reeds) and Curtis Fowlkes (trombone), this seventeen-year old ensemble was mobilized with the intent of injecting some humor into a notoriously serious genre (even their name is a parody: legendary jazz drummer Art Blakey manned a collective known as the Jazz Messengers).

With the help of likeminded musicians (percussionist E.J. Rodriguez, bassist Brad Jones, vibist Bill Ware and avant-guitarist Marc Ribot) and big name collaborators (Blondie's, Debbie Harry and the late Jeff Buckley), they made their "funny jazz" dream a reality.

At the Calvin, the Passengers will tickle both your funny bone and your ears when they perform an original soundtrack, replete with original dialogue, to celebrated b-movie, "Creature from the Black Lagoon." Rolling Stone Magazine has referred to their prank as, "an absurdist mix of jazz and musical comedy": the Passengers hand out 3-D glasses, turn off the film's sound, and go to work. Don't Miss it.

The Jazz Mandolin Project has fused many influences in their music. They are shown here in a 1998 performance in Terra Alta W. Va.

And don't miss the Jazz Mandolin Project's gig at the Iron Horse Music Hall on Saturday night. These cats never disappoint; plus, on their website, they list the Iron Horse as "one of our old favorites."

In 1993, UVM alum Jamie Masefield put together a monthly jazz gig that would focus on his forward-thinking mandolin tactics. Over ten years and five albums later, Masefield's "project" has toured the world and welcomed guests the caliber of Phish's Jon Fishman and pianist Gil Goldstein (Fishman has toured intermittently with the Project since 1998).

As of late, the quartet's revolving cast of characters include bassist Scott Ritchie, Michael "Mad Dog" Mavridoglou on trumpet and keys, and gifted drummer Dan Weiss, who recently returned from India.

And these guys don't mess around; their music is a highly intelligent, albeit rump-shaking melange of varying influences and musical philosophies. Their groove draws from places as seemingly disconnected as bluegrass, bebop, Miles Davis' electric period, Indian classical music and rock (just wait until you hear their Led Zeppelin medley).

And the combination of all these ideas and styles has forged a sound unique to the Jazz Mandolin Project; when you're fluent in so many genres of music, the possibilities are infinite. The show begins at 10 p.m.; tickets are $12.50 in advance and $15 at the door.

Folk pioneer visits Pearl Street

By Peter Blandino
Collegian Correspondent

This Saturday night the Iron Horse will host a legendary and world-renowned folk musician: Odetta. Celebrating 50 years of remarkable performance, Odetta is one of the most significant artists of our era, and arguably the most influential African-American female voice of the 20th century.

While growing up in L.A., Odetta trained for a career in classical music and opera. However, in San Francisco she discovered the folk and blues tradition featured at a bay area coffeehouse. After a short stint in San Francisco, she moved her act to the east coast. The rest, as they say, is history.

Odetta vocally thrusts an astounding depth of emotion into her repertoire of folk and blues songs. Arriving in New York City in the latter part of the 1950s, she sent waves of vibrancy through the folk community centered in Greenwich Village. Her performances at such venues as the Blue Angel and Newport Folk Festival inspired a host of young artists, for example Joan Baez, Janis Joplin, and Bob Dylan.

Dylan, when interviewed in the sixties reflected on the magnitude of his first impression. "I was 12. I was mad about Elvis Presley, Chuck Berry, Buddy Holly and I played rock. And then one day I heard a record by Odetta, and everything changed." The young Dylan then traded in his electric guitar for a Gibson acoustic and learned many of the songs included on her first album. "Odetta Sings Ballads and Blues" was released in 1956, including such tracks as "Jack O' Diamonds", and "Muleskinner Blues."

In 2002, forty-six prolific years later, Odetta released "Looking for a Home", a tribute to the incomparable Leadbelly. Odetta's interpretations of Leadbelly's songs received rave reviews, resulting in nominations for two W.C. Handy awards for Best Traditional Blues Album, and Best Female Blues Artist. Her performances are deeply rooted in a great and distinctly American tradition. Her voice is rich with soul and grace.

It is this combination that is non-existent on the music scene today. Sometimes you must look to the past to find something truly worthwhile, and Odetta is such a performer that transcends the boundaries of time.

Today, Odetta's performances are as forceful as ever. In North Hampton on Saturday night, she will play for her favorite audience; college students. She feels that the generation of "T.V babies" and "rock concert devotees" needs a little listening development. She says, "If they are not responsive, I tease them and ask if they have ever been with a nonresponsive lover. I'm up here making love to you and it's no fun if you don't respond." But for audiences of all ages and tastes, this is a chance to witness a top notch concert of great American folk and blues songs that sadly are fading to the periphery of our society's consciousness. It is chance you do not want to miss - a rare chance that might not come around again.

Red Sox must make comeback without ace

Schilling's injury will cause him to miss scheduled start

By Jimmy Golens
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – Curt Schilling will miss a start for the first time all season – and just when the Red Sox need him most.

The Boston ace was scratched from his scheduled start in Game 5 of the AL Championship Series against the New York Yankees because of an injured ankle that was too sore to test on Thursday. Manager Terry Francona wouldn't rule Schilling out for a later start – if the Red Sox make it that far.

"If I can't pitch without altering my mechanics, then we're going to have to win a World Series without me," Schilling said in a call to a local sports talk radio station. "It's doable, and if you're a world champion club you're going to find a way. And I believe we are, and I believe we will."

Francona penciled Derek Lowe in for the fifth game on Sunday – unless the schedule is pushed back by rain forecast for Game 3 on Friday night. The Yankees lead the Red Sox 2-0 in the best-of-seven series.

"We need to get to Game 5," Francona said, "but, yeah, it's Derek."

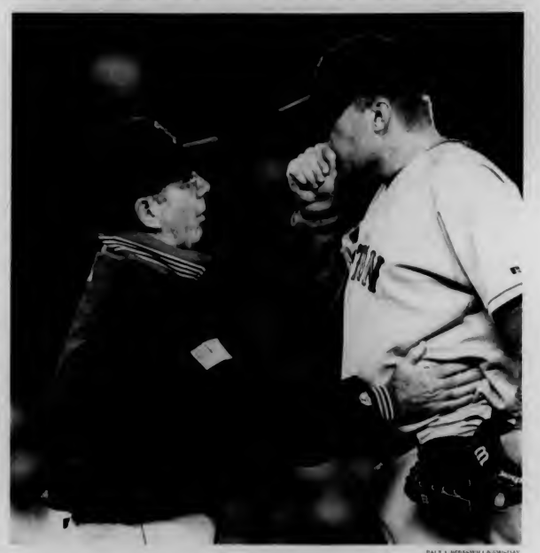
Schilling led the major leagues with 21 wins, and he was second in the AL in ERA and third in strikeouts. But he lasted just three innings and 58 pitches while allowing six runs in Boston's 10-7 loss in Tuesday night's opener; it was his poorest postseason performance since 1993.

Schilling said he had trouble with his balance and pushing off the pitching rubber, which cut down on his pitch speed. He failed to work out Thursday and left Fenway Park without commenting, but he called WEEI-AM to say the injury occurred in his regular-season finale and not in his playoff start against Anaheim.

Red Sox team physician Bill Morgan said the sheath that covers two tendons in Schilling's right ankle is torn, allowing one of the tendons to slip out of its groove and rub against a bone. Schilling wasn't uncomfortable while pitching Tuesday because he was injected with a painkiller.

He was expected to be fitted for a brace that would stabilize the ankle. He was planning to test it on Thursday during the team's off-day workout, but he was still too sore to try.

"It's not over. He's going to continue to try to prepare," Francona said. "But as far as Sunday goes, he's not starting."



Schilling has more than pride at stake. If Boston wins the World Series, it's worth $15 million to him: a $2 million raise for next season, and his 2007 salary of $13 million becomes guaranteed.

With Schilling out, the Red Sox have scheduled Bronson Arroyo, Tim Wakefield and Lowe for Games 3-5. If Friday night's game is rained out, the Red Sox probably would bring back Pedro Martinez for a Game 5 on Monday on his normal rest; that would allow him to pitch at Fenway Park instead of Yankee Stadium.

"This team wasn't built around one player. We're fine," Boston first baseman Kevin Millar said. "This is where heroes are made."

Without Schilling, the Red Sox would be deprived of the pitching combination they hoped would end the Yankees' AL dominance. Boston has finished second to New York a record seven consecutive years in the AL East, earning a wild-card bid in 1999 and 2003 before losing to the Yankees each time.

Last year, the Red Sox were five outs from the World Series before Martinez tired, manager Grady Little failed to take him out and the Yankees rallied to send the game into extra innings. New York won on Aaron Boone's 11th-inning homer off Wakefield.

NFL forces Plummer to lose Tillman decal

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

The National Football League wanted to package its tribute to Pat Tillman much the same way it's planning the next halftime show at the Super Bowl: nice, neat and orderly, with no surprises.

Jake Plummer had some other ideas on how to remember his friend and former Arizona Cardinals teammate. He wanted to take it a bit further, with a personal tribute of his own.

It wasn't much, just a No. 40 decal that would remind Plummer of Tillman every time he put on his helmet. Compared to the ultimate sacrifice Tillman made for his country, it almost seemed too little.

Not to the NFL, though. The way the league reacted, you'd think Plummer was trying to put a picture of Janet Jackson's breast on his helmet.

In its infinite arrogance, the NFL threatened to fine Plummer thousands of dollars if he kept wearing the decal, which he has been doing since the exhibition season. Plummer relented, taking the No. 40 off for two weeks.

Rules are rules, after all, and the NFL is a stickler for enforcing its idea of what is appropriate on a uniform. Besides the league already honored Tillman by having all players wear the No. 40 decal in the second game of the season.

The more Plummer thought about it, though, the worse he felt.

Last Sunday, when Plummer and the Denver Broncos played the Carolina Panthers, the decal was back on. Plummer wasn't going to give up the fight, and he agreed to accept whatever fine was levied and urged fans to donate to the Pat Tillman Foundation.

Suddenly, the issue wasn't so simple anymore. After all, this wasn't Peyton Manning wanting to wear hightop shoes to honor Johnny Unitas. This wasn't Jim McMahon wearing "Rozelle" on his headband to poke fun at the former NFL commissioner.

This was a football player with a simple desire to honor a fellow player who died in the line of duty for his country.

Terrell Owens can pull out a Sharpie and autograph a football or do situps in the end zone after a touchdown without getting fined. But Plummer can't wear a small No. 40 decal in honor of a war hero?

This was one battle the NFL wasn't going to win in the court of public opinion.

Politicians, who know a hot issue when they see one, jumped right in. Arizona Sen. John McCain sent a letter to commissioner Paul Tagliabue sharply rebuking the league's stance.

"Pat Tillman left this world as a protector of our freedoms, the same freedoms that your league enjoys each Sunday," McCain wrote. "He died so that we as Americans can enjoy our way of life and express ourselves in the way that Jake Plummer now seeks to express himself."

He wasn't the only one who felt that way. Americans, after all, grow up learning to respect those who fought – and those who died fighting – for their country.

Sure, the league had already honored the former Cardinals safety. But what was wrong with Plummer wanting to keep alive the memory of a special man who left behind the riches of pro football to fight in the war against terror?

Give the NFL some credit. It didn't take long for it to see which way the wind was blowing, and on Wednesday, there was a compromise that seemed to make everyone happy.

Plummer gave up his decal and, in exchange, the Broncos will put up a big No. 40 logo near the play clock on the north end of the stadium. The team will also run ads on the scoreboard during games to promote the Tillman Foundation.

The NFL agreed not to fine Plummer, and will allow him to tape public-service announcements honoring Tillman that will be played in stadiums nationwide on the weekend after Veteran's Day. It will also contribute $250,000 to a USO center in Afghanistan to be named after Tillman.

"I wish I could still wear it," Plummer said, "but it doesn't stop me from honoring and remembering Pat Tillman as a dear friend, and a close teammate and a guy that I think everyone should look up to as a hero."

No more Nomar is cause for no worries

By Karen Testa
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – For years, he was the face of the Boston Red Sox, a star shortstop, a favorite of old ladies and children who barely had shoulders wide enough to fit the name "Garciaparra" on the back of their T-shirts.

Yet the Sox sent two-time batting champion Nomar Garciaparra packing to Chicago on July 31 – and suddenly something clicked. The Nomar-less Red Sox earned the best record in baseball for the rest of the season. And the giant shoes he left to fill didn't feel so empty.

Now, as Boston battles New York for a spot in the World Series, "Nomah" seems a distant memory.

"I think it's more about the team doing well. We forgot about him," said Jeff Swartz, manager of The Souvenir Store outside Fenway Park, which still has a few No. 5 Garciaparra shirts on display in the children's section.

"It was a bad marriage toward the end," Swartz said. "He didn't seem like he wanted to be here."

Garciaparra's ultimate departure may have been abrupt, but the build-up had lasted for months. The Red Sox used him in the offseason as trade bait to try to land a bigger fish. Alex Rodriguez, who wound up signing with the Yankees, and it was clear feelings were hurt.

Then, Garciaparra injured his Achilles' tendon in spring training, and his recovery left him sidelined for 57 games from late March until June. He returned, but as the July 31 trade deadline approached, uncertainty took its toll on fans and in the clubhouse, as players didn't know who would be staying or going.

"He was still Nomar, but you could almost see the end coming," said Derek Lowe, who was also the subject of trade rumors. In a four-team trade, the Sox strengthened their defense by acquiring Gold Glove winners Orlando Cabrera from Montreal and Doug Mientkiewicz from Minnesota and outfielder Doug Roberts from Los Angeles.

From the day after Garciaparra left until the end of the regular season, the Red Sox went 42-18 for the best finish in baseball.

"People say, 'Look, he must have been a negative influence,' which he wasn't," Lowe said. "I just think we didn't play well as a whole."

No matter what put the team into sync, it appeared to be enough to heal the broken hearts of most Garciaparra fans. Even six-year-old Noah Rochefort of Middletown, R.I., who still has a Garciaparra light switch in his room.

"He was upset at first," said Noah's father, Charlie, as he shopped for Red Sox souvenirs Thursday. "For about three weeks, the Cubs were his favorite team. Then they were about even. Now he's back to the Red Sox."

It probably didn't hurt that Noah got to stay up well after his bedtime and saw, in person, Cabrera hit a walk-off home run in the bottom of the 12th inning to defeat Baltimore.

"Cabrera really stepped up and filled the spot and played the way Nomar used to play, if not better," Charlie Rochefort said.

Outfielder Gabe Kapler said Boston fans know when to move on, and embrace any player as long as he's wearing a Red Sox uniform, particularly those who are playing well.

"Who knows what they would feel like if Orlando had come in and hadn't done a bang-up job right away," Kapler said. "The great thing is he did and everybody's happy."

Roberts said Red Sox fans are smart enough to know a good deal, even if that means losing a future Hall of Fame player.

"The thing is they got three guys in myself, Doug and Orlando who play hard every day. They see that," Roberts said. "As hard as it is for them to get over Nomar, I think they still embrace us."

Still, Yankees shortstop Derek Jeter said it takes some getting used to playing a Red Sox team without Garciaparra.

"It's kind of weird to look and see someone else playing short," Jeter said. "That's the first name that comes to mind whenever anyone says the Boston Red Sox. He was the face of the team, and now he's not there."

Rodriguez, whose trade may have ultimately had a hand in Garciaparra's departure from Boston, would not say if the Red Sox were a better team with or without him.

"I love Nomar a lot," he said. "I'm glad he's not over there. The guy's a dangerous guy."

Paul J. Bereswill/Newsday

Nomar Garciaparra walks back to the dugout after striking out earlier this season while he was still with the Red Sox. Nomar, along with the rest of the Chicago Cubs, is at home watching the Sox in the playoffs now.

Struggling Damon shoulders the blame

we've had on him since we shut him down," manager Joe Torre said.

HOME SWEET HOME

Mariano Rivera will stay with the New York Yankees for the rest of the ALCS, though he wishes he had enough time to return to Panama on off days to comfort his grieving family.

Rivera returned home to Panama on Sunday after two relatives were electrocuted in his swimming pool. He attended the funeral Tuesday then jetted back to New York in time to earn a four-out save in Game 1 against Boston. The trip to Yankee Stadium took about six hours.

The All-Star reliever said the warm reception he got from teammates and fans has been a comfort.

"This is home. This is family. My brothers, my father, you know, Joe (Torre). The fans – yesterday was special. I heard it before, but yesterday was special."

He got four outs for another save Wednesday night, extending his postseason record to 32. It was his 10th LCS save, one shy of the record held by Dennis Eckersley.

"Postseason – that says everything," Rivera said. "There are only four teams here and a lot of players are home. Every time I'm in the postseason, I just try to do the best I can."

BAD OMEN

Boston will have to end a dubious 19-year-old streak if it hopes to come back from it 2-0 series deficit against New York.

Teams that have fallen behind 2-0 in league championship series have lost 15 straight series since St. Louis rallied against Los Angeles and Kansas City came back against Toronto – both in 1985.

The Red Sox have dropped the first two games in three playoff series – 1999 ALCS, 1990 ALCS and 1988 ALCS – and have won just one of the subsequent seven games played in those series combined.

Johnny Damon watches a home run sale out of Fenway against the Yankees in September. Damon, who is 0-8 at the plate in the ALCS, has taken the blame for the team's current situation against New York.

One issue for the Maroon and White will be injuries in this weekend's games. Over the past few weeks, the Minutemen have been running a more conservative midfield for ball retention. Due to a few undisclosed injuries, Koch will be playing several players out of position.

For a team showcasing a slew of freshmen and sophomores in the starting lineup, Koch is concerned with getting everyone on the same page.

"We have players playing in different positions at times and it's about them understanding what their roles are when they are there," Koch said. "It's just an overall learning process when we have young players and not everybody understands every role on the field."

Last season, both Dayton and Xavier were nationally ranked when they played the Minutemen, with Dayton ranked No. 18 and Xavier at No. 11. UMass had a similar two-game weekend series, except last year it was on the road.

The Minutemen dropped both games to the Musketeers and the Flyers, 3-1 and 3-2 respectively.

"Dayton is always a good team and Xavier beat us handily at their place so we're going against two very good teams," Koch said. "It doesn't matter what they're ranked, it matters how they play on the day, and I'm sure they are going to be ready to play."

The Flyers are currently one of the best teams in the A-10 and showcase an offense that can attack from any angle.

Dayton has seven players with goals this year, including Tye Stebbins and George Nanchoff, who have 24 points between them. Stebbins has been the main target for the Flyers, leading the team with six goals.

"Dayton is a very good attacking team, and you have to be aware of what they can do going forward." Koch said. "They've got a big target player [Stebbins] and they play off him very well, so we'll try to neutralize him."

Koch is also concerned with Chris Rolfe, who is a solid midfielder coming off the bench. Rolfe has two goals and an assist in only three starts for Dayton and brings a new dimension to an already intimidating midfield.

One weakness that Koch has noticed is Dayton's defense. The Flyers have done well this year but have actually been outscored by their opponents 18-to-17. Apparently, the defense comes out strong and fizzles later, as 11 of the 18 goals were scored in the second half.

"They are solid in the back, but it's definitely somewhere that I think we can beat them," Koch said.

Another plus for the Minutemen has been Dayton's track record on the road this year where the Flyers have gone 1-4.

Xavier is another team that likes to spread the ball around with eight players scoring goals this year. The centerpiece of the Musketeer offense has been Nick Frasher who has four goals and two assists on the season.

The Xavier defense is another that UMass will look to take advantage of. Over the 2004 campaign, the Musketeers have let up 24 goals while only scoring 19.

The most impressive showing has been from their goalkeeping tandem of Tyler Helmle and captain Brian Schaeper, who have a cumulative 1.95 goals against average.

With Schilling on the shelf, Pedro offers to step up in relief

By Dennis Waszak Jr.
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – Pedro Martinez could be back on the mound for the Boston Red Sox sooner than the New York Yankees expected.

After throwing 113 pitches in a 3-1 loss in Game 2 on Wednesday night, Martinez said he'd be willing to pitch on short rest if Curt Schilling can't make his Game 5 start Sunday.

Schilling, who led the majors with 21 wins, might not be able to pitch and needs surgery on his injured right ankle. He lasted just three innings and allowed six runs in Boston's 10-7 loss Tuesday night in the series opener.

"I just see the need in my team and if it's up to me, I will pitch on short rest to pick up Schill," Martinez said. "He's done it all year for us and if he has to go down, I'll stand up, and I'll pitch on short rest and I'll go to the bullpen. I'll do anything to try to get a win."

Martinez allowed three runs and four hits in six innings in Game 2, falling to 0-2 with a 5.31 ERA in his last three playoff starts against the Yankees. The Red Sox had him on a pitch count – even though he said he could've gone deeper into the game.

"The uncertainty, I think, about Schill probably pushed them a little bit more to actually not push me too far," he said. "And I understand that, and you know, I just have to let it go. I did whatever possible while I was out there and if it didn't work, it didn't work."

Another candidate to take Schilling's start if he can't go is Derek Lowe. The right-hander was the forgotten man in Boston's playoff rotation and relegated to the bullpen after a number of shaky outings down the stretch. He's thrown just 12 pitches in two weeks.

"You don't want to get it by default," said Lowe, who went 14-12 in the regular season and came out of the bullpen to win the series-clincher against Anaheim last Friday.

STAND-UP GUY

Johnny Damon stood at his locker in the visitors' clubhouse and shouldered the blame for the Red Sox's two-game deficit in the ALCS.

"I'll take responsibility for this," Damon said after the Red Sox lost 3-1 to the Yankees on Wednesday night.

The shaggy-haired outfielder is 0-for-8 with five strikeouts in the series.

"I'm the catalyst of this team," he said. "I'm the guy on this team that gets us going, gets on base and creates some havoc, but I haven't been able to do that."

Damon entered 2-for-15 lifetime against Yankees starter Jon Lieber, and went 0-for-3 against him Wednesday night – including a fly-out to center that capped a 16-pitch at-bat.

"I finally had one good at-bat, but I feel like there are better at-bats to come," he said.

STILL WAITING

Orlando Hernandez threw 40 pitches in a bullpen session Wednesday and is hoping to be available to start for the Yankees in Game 4 on Saturday at Boston.

"I'm feeling good," Hernandez said. "I'm waiting for tomorrow because you never know."

El Duque hasn't pitched since Oct. 1 because of a tired shoulder, but threw 60 pitches in the bullpen Monday and felt fine. After his session Wednesday, Hernandez said it's the best he's felt in a while.

Minutewomen hit the road for A-10 games

Tina Rodriguez dribbles the ball downfield during action against Holy Cross. The Minutewomen will play two games in Ohio this weekend.

The Massachusetts women's soccer team will travel to Ohio this weekend to take on two of the top teams in the Atlantic-10. The Minutewomen travel to Dayton on Friday to take on the nationally ranked Flyers and conclude the weekend with a match against the Xavier Musketeers on Sunday.

The marquee match-up of the weekend doubleheader is certainly Dayton. The Fliers are riding a 12-game winning streak and are ranked No. 30 in the nation. Dayton sits atop the conference standings, sporting a perfect 5-0 record in league play. The only loss for Dayton (12-1 overall) came at the hands of No. 23 Florida in the first game of the season.

While more attention may be paid to this clash, UMass coach Jim Rudy understands that the Sunday contest against Xavier (4-9, 3-2 A-10) counts just the same in the standings for the Minutewomen.

"If we could get two wins this weekend, that would be unbelievable," Rudy said. "If we get a win and a draw, that would still be great. But the minimum is we need to come back with three points. We have to get a win out of this."

Rudy acknowledges that winning at Dayton will not be an easy task as the Flyers rarely lose at home in front of a vocal crowd. His focus is for his team to come out ready to play in both games.

"We just have to show up and play," Rudy said. "I want our young team to keep making progress and to be competitive in both games. And hopefully we can pinch out some points."

The fact that Rudy is even talking about picking up points in order to qualify for postseason play shows how much things have turned around this season for UMass.

Just a few weeks ago, the Minutewomen were in search of their first win after starting 0-5, but they have gone 4-2 since then and put themselves back into the A-10 playoff picture.

UMass (4-7, 2-3 A-10) is in the thick of the postseason race with six conference games remaining and is coming off of a crucial win on Sunday.

After losing to Richmond last Friday, UMass was in need of a win against George Washington to ensure a winning record on its five-game home stand.

The Maroon and White blanked GW 2-0 thanks to the stellar goalkeeping of sophomore Kristin Walker. The shutout was the first of Walker's career and the first for UMass in almost two years.

Walker, who did not see any action during her freshman year, became the second consecutive player for UMass to be named A-10 Rookie of the Week after Britt Canfield received the honor a week before.

"We're really happy for her," Rudy said. "She's a young player who's learning on the job."

UMass will need Walker and the rest of her teammates to be in top form to slow Dayton's attack.

The Flyers feature four players on the preseason All-Conference first-team led by senior midfielder Tesia Kozlowski and junior defender Jen Simonetti.

Dayton also boasts a freshmen class that rivals UMass' stellar crew of rookies. The best of the bunch for Dayton is defender Courtney Sirmans who was named to the Soccer America Team of the Week in September.

Xavier currently resides in fourth place in the league standings and will try to keep UMass from gaining any ground. The Musketeers are led by sophomore forward Amber Silvis, an A-10 All-Rookie Team selection last year.

Dayton's win streak reaches 12

Bonnies Struggle Despite MacDougal's Best Efforts

Going into Oct. 10, St. Bonaventure had been winless in the conference schedule despite star forward Heather MacDougal's best efforts. Thanks to her goal in the 105th minute, her second of the game, the Bonnies prevailed for their first Atlantic 10 win of the season. MacDougal also tallied a goal on Oct. 8 in a 3-2 loss to Fordham. Her achievements earned her Atlantic 10 Player of the Week for the second time this season. MacDougal leads the A-10 in almost every major offensive category, including goals (14) and points (31).

Not To Be Out Done

Senior midfielder Beth Purcell of Fordham split the A-10 Player of the Week honor with MacDougal. Purcell scored three goals and racked up seven points this week in wins against St. Bonaventure (3-2) and Duquesne (3-1). Purcell assisted in the game-winning goal against SBU, and her two goals against Duquesne gave her five goals for the season. She also has 14 points on the season, a team high.

George Washington Shutout

Lincoln Park, New Jersey's own Kristen Walker helped the Minutewomen prevail over George Washington on Oct. 10 in a 2-0 victory. Walker had seven saves, and her performance was the first shutout victory the Minutewomen had recorded since Oct. 27, 2002, when they beat St. Joseph's 3-0. She also registered four saves in a UMass loss to Richmond. Her performance this week earned her Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors. She has 50 saves on the season.

12 and Counting

Dayton has run its winning streak to 12 games, with a double-overtime win at Saint Joseph's on Oct. 8, and a shutout at Temple on Oct. 10. Senior goalie Stacy DeLuca recorded her sixth and seventh shutouts of the season in these two games. Dayton's only loss of the season came to Florida in the team's first game of the year. Dayton sits atop the Atlantic 10 with a 12-1 overall record and a 5-0 conference record.

Golden opportunity

Massachusetts takes on Minnesota at Nye Frontier Classic in Alaska

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

After last years stellar season, replete with an cast of overachieving players, the Massachusetts hockey team (1-0-0) opened its 2004 campaign with yet another high note in a 6-4 victory over Clarkson at the Mullins Center last Saturday night.

What is their reward? The Minutemen get to fly across a good portion of North America to take on Minnesota, winners of two of the last three national championships, in the first round of the Nye Frontier Classic in Anchorage, Alaska.

It will be a tall task for this young squad of Minutemen, who finished the first leg of the 9,102-mile round-trip when they landed at 7 p.m. EST on Wednesday night.

This is the first time that the University of Massachusetts team has traveled to Alaska since 1994 when it lost twice to Alaska-Fairbanks in back-to-back games. The first game against Minnesota is scheduled for 9 p.m. EST tonight, and UMass will take on Alaska-Anchorage, the tournament's host school, or Canisius tomorrow night. The consolation game is scheduled for 8 p.m. EST, and the championship game is set to begin at 11 p.m. EST.

Tonight will be the first time ever that the Minutemen and Golden Gophers have squared off. Minnesota, which is returning 61 percent of its offense from last season, is currently ranked No. 5 in the country.

If history holds true, the Minutemen don't have much going in their favor, since they have an all-time record of 17-101-10 against ranked opponents.

The Gophers (1-0-0) have already knocked off defending national champion Denver 5-2 in the U.S. Hockey Hall of Fame game, and Ryan Potulny recorded his first career hat trick in the game making him the only player on the Minnesota roster to have a hat trick on his resume.

This will mark the 16th consecutive year that the Golden Gophers have competed in an in-season tournament, not including the postseason.

Prior to the team's 4-0 loss to Maine in last year's Maverick Stampede, the Maroon and Gold hadn't lost an in-season tournament game since 1999 against Ohio State at the Mariucci Classic. The Gophers are 11-1 under head coach Don Lucia in all in-season tournaments heading into tonight.

UMass began its season on a perfect note in its win over Clarkson. Redshirt sophomore Matt Anderson, who missed all of last year with a shoulder injury, scored three goals and had two assists in the game. It was the first hat trick for a Massachusetts player since Thomas Pock tallied one on Jan. 5, 2001.

It was only the second time a UMass player had scored five points in a season opener. Tim Turner scored twice and notched three assists in a 9-6 loss at Wisconsin on Oct. 6, 2000.

Anderson was named Player of the Week by Inside College Hockey and by Hockey East for his performance.

Junior Stephen Werner also had a great opening night with a goal and three assists.

UMass will be relying heavily on these two leaders to have a big year since the Minutemen are one of only five teams (Quinnipiac, St. Cloud State, Wisconsin, Notre Dame) in the entire country that had a winning record last year and aren't returning a 30-point scorer this year.

That is because four of the Maroon and White's top nine scorers from last year's squad (Pock, Nick Kuiper, Mike Warner, Greg Mauldin) are no longer with the team. Pock, Warner and Mauldin have all moved onto bigger things in the NHL. The quartet accounted for 43 goals and 49 assists for 92 points last season, or 36.9 percent of last season's total scoring.

An interesting story line to watch this weekend will be the amount of penalties that are called against the teams. The NCAA wants its officials to crack down seriously on holding and clutching and grabbing calls to open up the ice for the faster skaters. All across the country, the penalties have been up, and the pace and rhythm of the games have slowed tremendously.

UMass and Clarkson were each whistled 14 times on Saturday for a total of 28 penalties while Minnesota and Denver combined for 25 penalties last week.

The Minutemen were 4-12 on the power play and killed off 10 of the 13 Clarkson power plays. The four goals were the most power play goals a UMass team has scored since the 1995 squad tallied five in a game against Army.

Minnesota only converted one of its six power play opportunities, but the Gophers killed nine out of Denver's 10 chances with an extra skater.

If this trend continues, special teams will play the major role in the tournament this weekend.

UMass cross-country squads head to Albany

By Eric Athas and Martha Powers
Collegian Correspondents

So far this season, the Massachusetts women's cross-country team has faced a plethora of challenging teams week after week. Tomorrow's meet at the Albany Invitational in Albany, New York will add to that pattern. Teams like New Hampshire, Binghamton, Connecticut and Syracuse are all schools that gave the University of Massachusetts trouble in the past and will be tough to beat this time around.

"When we ran against Syracuse in September, we had them beaten," coach Julie LaFreniere said. "We had some key changes and lost to them by a few points, but it proves that we are close to Syracuse and have the ability to beat them."

The Albany Invitational is a fairly large meet, consisting of 26 teams and 270 women runners. Like the New England Championships last Friday, the Albany Invitational is made up of teams from all divisions, including division III Middlebury College, which is a threat, even at its low division level.

Against these strong opponents, LaFreniere and the team will depend on their usual top runners to perform as they have all season. Freshman Christina Derosa, who received Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Week honors last week, will be the number one runner once again for UMass. Derosa finished 25th out of 300 runners last week and has finished first among UMass runners in all of the meets this year. Seniors Alexis Anzelone and Amanda Dahlberg have been the leaders this season as well as consistent runners for UMass. Along with Derosa, the other freshman standout is Cuisle Kierans, who has been a reliable second and third runner for the team. Kara Gillette, Tricia Silva and Ashely Davidson will all be factors in helping UMass against the top-ranked teams tomorrow.

During the previous week, the team continued with its fast-paced, rigorous practices to prepare for these opposing schools. Along with the usual 6 a.m. practices twice a week, LaFreniere has been stressing the importance of running fast in practice to train for the meets. She feels the team has done a good job adapting to the fast practices but understands that there is always room for improvement.

"They have all been working hard during this week's practices, and we're trying to practice straight through this upcoming meet," LaFreniere said. "I have a sense that they're a little flat from New England's and didn't fully recover from that meet. I am pleased but just looking for a little more."

Thus far, UMass has finished seventh, first, second and 11th place in their first four meets, respectively. Facing top-ranked teams, UMass will have to carry out a top-level performance. LaFreniere will look to guide her team to another successful meet tomorrow at 1 p.m. in Albany.

The Massachusetts men's cross-country team will travel to New York to compete in the 38th Annual Albany Invitational tomorrow, too.

"This meet is not as big or competitive as our last meet," coach Ken O'Brien said. The five-mile race will consist of 29 teams from New England and New York.

The Albany men will attempt to win the race for the second straight year. Last year, the Minutemen finished sixth, finishing behind Albany, New Hampshire, Marist, NYU and Syracuse.

The Minutemen will try to get their season back on track on Saturday after their poor showing at New Englands.

"There are a lot of things to put together," O'Brien said. "We come one step at a time. There is a lot of stopping and starting."

But O'Brien said this was to be expected with a younger, inexperienced team.

"We under-performed last week, and I'm glad that we don't have a week to sit around," O'Brien said. "It's good that we have a meet so we can regain the forward motion we had prior to last meet."

Captain Matt Clark was in agreement.

"Hopefully last week will wake us up so we will perform well [on Saturday]," Clark said.

Minutemen set for two huge Atlantic 10 games at Rudd

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

There's an old cliché in sports that says, "every game counts." In some cases, it's a tool for motivation. Sometimes it's said to rally the troops, but for the Massachusetts men's soccer team, it's a powerful midseason reality.

The Minutemen (4-6-2, 1-1-2 A-10) are currently in sixth place in the extremely competitive Atlantic 10. Only six teams make the conference tournament, so with A-10 rivals Dayton (6-4-1, 3-1-0 A-10) and Xavier coming to town this weekend, University of Massachusetts is poised to maintain and advance its postseason hopes.

MATTHEW REHG/COLLEGIAN

Matty Lemire plays the ball against Hartford.

The Flyers of Dayton come to Rudd Field today for a 3 p.m. kickoff while the Spiders (4-7-1, 2-1-1 A-10) visit Amherst on Sunday for a 1 p.m. showdown.

After splitting last weekend, the Minutemen were left with their backs against the wall going into their final seven games of the season. UMass coach Sam Koch understands that every game is crucial from here on out and is looking to prepare his youth-clad squad for the long haul.

"We've got to go out and try to win every game because you never know what the other teams are doing," Koch said. "We can't lose too many games because we're in the last spot. In all honesty, I'm just trying to make sure that we're playing the best we can every time we step on the field."

UMass will try to use some much-needed home field advantage this weekend after playing on the road for five straight games. The five-game road stint was the longest for the Minutemen since the 2000 campaign.

The Maroon and White will play on a single, grass surface for the first time in nearly a month. In previous games, UMass had to adapt to different types of turf that it wasn't used to playing on.

"It definitely helps us to play a better game when you've got a nice surface to play on. Tough thing is, the other teams get pretty excited playing on this field too," Koch said. "In a funny way it can almost backfire because the other team is just as excited to play on the surface as we are."

Administration announces new committee

MATTHEW REHG/COLLEGIAN

From left, Provost Charlena Seymour, Chancellor John Lombardi and Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano announce the new formation of a commission to address racial diversity.

By Erika Lovley

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi announced the creation of the Commission on Racial Diversity, which will address issues of racial and ethnic diversity on campus, in a press conference on Friday.

The 22-person commission will be chaired by Orlando L. Taylor, vice provost for research and graduate school dean at Howard University in Washington, D.C. The commission is comprised of educators, lawyers, psychologists, two UMass students and university presidents, 13 of which are from the University.

Lombardi said the "blue-ribbon" commission includes a very diverse group of people who have had years of experience dealing with issues of race. The commission is expected to make recommendations on how the University can change the way it approaches issues of race, including funding and campus guidelines. It is set to convene on Nov. 1 and submit a report by Feb. 1, 2005.

"[We will] put fingerprints on a program other universities will attempt to emulate," said Lombardi.

Lombardi said that UMass has had a long tradition of working on issues of diversity. However, officials and administrators are concerned that the current approach is not as effective as it could be.

"[The committee will] reset our course and give us direction," he said.

The commission will work in an open forum and has no set agenda, although some possible issues that may be addressed are creating a more diverse and racially friendly climate on campus and raising the bar on minority recruitment efforts.

Currently, minority students make up 17 percent of the approximately 18,000 undergraduate student population, according to Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and academic life.

"We are not as successful in recruiting minorities as we'd like to be," said Lombardi. "We need to do better."

Lombardi was asked if the committee was formed in response to the rash of racial incidents that have taken place on campus over the last semester, including student leaders drawing a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan member. He said the decision was related to a sequence of events since he became Chancellor over the last two and a half years.

Gargano announced Thursday that the nine student leaders had been reprimanded by the University. None of the students were expelled, however because of privacy issues, their charges and punishments could not be released.

"We want to make improvements and make students want to come here," said Charlena Seymour, Provost and Senior Vice Chancellor for academic affairs. "We asked for assistance outside campus and we are grateful they are coming to work with us."

Seymour said the committee's purpose is not

Concerned students hand letters to Dean

By Dan O'Brien

What was originally slated as a rally regarding racial issues turned into a gathering of nine students on the steps of Whitmore Administration Building on Friday.

Members of Take Back UMass and other University of Massachusetts students presented a letter, which included a short list of recommendations to Dean of Students Jo-Anne Thomas Vanin regarding recent racial activities that have occurred on campus.

Andres Gomez, a member of Take Back UMass, said that recent incidents involving race, including the drawing of swastikas outside a dorm in the Central residential area, have further led to minority rights groups on campus to ask the administration to take action.

Gomez said the recent incidents are "putting minority students in danger."

Marsha Leiblum, also a member of Take Back UMass, said the presentation of the document had nothing to do with the group's opinion of the administrators.

"We have nothing against the administrators," Leiblum said. "We just want to make the point that something needs to be done [regarding recent racial issues.]"

The students who signed the letter represent various campus groups, including Take Back UMass, the Harriet Project, the Anthropology Department and the Legal Committee of Students Against Racism, while others simply signed to lend their support. There were a total of 16 signatures on the letter.

The beginning of the letter addresses issues stemming from the controversial "KKK-9" photos that depicted members of the Student Government Association and SCERCA posing in front of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard holding a burning cross in one hand, standing below a voice bubble that stated, "I love ALANA." ALANA is the African Latino Asian Native American caucus of the SGA that addresses issues of racial diversity on campus.

The students who signed the letter made their requests to Vanin referring to the University's Code of Student Conduct. They asked that the students involved in the photos be prosecuted through the University judicial process.

One section of the letter states:

"While we are not interested in vengeance, we collectively call for severe sanctions to be levied against these students who some of us believe should be expelled. We do this because

UMass police file charges in Southwest assault case

By Erika Lovley

University of Massachusetts police have filed charges against six students for assault and battery and possession of hypodermic needles on the UMass campus.

The UMPD is now seeking the following charges against those involved: Leroy F. Brooks, 22, of Hackensack, N.J. and Robert Jerome Cobbs, 22, of Parsippany, N.J., with disorderly conduct and assault and battery; Richmond Appiah, 23, of Worcester with disorderly conduct. All three are members of the UMass football team.

Also charged are Brian French, 20, of Peabody and Matthew V. Feduska, 20, of Stoneham, with disorderly conduct and possession of a hypodermic needle; Daniel Perry, 20, of Norfolk is charged with disorderly conduct.

After the altercation took place, Cobbs was treated at Cooley-Dickenson Hospital for a quarter-inch deep neck wound. Police will not say whether or not Cobbs' injury occurred from a weapon during the Oct. 1 fight.

However, according to Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald, an item was removed from the scene of the fight that is still being processed in a crime lab in Agawam.

Police say that the fight had racial overtones, but charges of civil rights violations have not been filed.

"What transpired does not meet hate crime statue," said Archbald.

According to the University of Massachusetts Police Department, the fight took place outside Mackimmie Hall in the Southwest residential area at 2:30 a.m. Allegedly, three white students were standing outside the dorm window of two black students and started an argument, taunting the two to come outside and fight. A third black student joined the other two students outside after they left the dorm.

The incident was captured on video by an outdoor surveillance camera. All six men involved were treated and released from Cooley Dickinson and Holyoke Hospitals.

According to Archbald, Feduska and French were found in possession of hypodermic needles during interviews with police.

Archbald said the two admitted to stealing the needles from Holyoke Hospital while being treated. The University has not issued any disciplinary action on those charges.

The six are scheduled for a hearing with the court magistrate in Eastern Hampshire District Court in Hadley to find out if the court will choose to press charges.

UMass holds Autumn Event

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

This past Saturday marked the occasion of the "Autumn Event," a campus-wide open house for perspective University of Massachusetts students and their families.

4,000 people were expected to attend the planned events, in which information about many facets of the University was disseminated. The visitors were able to speak with faculty and current students, tour the campus, and attend panel discussions.

"This event is a perfect opportunity to put our best foot forward," says Bill Wright, the Director of Public Information for the University. "Those who attend will have opportunities to talk with current students, who are our best ambassadors on campus."

The day's events, which involved hundreds of faculty and students, began with a welcome from Chancellor John V. Lombardi in the Fine Arts Center. Due to the number of people interested in the Chancellor's comments, two sessions were held to accommodate the crowd.

Lombardi touched upon many topics during his talk. He stressed the many physical upgrades that the University has started undergoing.

"Many of the buildings at our university were built 25-30 years

Terror hits close to home

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

For those who may think that terror attacks across the world have a negligent effect on the University of Massachusetts campus, take the October 7 bombings in Egypt as a wake-up call.

The impact of terror is very noticeable for Inbar Bluzer, the 26-year-old "Israel Fellow" for the Five-College community.

Bluzer, recently received her bachelor's degree from Israel's Ben-Gurion University.

She now works for the Jewish Agency for Israel and Hillel: the Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, whose goal is to increase positive awareness of Israel among American college campuses. "I have been welcomed by the community," she says.

While she may be enjoying her new job, she recently received word that among the 14 Israelis who died in the attack was her middle-school Arabic language teacher. Tzila Niv, 43, was killed along with two of her children when a car bomb exploded at the Hilton Hotel in Taba, Egypt, a resort popular among Israelis.

"I feel a lot of sadness," explains Bluzer. "A place in the heart has a feeling that is part of the [Israeli] community – part of our people. When you know someone, it makes the situation harder."

All Israeli children learn English in school, and many also learn Arabic. "In Israel, we study Arabic for several years in school – it's part of the curriculum," says Bluzer. She remembers that "it was really important for Ms. Niv to teach us Arabic. My teacher tried to give us the feeling of the knowledge of this language. Not only for grades – it's something to help us communicate better with our neighbors."

The notion of Israel that students have on campus is not solely based on terror. Students know Israel also for the many accomplishments of the 56-year-old state.

Jessica Rentsch, a sophomore with her major in Social Thought and Political Economics, says that she learned about an Israeli "kibbutz" in her anthropology class.

"A kibbutz is a community that Israelis have made, in which everyone has a job, and they all reap the benefits of their work together," explains Rentsch. The notion of a kibbutz is famous world-wide and embodies the goal of a collective work-group environment.

Last winter, the University's Hillel House provided 40 students with a 10-day educational tour of Israel. The program is provided free to Jewish students on campus through the national Birthright Israel organization.

Hayley Katz, a freshman with an undeclared major will be traveling to Israel this winter on the same program.

"I am very excited to learn about this interesting country… too often, people only learn of Israel through the disturbing effects of warfare," she said.

Bluzer, who is accustomed to living in a diverse population, says that, "I live in the north of Israel, which has lots of small Jewish communities, and many Arab cities. In Israel, we are taught to respect our neighbors, and treat them as we would want to be treated."

Bluzer still holds out hope that one day her home country will be known as a peaceful state.

"A bombing like this makes the dream of peace seem further away… We continue to hope and be optimistic that someday the situation will be quiet and there will be peace."

ago, which means that they are in need of some renovations," explained the Chancellor, who added that these renovations will result in numerous improvements to the University's physical structure in the next five years.

Lombardi also answered questions about the extent to which safety codes are adhered to and whether anything could be changed about the bathroom situation in the Southwest residential area.

As for re-constructing the towers so that gender-specific bathrooms were not located on alternate floors, Lombardi tackled the question by explaining the plans for the renovations of the Southwest towers and additional dorms to be built on a field near the Sylvan residential area.

The field was once the women's athletic field, but is no longer in use.

"[This project] will allow there to be empty rooms in the towers for a long enough period of time so as to allow us to have time to knock down walls and change things around," Lombardi said.

The new set-up would make the situation easier for students living in the towers, who currently have to trek up or down a level if their gender's bathroom is not located on their floor.

Lombardi also touched upon the University's atmosphere and the hard-working administration. "People think faculty and the University change," Lombardi said. "We don't. The students do. Each new generation bring with them new issues, perspectives, and different dreams than their predecessors."

The Chancellor described that he and Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, work to deal with these changes.

Throughout the day, college-bound students and their families attended informational sessions and walked throughout the campus on student led tours. The administrators' hope was that students would be able to gain a sense of the opportunities that are available at the University.

At the same time, the parents of thousands of students flocked to campus as part of "Family Weekend." The "Autumn Event" coincided with "Family Weekend." There was some confusion as to the fact that these two events occurred during the same weekend.

"It was called 'Family weekend,' so it was designated as a weekend for families to visit, but there was not much for families to do," noticed Laura McGlynn, a freshman biology major. "The weekend was more geared towards prospective students."

Chancellor Lombardi stated that he thought this weekend would enable parents to "ask questions that they didn't know they wanted to ask." The new perspectives gained after a month-and-a-half of their son or daughter being y at college brings up new questions that Lombardi wanted to be able to answer.

'04 Election in brief

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

DAYTONA BEACH, Fla. (AP) — President Bush turned the tables Saturday on Sen. John Kerry, declaring "the best way to avoid the draft is to vote for me," and pledged to oppose mandatory military service. The Democrat stuck to domestic issues, blaming Bush for a shortage of flu vaccines.

Kerry also opposes a draft and has suggested that re-electing Bush would greatly increase the prospects for one. The president, fearing that young voters will be swayed by the charge, fired back, "The person talking about a draft is my opponent."

With new polls showing the race tied or Bush slightly ahead, both candidates found new ways to go negative while rallying supporters in the campaign's two most crucial states. The incumbent was in Florida, his challenger in Ohio.

Kerry accused Bush of missing signs that a flu vaccine shortage was imminent. The attack fit into a broader campaign theme - that on Iraq, the economy and many other matters, Bush is disconnected from problems facing Americans.

"What's happening with the flu vaccine is really an example of everything this administration does - deny it, pretend it's not there, and then try to hide it when it comes out and act surprised," Kerry said.

Campaigning in an area heavily dependent on the military, Bush said, "We will not have an all-volunteer army" before correcting himself. "Let me restate that," he continued. "We will not have a draft ... . The best way to avoid a draft is to vote for me."

Polls show that a majority of young voters believe Bush would reinstitute the draft, despite the president's denials.

Bush and Kerry tailored their appeals. The Democrat, a Catholic, went to Mass and picked up a hunting license - a pitch to Ohio's socially conservative Democrats motivated by values and gun rights.

Episcopal churches separate from church due to gay bishop

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) — A coalition of conservative New England Episcopalians has formed four new congregations separate from the Episcopal Church USA, due to differences with the church leadership over last year's consecration of a gay priest as bishop of New Hampshire.

Meeting in Providence as the first New England Convocation of the 10-month-old Anglican Communion Network, nearly 250 lay people and 27 clergy from nearly 40 churches affirmed Saturday the creation of four new Anglican parishes in New Hampshire and Massachusetts and commissioned nine pairs of "home missionaries" to set up fellowships that may one day turn into Anglican parishes.

The four new congregations, which are meeting in private homes, are in the Massachusetts communities of Orleans and Sandwich on Cape Cod, and in Durham and Rochester, N.H.

The national Anglican Communion Network brings together dioceses, parishes, and individuals who call themselves "orthodox Anglicans" and who believe that biblical strictures against homosexuality should preclude the ordination of a gay bishop.

Bishop Gene Robinson pracices mass. He became the first gay bishop in the episcopal church last year.

Last year, Episcopal priest Gene Robinson, who lives openly with a same-sex partner, became bishop of New Hampshire. His election has bishop spurred an outcry by conservatives against the Episcopal Church USA - the American province of the Anglican Communion, which comprises 38 provinces around the world.

"This church which I love has been hijacked; as a result it has lost its course as a moral leader and has become a follower of the self-indulgent trends of the times," said Mark Wimbush of South Kingstown.

The local conservatives, along with much of the Anglican world, are looking toward a set of recommendations, called the Windsor Report, that is to be released Monday in St. Paul's Cathedral Crypt in London.

The report was drafted by a task force called the Lambeth Commission, appointed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Most Rev. Rowan Williams, to offer recommendations about how to preserve the global denomination in the face of divisions over the roles of gays and lesbians in the church.

Baystate Hospital comes under fire

BOSTON (AP) — A Springfield hospital has been placing liens on the homes of patients to collect on bills, a move that is raising the eyebrows of health care advocates and state officials.

Baystate Medical Center over the past 15 months took 300 patients to court and had liens placed on the homes of 46 patients, the Boston Sunday Globe reported. State officials plan to look into the practice.

"Hospitals should not put liens on poor people's homes," Paul Cote, state commissioner of Health Care Finance and Policy, told the Globe. "They would have to have a compelling case, such as someone doesn't have an income, but has millions of dollars in assets."

Cote oversees the "free care" program, which helps the poor pay medical bills. He said he would look into Baystate to see if it is violating state regulations that protect the poor from unfair collection methods.

"I'm trying to pay the bills, but I need time," Chicopee resident Beverly Ann Pise, 51, said of the $3,600 lien on her home. "Now I'm worried they can take the house."

Pise, who has a kidney condition, owes Baystate $3,000 for her three-day emergency hospital stay in July 2002. She works two jobs and her husband has a seasonal job that leaves him unemployed in the winter.

Keith McLean-Shinaman, Baystate's chief financial officer, said liens are only used as a last resort.

New committee slated to improve racial relations between students on campus

just to talk, rather to implement.

"We just don't want people who are going to talk the talk. These are people who are going to walk the walk," she said.

In order to progress on campus, Seymour urged students to forget the past and move forward.

"We are not trying to sweep racism under the rug," she said.

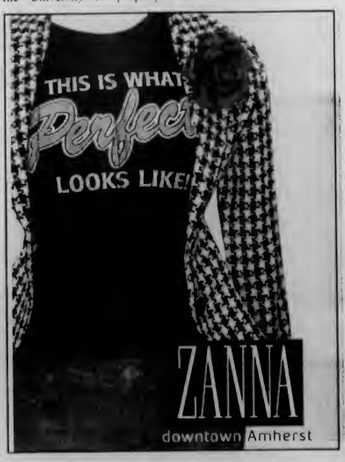
When asked if the cost of the committee will cause strain from University budget cuts from previous years, Lombardi said it was not "hugely expensive."

"I am personally responsible for the budget cuts," he said. "The University has taken a tremendous pounding ... but this doesn't stop other programs."

In response to the formation of the committee, Nadya I. Stevens, member of the student group Take Back UMass, read a statement opposing the formation of the committee to deal with diversity issues on campus. Approximately 30 members of the group were in attendance at the press conference in the Mullins Center.

The statement cited the committee as doing type of work that the Office of ALANA Affairs was created for, such as research on racial groups and bettering diversity on campus. It also said that student culturral and academic support centers are not receiving the proper funding and staffing they need.

"These organizations are designed to address precisely the sort of issues that this new commission intends to tackle," she said.



"I am appalled ... that there are only two students on the commission and the meeting was at 3:30 on a Friday afternoon." said Office of ALANA Affairs staff member Gladys Franco.

Franco said that in order for the University to properly address issues of race, it needs to start a dialogue with groups like the OAA and the ALANA caucus.

The committee will be available to meet with groups and individual students who wish to propose ideas. A Web site, www.umass.edu/CampusDiversity will also be available for the public to make suggestions and email commission members.

Released detainees back to terrorist acts

By Matt Moore
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Despite gaining their freedom by signing pledges to renounce violence, at least seven former prisoners of the United States at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, have returned to terrorism, at times with deadly consequences.

At least two are believed to have died in fighting in Afghanistan, and a third was recaptured during a raid of a suspected training camp in Afghanistan, said Lt. Cmdr. Flex Plexico, a Pentagon spokesman. Others are at large.

Additional former detainees have expressed a desire to rejoin the fight, be it against U.N. peacekeepers in Afghanistan, Americans in Iraq or Russian soldiers in Chechnya.

Some 146 detainees have been released from Guantanamo, but only after U.S. officials said they had determined the prisoners no longer posed threats and had no remaining intelligence value.

Pentagon officials acknowledged that the release process is imperfect, but they said most of the Guantanamo detainees released have steered clear of Islamic insurgent groups.

The small number returning to the light demonstrates the delicate balance the United States must strike between minimizing the appearance of holding people unjustly and keeping those who are legitimate long-term threats, Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said.

Human rights groups frequently criticize the Defense Department for holding the hundreds of prisoners at the naval base, largely without charges or legal counsel. Many have been held for more than two years; only a few have been charged.

An additional 57 Guantanamo prisoners have been transferred to the custody of their home governments: 29 to Pakistan; seven to Russia; five each to Morocco and Britain; four each to France and Saudi Arabia; and one each to Spain, Sweden and Denmark, the Pentagon has said.

The Pentagon did not identify the seven detainees believed to have returned to fighting, although a few names have been made public. One released detainee killed a judge leaving a mosque in Afghanistan, Plexico said.

Those in the small group that has gone back to fighting come mainly from the upper echelons of suspected militant or terror groups, some allegedly linked to al-Qaida, several counterterrorism officials in the Middle East said. They gave no details, but one noted a trend that lower-echelon members tend to get on with their lives after they are released.

The former prisoners include Abdullah Mehsud, a former Guantanamo Bay detainee linked to al-Qaida who oversaw the recent kidnapping of two Chinese engineers, one of whom was killed.

On Friday, Pakistani soldiers began a massive search for Mehsud, 28, who returned to Pakistan in March after about two years' detention at Guantanamo. Pakistan officials say he has forged ties with al-Qaida since then.

One of the two former prisoners killed is Maulvi Abdul Ghaffar, a senior Taliban commander in northern Afghanistan who was arrested about two months after a U.S.-led coalition drove the militia from power in late 2001.

He was held at Guantanamo for eight months, then released, and was killed about a month ago, on Sept. 26, by Afghan security forces during a raid in Uruzgan province. Afghan leaders said they believed he was leading Taliban forces in the southern province.

Maj. Gen. Eric Olson, the No. 2 commander of U.S. troops in Afghanistan, told The Associated Press this month there was no alternative to releasing prisoners from Guantanamo.

"It's not going to be perfect, so it (the Ghaffar case) has not led to any soul-searching about the release program," Olson said.

Survey says growing income disparity between whites and minorities in US

By Genaro C. Armas
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The enormous wealth gap between white families and blacks and Hispanics grew larger after the most recent recession, a private analysis of government data finds.

White households had a median net worth of greater than $88,000 in 2002, 11 times more than Hispanics and more than 14 times that of blacks, the Pew Hispanic Center said in a study being released Monday.

Blacks were slowest to emerge from the economic downturn that started in 2000 and ended early in 2001, the report found.

Net worth accounts for the values of items such as a home and car, checking and savings accounts, and stocks, minus debts such as mortgage, car loans and credit card bills.

Greater wealth means a greater ability to weather a job loss, emergency home repairs, illness and other unexpected costs, as well as being able to save for retirement or a child's college tuition.

According to the group's analysis of Census Bureau data, nearly one-third of black families and 26 percent of Hispanic families were in debt or had no net assets, compared with 11 percent of white families.

"Wealth is a measure of cumulative advantage or disadvantage," said Roderick Harrison, a researcher at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, a Washington think tank that focuses on black issues. "The fact that black and Hispanic wealth is a fraction of white wealth also reflects a history of discrimination."

After accounting for inflation, net worth for white households increased 17 percent between 1996 and 2002 and rose for Hispanic homes by 14 percent to about $7,900. It decreased for blacks by 16 percent, to roughly $6,000.

Regardless of race and ethnicity, the median net worth for all U.S. households was $59,700 in 2002, a 12 percent gain from 1996.

Only white homes recouped all their losses between 2001 and 2002. Both Hispanics and blacks lost nearly 27 percent of net worth between 1999 and 2001; the next year Latinos had gained almost all back (26 percent) though blacks were up only about 5 percent.

Roberto Suro, director of the Pew Hispanic Center, said the accumulation of wealth allows low-income families to rise into the middle class and "have some kind of assets beyond next week's paychecks."

"Having more assets enabled whites to ride out the jobless recovery better," he said.

Harrison says Hispanics were more insulated from the downturn than blacks, so they took less of a hit. For example, Hispanics made employment gains in lower-paid, lower-skilled areas such as the service and construction sectors.

Blacks were hit hard by job losses in the manufacturing industry and in professional fields, where they were victims of "last hired, first fired" policies, he said.

Only relatively recently were large numbers of blacks and Hispanics able to make investments and accumulate wealth. They were slower to enter the stock market during the 1990s rush and then had less of a cushion when the market began its decline in 2000.

Another factor affecting disparities is that whites are far more likely to own their homes; homeownership is among the most common ways to build wealth.

their actions have created a dangerous racial climate on campus. This is not our personal opinion but it is a widely shared view as indicated by enclosed statements, wherein students and faculty, both white and non-white, have reported that in the wake of these student's actions, they feel increasingly fearful and unsafe on campus."

In regards to students feeling unsafe on campus, SGA President Eduardo Bustamante, who was not in the controversial pictures, said he has heard that a lot of people have this concern. He also said he was glad the students addressed the administrator in a cordial manner.

"They were cordial and nice from what I understand," he said, adding that he does not believe the students involved in the photos should be expelled.

The letter claims that there have been several examples of "rash-racially motivated incidents on campus." One of those incidents listed is regarding the incident involving three African-American UMass football players and three white students on Oct. 1 when an alleged fight ensued.

Besides the mentioning of the occurrence between the football players and the three students, the letter sites other racially motivated incidents on campus, which includes, "... the performance of anti-Semitic and racist graffiti in dormitories; the ripping down of posters put up by the Office of ALANA Affairs; the racial harassment of students of color on campus; and even the verbal assault of white students who befriend students of color," the letter read.

The letter also spelled out the University's Code of Student Conduct in regards to these alleged violations.

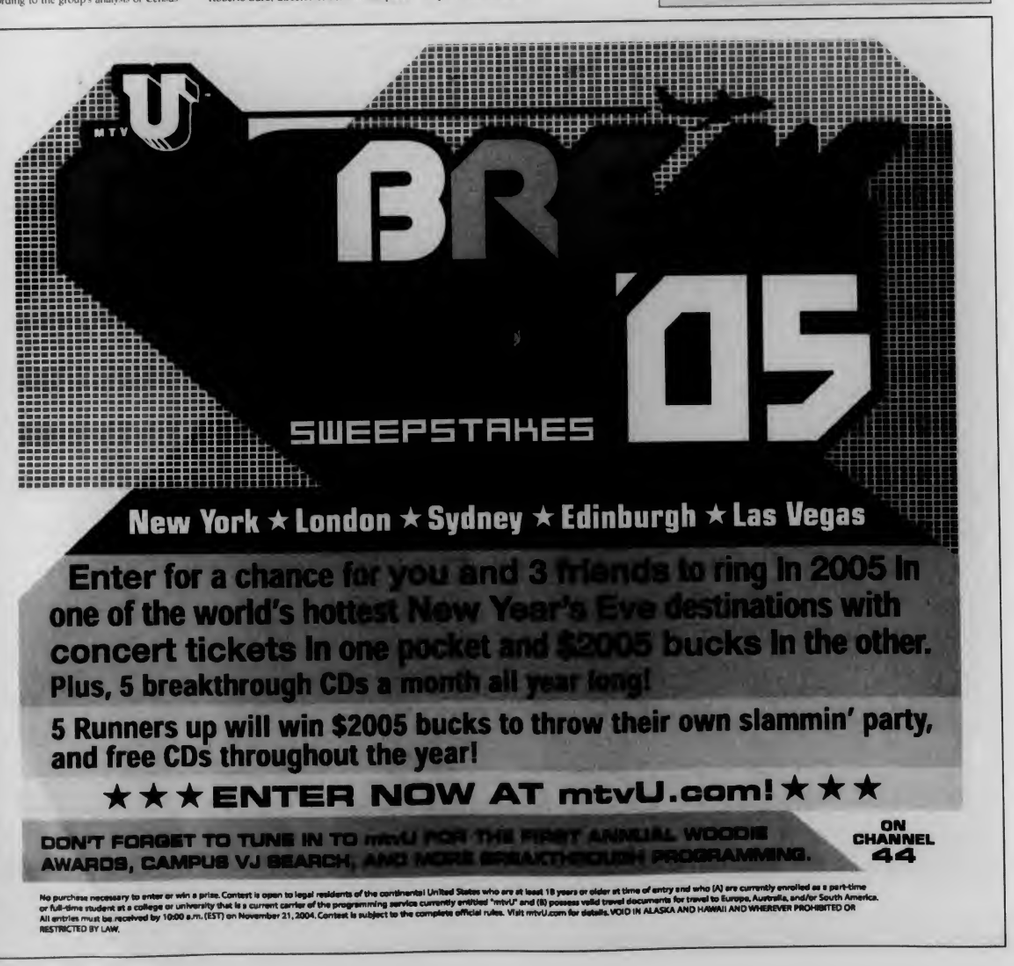
Vanin was cordial and welcoming to the students who approached her at her office inside the Whitmore building. She said she appreciated the mature manner in which the students addressed their concerns.

"I appreciate the way they came and presented themselves," Vanin said. "If we're shouting, we can't hear," she said in reference to rallies that often take place regarding similar issues.

Vanin indicated she would take the concerns of the students seriously, as many students handed her reports of individual concerns.

"I'm going to read every one of [these statements,]" she said, adding that she thought it was important for students to approach her with issues of concern.

"I encourage students to come and talk to me," she said. "It's hard to be responsive if I don't know."



SGA election ratified

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association held a meeting Thursday night, Oct. 14 to ratify its recent senate elections.

The meeting was originally scheduled to take place on Sunday, Oct. 10. The members of the SGA took 10 minutes to make a unanimous vote to ratify the election.

"The election turnout was excellent. We had about 2,200 people voting ... Every seat was contested," said SGA Speaker Seamus Brennan.

New technology too advanced for own good

The Food and Drug Administration recently approved Applied Digital Solutions, a technology company based in Florida, to market microchips intended for implantation under the skin in humans to allow easier access for a person's medical records. This concept has been met with much hesitation, especially when seen from the point of view that Orwell had brought up with his novel 1984 which depicted Big Brother watching over everyone at all times. This technology, however, can be most helpful in saving a person's life when it comes to paramedics and EMTs making split-second decisions. With all the potential and theoretical good it could bring to the world of emergency medicine, the scary proceedings that could result from this kind of technology are far too dangerous for society to explore.

Going by the theory that Applied Digital has, the benefits in emergency medicine that this product has to offer are too great to ignore. According to the New York Times, the chip would be implanted under the skin of a person's arm or hand via syringe and would not contain any detailed medical records, but rather, a number which would be linked to a medical directory. The medical records, which would contain information about the patient concerning their blood type, drug histories, and major surgeries/diseases the patient has had or currently has, would be updated quite frequently and very easily. The device used by emergency medical personnel to read the exclusive 16-digit number on each chip would be a handheld radio scanner.

This technology could be very useful when used with the intention that it was approved for. If a person passes out while jogging one day, EMTs and paramedics would still be able to find out the person's drug allergies, past medical history, and current medications even with the patient unconscious. Thus, all the appropriate medical treatments could be administered without worrying about the patient having an allergic reaction to a drug and, even possibly, determining what caused the patient to pass out based on their past medical history (ex: If the patient is hypoglycemic and their glucose level dropped too low which accounted for them going unconscious). The VeriChip, as the implanted microchip is commonly called, could greatly decrease the amount of malpractice encountered in the field.

However, with all the good and promise the VeriChip holds for emergency medicine, the thought and future prospects of where the implanted chip will lead society in years too come is too frightening when it comes to maintaining people's privacies. One major concern brought up by the prospect of the VeriChip is that this technology is currently being used as a security feature. Rafael Macedo de la Concha, the attorney general of Mexico, has received, in addition to many of his subordinates, an implanted chip controlling security access to a secure room containing highly-confidential documents vital in Mexico's battle with the drug cartels. If this technology continues to expand with its methods of use, we will soon be checking out library books by scanning our wrists instead of our library cards.

While the intentions are certainly noble with regards to the emergency medical profession, the logistics of the VeriChip are taking us into worlds that have only been seen in novels such as 1984 and Aldous Huxley's Brave New World and in movies such as Gattica and Minority Report. The fear of the chip being implanted in people is centered on the idea of authorities using it to keep track of its citizens. And while this may not necessarily be the case yet, the foot is in the door and this scenario is inevitable if this technology is further developed and made readily available through implantations in humans.

Poor behavior slows change

Erika Lovley

As a journalist, my job requires me to remain unbiased on all the issues I report on, including the ongoing struggle between student minority groups and the administration at the University of Massachusetts. For the past month, I have sat on the sidelines watching two well-educated, powerful groups of people wrestle with one another, trying to solve a problem that is bigger than any of us – racial diversity on the UMass campus.

The struggle between minority students and the administration seems to become more heated by the day. Both sides have some very pointed and well-developed arguments. ALANA is an excellent example of what can happen when students put their heads together to formulate change – things get accomplished. At least, most of the time.

ALANA's struggle with the University seems comparable to our country's current race for the presidency – sometimes it's hard to tell exactly who is ahead. After the recent storming of the Whitmore Administration building and protest over the University's handling of the student leaders involved in the KKK-9 photos, it seemed like ALANA had truly gained the lead. Officials handed out punishments for the nine student leaders last Thursday.

However, no matter how heated the situation, the administration, namely Michael Gargano, Vice Chancellor of student affairs and academic life, continues to come out on top of student groups in every situation.

Etiquette. Tact. Manners. Gargano has them.

Despite the obvious disagreement and dislike some students in ALANA have for Gargano, he treats every student with courtesy and respect, no matter how angry or stressed he becomes. The slamming he took from students during the "How to Live and Learn in a Diverse Community" forum comes to mind.

Unfortunately, the manners of some members of ALANA, as well as the student group Take Back

While working to improve the conditions for UMass minority students, you must uphold yourselves to the highest standards of behavior. It's great that you are angry, and it's great that you are working for progress. But please, have a little class.

UMass, leave a lot to be desired.

I covered a press conference in the Mullins Center on Friday afternoon, where Gargano, along with Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Provost Charlena Seymour, announced the creation of the Commission on Racial Diversity.

In attendance were approximately 20 members of ALANA and Take Back UMass, protesting the creation of the committee. Why they were protesting is not important here. It was the way some of the members were protesting that I found so appalling.

During the question and answer session, one young woman from one of the two student groups read a long grievance in front of the entire conference to the vice chancellor. "What are you going to do about that, Gargano?" She snapped.

Just like that. No "Mister Gargano", no "Sir". Nothing. At that point, even "Mike" would have been more appropriate.

Another student wouldn't stop interrupting Chancellor Lombardi. He allowed her to ask a question and follow-up, and then politely noted it was time to take questions from other audience members. But she wouldn't stop talking, even at his request. Neither of these men deserved this treatment.

What these women don't realize is that because of their complete lack of tact, their argument was lost on the ears of the press, University officials and all who were in attendance at that press conference. All one could notice was how uneducated, rude and classless these two appeared. Their poor behavior directly reflects on both ALANA and Take Back UMass – and the view isn't pretty.

Student groups: take my advice. While working to improve the conditions for UMass minority students, you must uphold yourselves to the highest standards of behavior. It's great that you are angry, and it's great that you are working for progress. But please, have a little class. No one, especially the administration, will be willing to help you if you continue to behave like children. You are only retarding your own efforts for change.

I believe one of the basic fundamental points of human civil rights is to treat one another with respect – a point some are forgetting. You may not like Michael Gargano or John Lombardi, but they deserve your respect regardless. Your behavior directly reflects on this University and the students you represent, whether you like it or not. Just remember whom you're speaking to.

Racism not to be overlooked

Becky Martins

Over the past few months, students at UMass Amherst have witnessed some disheartening things. Last spring, the Holocaust memorial was vandalized when students threw a few of its flags, which represented 5,000 of the 12 million individuals murdered in Nazi concentration camps during World War II, into the campus pond. A few weeks ago, the Chief Metawampe statue sustained damage after being pulled from its stand and dragged into the middle of North Pleasant Street. And most recently, newly surfaced pictures have revealed SGA members drinking on school grounds, with a caricature of Speaker of the Student Government Association Patrick Higgins dressed as the Ku Klux Klan's Grand Wizard in the background. Racism on Umass' campus, however, is not limited to these three specific incidents. Instead, it is a major issue that is far from being resolved in this university or on the planet.

I'm not here to argue about what the guilty parties' intentions were in each of the previous situations. I am not writing to preach about what needs to be done to make the world a better place—it is obvious enough. Instead, I have come to realize, while it is awful that hateful acts are committed, people's lack of empathy towards those hurt by them can be just as sad. If people were just more aware of their own actions and their effect on others, a deeper understanding could exist between all individuals.

Although many people hope to attain a mutual understanding between cultures, their own unwillingness to identify with what others go through is resulting in a giant step backward instead of forward for mankind as a whole.

In recent weeks, the issue of racism on Umass' campus, though it has always existed, has become very publicized. Our diverse campus has found itself divided, at times, over certain issues. People have felt the need to voice their opinions, regardless of how common or unpopular they may be. While I fully support our right to freedom of speech, sometimes people do not think before speaking. Generalizations and stereotypes are used in relation to large groups of people. Feelings are hurt and divisions are made between certain groups on campus. Essentially, it has become obvious that many UMass students are insensitive to their peers' feelings.

I am white. Personally, I do not know how it feels to be discriminated against and I have never experienced a hate crime. But this does not give me due reason to be indifferent to issues that others face. A problem does not become of any lesser importance just because we may not fully understand the extent of its seriousness. A white person should not act like they have it "all figured out" and declare what is or what is not racism, a hate crime, etc. Some people get so wrapped up in the politics of an issue that they forget that real human emotion is involved. Many people forget we are all human beings living together on one planet—not just different races coexisting. Basically, although many people hope to attain a mutual understanding between cultures, their own unwillingness to identify with what others go through is resulting in a giant step backward instead of forward for mankind as a whole.

We are all college students. To get into this university, everyone had to have been at least partially intelligent. But honestly, what type of educated people think in such close-minded ways? Upon coming to this school, I was shocked at the intolerance that still existed for such a liberal area. Until this year, I thought the world really was a different place than what my parents, grandparents, etc. grew up in. Slowly, however, my perception of society is changing for the worse. I am ashamed to associate myself with people whose views are as old-fashioned, ignorant and disgusting as those I have witnessed over the past few weeks. Today's generation is better than this. We at UMass are better than this.

People may be tired of hearing about the issues of racism and acceptance repeatedly discussed in class, in the press or even between friends, but until we can all live together in a world free of hate, they need to be continuously pressed. It is disheartening to realize people who perform hate crimes can justify their own behavior enough to carry them out. But it is also sad that some people who would never call themselves "racists" can act so hypocritically: saying they accept everyone to be equal, but not always supporting their peers when they are faced with incidents of hate.

Certain individuals will be lucky enough to live life free of discrimination, whether it is in terms of race, gender, religion, sexuality, etc. Just because these people, however, cannot personally relate to an issue, it does not mean they are above it. I advise everyone to put themselves in other people's places. Try picturing an incident occurring that is so hurtful it brought us to tears, yet little was done about it because it did not pertain to the "majority." Imagine what it would feel like to have our safety jeopardized, personal rights as human beings squashed or just daily treatment in every day life disregarded just because of how we look. The frustration and anger one would experience could, at times, seem unbearable: leaving us feeling that although we were innocent, no one seemed to be on our side.

We may not be able to change the world overnight. One person alone will never put an end to such a deep-seeded problem as racism. But as Gandhi once said, "Be the change you want to see in the world." At least we will be one step closer in achieving a place where we, and future generations, can live free of hate. That, if nothing more, is at least motivation enough to try.

World opinions of democracy

Ramzi Kanazi

Haaretz.com, which is an online news service based in Israel, reported on polls from 10 countries around the world this weekend. Ten newspapers, one in each country, collaborated to survey their populations concerning views on America and the Bush administration during the months of September and October. The polls found that Americans are good, and Bush is, well, not so good.

The Guardian Unlimited, which is an online news service based in the U.K., listed the results of many of the poll questions and found that if the world voted in America's presidential elections today, Kerry would win by a margin of two to one (or 54 to 27 percent—the sum of the averages of each country divided by the total number of countries: 10). Israel, however, voted inversely for Bush by that same margin, and Russia, which polled shortly after the Beslan tragedy, slightly favored the incumbent.

A number of other issues were covered. Every country decided that Americans are good people, with Mexico the most split; although the Mexican poll may have been taken at a soccer game. Only Israel's opinion about the U.S. improved over the last three years. It was also the only country that felt America was right in invading Iraq.

In their reviews, Haaretz and The Guardian found that younger generations show less support for Bush and the war in Iraq, but the older folks generally do not think much of them either. Considering these results, it's amazing that none of the countries surveyed were Arab. In fact, most of the countries are "western" liberal democracies. That is supposed to translate to "our friends."

Well, at least they all like Americans as people. They just don't like our President. Imagine if they were our friends and did not like us too. This could be the case if we reelect Bush, but should we really care what the rest of the world thinks? It's not like we call our president "the leader of the free world," and we don't ask questions like "why do they hate us?" when things go wrong. We're America. We have lots of oil and lots of freedom, and we want to keep them.

The problem is that prices are going up. I now spend over 20 dollars to fill the tank of my Civic, but that's still less than half the price it would cost me in Europe. I wonder if that is part of the reason why we don't poll so well. What about the cost of freedom? I was eating freedom fries with one of my friends from France, and she told me that she had to be fingerprinted upon entering the States because she is on a work visa. The cost is increasing for all international visitors, including students. Fortunately, we attend a school that is cognizant of the inequity of these costs. Thanks UMass.

Oh yeah, the cost for Americans. Ask any librarian about our freedom, and you will find that the FBI could look for your name to learn which books you've checked out. I remember a commercial sponsored by the Ad Council suggesting this kind of stuff does not happen. Regardless of our costs, they are increasing around the world, and the polls are sensitive to that. The survey indicates that the rest of the world does not believe that the war in Iraq is contributing to the war on terror.

So, how does the cost of freedom relate to world opinion? Well, many still consider America a model of Democracy for other nations, a model that engages in preemptive strikes over inaccurate information and one that goes to war against the behest of the international community. Considering that America has largely been concerned with the spread of democracy, we should probably be more concerned with our exhibition of it.

Imagine leaving your fingerprints at Paris' Charles De Gaulle airport when traveling to study, for business or vacation. Worse yet, imagine countries considering a preemptive strike in fear of Bush's latest and greatest bunker buster bombs. While the latter threat is not so likely to occur in the near future (with respect to those who look to us as a model of democracy), some of our freedoms and comforts do depend on world opinion, an opinion that is clearly waning today.

When you are at the polls on Nov. 2, you may want to consider not only what matters to you, but also what matters to others. After all, those people whom we share this planet with have opinions that may benefit us or adversely affect us in the future.

Right now, eight out of 10 countries and, as one Collegian columnist recently noted, some of the brightest Americans are so vehemently anti-Bush, they just can't keep their opinions to themselves.

Fashionistas of the past set standards

Style 101

Monique Jemmott

I am a self-admitted vintage buff. This is evident in many parts of my personal style. My wardrobe is made up of a very eclectic mix of thrift shop clothing, and pieces from my mother, grandmother, and aunt's old clothing, handbags, and jewelry. The walls of my dorm room are adorned with old black and photos of old school artists, places, and people, and my music library has a serious old R&B component. It is almost entirely safe to say that I have an old soul.

This is the culmination of being raised by parents that are a little bit older than most people's, thus being exposed to nothing but old music, movies, other points of what was popular culture way before most of us were a thought in anyone's mind; and also finding that as our culture progresses, we become less and less original — so basically I just find the old school so much more interesting.

From the looks of today's key players in popular culture I am not the only one. Whether it is Kanye West's soulful old school beats, Andre 3000's dapper 1940s attire, or Alicia Key's 70s inspired braids, we see old school in the new school time and time again. So needless to say that I don't think twice about the outcome when I get dressed and wear earrings that I got from my grandmother's jewelry box, or a blazer that my mother bought before she gave birth to me.

Nowadays it's less about whether or not vintage is in, and more about which vintage is in. Currently the look of the 40's dominates the runways and department stores with peep toe shoes, round pumps, and fur wraps. Just last season it was the 80s that was the decade past of the moment complete with the plastic jewelry, big hair, and neon colors. In short, vintage is always in.

Of course if its in, then it's a must have. It is always a sign of the times for fashionista's to take lessons from their favorite celebrities and fashion models. But before there was Halle, Beyonce, or Mary, there was another crop of well-dressed, glamorous beauties in the entertainment world. Before one can admire and immortalize the stars of today it is only right to recognize their predecessors and their iconic appeal that set trends for years to come.

These women set trends and standards in beauty, that women would follow for years to come. Whether it was Bo Derek's braids, Diana Ross's look of glamour complete with sequined gowns, diva-like glasses, and trench coats and berets; or Audrey Hepburn's fresh- faced beauty, and simplistic style. For every diva today there was a diva of yesterday.

Each and every one of these women are fabulous in their own right; and in their prime they stood for much more than beauty and fashion. They were symbols of hope for other women who watched and admired them. They set trends, and commanded attention in a male dominated world without ever compromising their felinity.

Women like Diana Ross, who may have coined the word diva, can be most recognizable for her always-glamorous style and over the top fashion choices. Her looks may be the precursor for many of today's divas who have pushed the envelop for over the top style and super glam looks at all time.

Dorothy Dandridge, a great African American actress of the 1950's can be credited for her knockout beauty, and high fashion glamour, as can be seen in much if her work such as one of her most famous movies "Carmen Jones." Ms. Dandridge's largest proclaimed followers are Janet Jackson and Halle Berry, who portrayed her in the autobiographical movies "Becoming Dorothy Dandridge"

My personal favorite fashion diva of the past, Pam Grier's style can be mapped out throughout the past three decades. Her signature afro of the 70's became a staple amongst black women for many years to follow, and her fearlessness to be recognized as a black woman complete with curves, and natural hair may have paved the way for many afro centric divas such as Lauryn Hill, and Jill Scott, and not to mention the 'South Park' creators talk politics and their new film 'Team America'

Last Friday, Matt Stone (Trey Parker was busy) took time off from editing "Team America: World Police" to take a conference call from a few other reporters and me.

Any fan of his probably has a million questions. I had to restrain myself from asking questions like, "In the 'South Park' episode spoof of 'Lord of the Rings,' why did you have Kyle as a paladin rather than a ranger?"

It's not a bad question, but nothing most people besides a handful of "South Park" fans would find interesting.

When asked about his personal politics he said, "I don't think that's important to the movie, I don't really want to talk about that. In the movie that is one of things we try to point out in the movie is that when you are a celebrity and people ask you questions you start to think that you know everything about everything. We know about making movies ... but I really don't know any more anything about politics more than anybody else."

One reporter posed a question, "Who would win in a fight between John Kerry with laser powers and George W. Bush with teleportation powers?" Even though Stone answered the question, it seemed to me like he felt the reporter was wasting his time.

The political questions didn't stop there. When asked about his and Trey Parker's political affiliation, which presidential candidates "Team America: World Police" spoofs and who Stone and Parker are pushing people to vote for, Stone replied, "Trey and I are like most people, we're kind of down the middle with our political affiliation. But (with) the movie we tried to really hard to not make it really politically bend one way or the other. We tried to do the emotionally and intellectually honest thing."

What? What? What? Is a celebrity trying to keep his mouth shut about the election?

"I would hate think anybody took their political views from me or Trey. We're pretty fed-up people. At least we can admit it. That's how we're different from other celebrities," Stone said. Politics is a theme and a backdrop of the movie, but it's more about the emotions behind the politics.

"Our main character comes up with a way he can deal with tthe pressures of policing the world.) The movie is an optimistic antidote to what's going on today," said Stone.

"Team America: World Police" and its creators' previous artistic and personal statements certainly have and will receive plenty of hate mail. One alleged letter from anti-war activist actor Sean Penn is posted on www.drudgereport.com, in response to Parker's statement. "(There's) no shame in not voting, if you don't know what you're talking about."

Penn allegedly responded, "It's all well to joke about me or whomever you choose. Not so well, to encourage irresponsibility that will ultimately lead to the disembowelment, mutilation, exploitation, and death of innocent people throughout the world. The vote matters to them."

As with all of their movies to date, "Team America: World Police" caused them to butt heads with the Motion Picture Association of America. The MPAA rated the movie NC-17, instead of giving it the desired R rating.

"My thing is that when there's an R rating on a film, you should be able to do whatever the fk you want. It's R. It's for adults. An R rating should be everything above PG-13," said Stone. The movie has a "graphic" sex scene played by puppets, which caused most of the hubbub according to Stone.

"The MPAA had a problem with some of the (sexual) positions we picked, but it really is one of the most innocuous scenes in the movie," he said.

Stone and Parker have been target of censors and parental groups of all ideological stripes. There is some difference between TV and movie censors, though.

"(South Park') has very clear guidelines and we can argue directly with (network censors.) The MPAA is a weird shadowy organization. I don't think it don't think it serves parents very well," said Stone. Stone even offered advice to novice moviemakers.

"It's so much different now than when we were in school. Just go out and do as many little films as you can. Forget production value. It's all about story and character," he said.

Many of our questions were about the upcoming ninth season of "South Park" (which starts Oct. 27.) Stone said he has "a couple three or four more years" in him as far as the series goes. The making of "Team America: World Police" was so strenuous, he says they still don't know what the first episode of this season's "South Park" will be.

'Felicity' boxed DVD series doesn't do TV hit justice

Felicity Porter (Keri Russell) is just an average college student ... or, at least, that's what the WB wants its audience to believe. In its heyday, the show offered a semi-interesting spin on the "90210"-meets-a-tamer-"Sex and the City" relationship drama. In its third season, "Felicity: Junior Year" continues this tradition, but loses some of its appeal when it tries too hard to up the ante.

"Junior Year" makes it painfully obvious that the producers wanted to maintain their cutting-edge feel. However, their plans backfired, as this season suffers from an overabundance of hokey drama.

All the stereotypical after-school-special features are there: Characters dealing with cancer, drug abuse, alcoholism, gun fights and infidelity all are present within the span of about five episodes. Here, college becomes more of an implied setting than a basis for the series.

Worse yet, the show's writers vary from episode to episode, so seemingly important plots, such as one's sudden marriage or abusive relationship, are easily forgotten and virtually unheard of again during the season.

Unfortunately, this season's DVD sports quite possibly the least inventive special features package in the series' history. The "Mad TV" parody features three of sketch comedy's weakest and most annoying personalities working with an equally uninspiring premise.

Kerri Russell starred as television's "Felicity"

Documentaries and special commentaries attempt to redeem an otherwise lagging extra disc, but even they don't seem to warrant the extra attention this time around.

Despite its flaws, though, "Junior Year" reels in its audience just as much as previous seasons. Although plotlines are, at times, extremely cheesy, the actors skillfully convey emotional tension and entice the audience to connect with their situations. Even Felicity bypasses her extreme lack of emotional expression through her interaction with the cast.

"Felicity" was on to a good thing back in the late '90s, creating a niche for itself as a show specifically designed for the college crowd. Though fans anticipated its release to DVD, this edition doesn't quite seem to do the series justice.

Milian lacks sparkle with new album 'It's about time'

Christina Milian's new CD "It's About Time" can be summed up in one word: forgettable. There is not a single song that presents something new, fresh or exciting.

There is nothing on this album that sets this her apart from the current crop of pop princesses. It has all been done before and someetimes what has already been done is simply better music.

Cuban-American Milian has worked in film, television, theatre and music. She appeared with Ja Rule on his hit single "Between You and Me." Her self-titled debut album was released abroad in 2002 and the single "AM to PM," which she released in the States, did well on Billboard's Hot 100.

Her current album contains 12 tracks and was released by Island Records, a heavy hitter in the music industry that also backs artists such as Alicia Keys, Jennifer Lopez, Usher and Mariah Carey. "Dip it Low," as could be predicted from its position on the Billboard charts, is the pinnacle of the entire album.

Milian's sultry, lush vocals and semi-explicit lyrics in this song add a little shimmer to this otherwise listless album. She has recorded and released three versions of the song with the version on the album featuring rising hip-hop star Fabolous.

The rest of the album is composed mostly of filler tracks, interspersed with some interesting numbers like the ballad "Someday One Day" and more peppy songs like "Get Loose"

Overall, the music gives the feel of coming off of a mass-produced hip-hop/ R&B album conveyor belt. The marketing strategy for the album seems to be more focused upon Milian's position as a sex symbol

All that said, she definitely shows potential. It is just a pity that she did not use much of it in the making of this album. Maybe "this is a warm-up to the real act, ie next album. So watch for her in the future, but as for picking up the CD, apparently it's not about time

MondayOctober 18,

Smith College's Poetry Center will screen "Poetry in Wartime," a documentary, tonight at 7:30 p.m. The film details how war and poetry have been bedfellows since the beginning (think Homer's take on the Trojan War), and features the work of contemporary poets (Marie Howe, Sam Hammill, Saul Williams, Marilyn Nelson, Ali Habash, Chris Abani, Rachel Bentham, Hasham Shafq and Antonieta Villamil);as well as the greats (Wilfred Owen, Siegfried Sassoon, Emily Dickinson, Langston Hughes, and Walt Whitman); This event, located at Leo Weinstein Auditorium's Wright Hall, is free, open to the public and wheelchair accessible.

WednesdayOctober 20

The Graduate Brass Quintet performs today, at Bezanson Recital Hall, at 12:20 p.m. The ensemble features Matthew Misener (trumpet), Matthew Repucci (trumpet), Kelli Kirkman (horn), Hidehiro Domeki (trombone) and Matthew Gaunt (tuba); the program is set to include works by Telemann, Scheidt and J.S. Bach. This event is free.

Professor Sheldon Goldman will lecture at the Mullins Center's Massachusetts Room today, at 4 p.m. "Judicial Confirmations: The New Battle Zone in American Politics." Goldman will discuss how "judicial nominees to the lower federal courts face increasing hostility on the path to confirmation," according to the Office of the Provost. Immediately following the lecture Goldman, who has taught at UMass Amherst since 1965, will receive a Chancellor's Medal. This event is free and open to the public

The UMass Amherst Orchestra, directed by Lanfranco Marcelletti, Jr. and featuring pianist Estela Olevsky, will perform tonight at 8 p.m. at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall; The program is set to feature pieces by Mendelssohn ("Symphony No. 5," "Reformation") and Chopin ("Piano Concerto No. 1"). Admission is $5 for students and $10 for the general public.

Former Grateful Dead pianist Bruce Hornsby brings his Grammy award winning musicianship to Northampton's Calvin Theatre tonight in support of Halcyon Days, out now on Columbia Records. The album features eleven new songs and contributions from Eric Clapton, Elton John and Sting, all of who will not be on tour with Hornsby. But, surrender your Saturday night to the piano man, anyway; aided and abetted by a full band, this is not a show to miss. Plus, Hornsby has performed on over 100 records by musicians like Bob Dylan, Willie Nelson, Bonnie Raitt and Bela Fleck, so it's a good bet he'll bring the same world- class professionalism that landed him those spots to the Calvin. And maybe he'll do "The Way It is." Tickets ars $29, $34 and $39; show is at 8 p.m.

fact that one of her most famous character's moniker was borrowed, and made famous once over by hip hop artist Foxy Brown. More recently, we can see her sexy, fearless persona immortalized on t-shirts by Triple 5 Soul, and an ad campaign by Hennesy featuring Grier's image from the 70s.

It seems increasingly obvious that the rule of good fashion is that if it was in style once, it'll come back again. When I think of what good style is, I look to the women that have become before me. The women in my family were the first stop, influencing me from a young girl. I can remember as a child watching my mother getting dressed to go out and wishing that I could go as well just to wear the pretty dresses that she wore, and put on makeup. As I got older, I found myself doing things in the same way that she did, from certain fashion rules (no white after labor day), down to the smallest details such as laying my entire outfit on the bed before I begin to dress. Icons are made one influence at a time, and just as my mother and these glamorous Hollywood starlets influenced me, they have done so for so many other young women today. They're style and grace will forever live through our own.

'Shark Tale' leads this week in theaters

LOS ANGELES - Moviegoers stuck with fish and football over puppets and prancers as "Shark Tale" and "Friday Night Lights" retained the top two box-office spots for another weekend.

The animated "Shark Tale" was No. 1 for the third straight weekend, pulling in $22.1 million, studio estimates showed Sunday. With the family audience almost entirely to itself, "Shark Tale" had climbed to a 17-day domestic total of $118.8 million.

The football flick "Friday Night Lights" came in at No. 2 for a second weekend with $13.1 million, lifting its 10-day gross to $38.7 million.

The puppet parody "Team America: World Police" debuted in third with $12.3 million. No. 4 was "Shall We Dance?" starring Richard Gere, Jennifer Lopez and Susan Sarandon, with $11.6 million.

It was a so-so debut for "Team America" from "South Park" creators Trey Parker and Matt Stone, who crafted a foul-mouthed, bloody action comedy using puppets to satirize everything from U.S. global military muscle to Hollywood political activism.

"Coming out, you want to tell people what you just saw because it's so unique," said Paul Dergarabedian, president of box-office tracker Exhibitor Relations. "Leading up to the election, because it is a rather political movie, if it gets some word of mouth going, it'll hang in there, no pun intended."

The movie had caught a lot of buzz for its raunchy humor, celebrity bashing and a puppet sex scene that nearly brought it an NC-17 rating, which would have restricted audiences to those 17 and older. The sex scene was toned down so the movie could win an R rating.

Critics generally praised "Team America" for its irreverent humor, but the movie came in on the low end of distributor Paramount's box-office expectations of a $12 million to $15 million debut.

"The heat on the picture seemed to be building as we got closer to opening, but the weekend wasn't that disappointing," said Wayne Lewellen, Paramount's head of distribution.

A remake of a Japanese hit, "Shall We Dance?" stars Gere as a discontented family man who finds renewed lust for life when he begins dance lessons and strikes up a friendship with a beautiful dance teacher, played by Lopez.

Distributor Miramax opened "Shall We Dance?" in a relatively narrow 1,772 theaters. The strategy paid off as the movie averaged a solid $6,559 per theater, the highest average among movies in wide release.

"Team America" debuted in 2,539 theaters and averaged $4,844.

Still rolling

Patricia Borneo and the rest of the Minutewomen won two games down in Philadelphia over the weekend. They knocked off Temple 3-2 in overtime on Saturday and then took down St. Joseph's 2-1 in strokes yesterday. For complete coverage, check out tomorrow's Collegian.

UMass upsets No. 7 UNH on the road

freshman Ricky Santos, who was fourth on the depth chart at the end of last year, took over for Granieri and has since become a Walter Payton Award candidate for the nation's best offensive player.

Granieri had been practicing all week, though, and was healthy enough to get in the game Saturday. McDonnell used the two-quarterback tandem for the rest of the game, which appeared to make it tough for either signal caller to establish any offensive rhythm for the last two-and-a-half quarters.

Granieri was 3-6 for 13 yards on his first drive of the game, but UNH couldn't move the ball with any more effectiveness than it did with Santos leading the offense.

After taking the ball over at their own four-yard-line, the Minutemen used a 12-play, 96-yard touchdown drive that covered over six minutes in the second quarter to give them their first lead since they were leading Richmond 14-7 in the first quarter against Richmond in their third game of the season.

Baylark scored on a nine-yard run to put UMass ahead by a 17-14 score.

Momentum really swung on that drive in several different ways. Punter Christian Koegel had a rare, poor punt that would have given UNH good field position. The Wildcats were called for a personal foul for roughing the punter, though, and UMass was able to continue its drive in order to take a lead it never relinquished.

After UNH went three-and-out on its ensuing possession, the Minutemen scored a touchdown on their third consecutive drive to take a 24-14 lead heading into the half.

Granieri was able to put a charge into his team when he hit a streaking David Ball over the middle for a 35-yard touchdown pass to bring the Wildcats within three points of the Minutemen. Granieri, excited to contribute once again, ran off the field trying to amp his team and the crowd up.

It would be the last time the Wildcats had anything to cheer about, however, as Granieri only threw for five first downs for the remainder of the game.

UMass receiver Brandon London had a career day, also, for the Minutemen. He had two career highs with seven receptions and 136 yards. He also caught a touchdown pass.

UMass safety Shannon James had another great game while anchoring this defense. He intercepted two passes and had an interception return for a touchdown that was called back due to a penalty.

David Ball had a big game for the Wildcats, hauling in 15 passes for 145 yards and a touchdown.

David Bailey caught 10 passes from the two UNH quarterbacks for 69 yards.

The two receivers had such big statistical days because UNH running backs only had three total carries for eight yards. The ground game was completely ineffective for the Wildcats who had negative-two rushing yards on 12 carries.

This was a huge accomplishment for a UMass defense that has had a very tough time shutting the opposition's running attacks down this year.

Another bright side for the Minutemen was quarterback Tim Day's solid performance. Day, who had struggled during the losing streak, was 18-for-33 for 293 yards and a pair of touchdowns.

On the other side, Santos was 16-32 for 98 yards and a touchdown while Granieri was 19-31 for 170 yards and a score in his return. The pair was picked off a combined four times.

half. The Minutewomen were never really a threat to the No. 28 team in the nation as they were out shot 29-7 in the game and 18-3 in the first half.

The Dayton attack was spearheaded by leading scorer Reba Sedalcek. The junior forward notched two goals and an assist in the match.

The split this weekend for UMass was critical as it continues to fight for its playoff lives. The Minutewomen are currently in a three-way tie for seventh place in the conference and will need to move up into the top-six to qualify for the postseason.

The remaining four games for UMass are all against A-10 opponents. This coming weekend will be the biggest of the season for the Minutewomen as they take on Fordham, who is currently hanging onto sixth place in the conference and LaSalle, who is tied with UMass in seventh place.

Pair of golden goals propel UMass back into playoff race unassisted score came in the 26th minute.

UMass responded with a pair of goals coming in a 23 second span to take a 2-1 lead. Junior Oral Bullen scored his sixth goal of the season when he headed in a Mingione pass in the 30th minute.

On the ensuing kickoff, UMass forced a turnover and set up sophomore midfielder Richie Higa for his second goal of the season.

Bullen drove to the net and passed the ball off to Higa, who was positioned just outside the box and tucked a shot inside the right post.

"Higa and Bullen make a good combination because they have great speed, and either can score," Koch said.

The Flyers managed to tie the game at two in the 80th minute when Tye Stebbins placed a shot inside the top right corner of the net for his eighth goal of the season.

Dayton out shot UMass 17-to-10 in the game and held an 8-to-4 advantage on corner kicks, but for much of the game, the Minutemen defense managed to keep Dayton's offense from shooting inside the box.

Billman made five saves on 17 shots and in the loss Troop had three saves on 12 shots

On Sunday, Cirillo scored the game-winner by kicking in a Mike Mingione rebound that had deflected off the right goal-post.

The Minutemen jumped out to an early 1-0 lead when Ian O'Donnell forced the Xavier sweeper into turning the ball over 15 yards in front of the Musketeer net. Anticipating an O'Donnell shot, Xavier goalie Brian Schaefer challenged the ball, and O'Donnell sent a short touch-pass to Higa, who shot into the open net.

Extending the lead to two, freshman Matty LeMire fired an outside shot off the crossbar that bounced out to Bullen who took a shot before the goalie could react at 17:13

The Musketeers responded less than two minutes later when Toni Skudrzik scored an unassisted goal, ending the half 2-1 in favor of UMass.

After the break, Nick Frasher netted his seventh goal of the season off a crossing pass from Skudrzik in the 52nd minute.

Jimmy Cunnings of Xavier gave the Musketters a 3-2 lead when he capitalized on Skudrzik's second assist of the game on a crossing pass at 63:13.

The Minutemen will travel to Fordham and continue their portion of the conference schedule on Friday at 1 p.m.

Wild weekend win

UMass ends four-game skid with comeback win over UNH

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Riding a four-game losing skid and trailing 14-0 against the No. 7 team in the country with the game not even five minutes old, it would have been very easy for the Massachusetts football team to pack it in.

However, the Minutemen stuck to their game plan and rallied back to knock off New Hampshire 38-21 on Saturday in Durham N.H.

UMass	38
UNH	21

UMass tailback Steve Baylark, who won the Bill Knight Trophy which is annually given to the MVP of the game between the New England rivals, led the way and rushed for 192 yards and three touchdowns on 43 carries – all career highs.

UMass, who won its 500th all-time game, returns to action on Saturday, when it travels to Kingston, R.I. to face Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island at 12 p.m.

It marked the second time this season that Baylark has rushed for over 100 yards. Both of those games were against top 10 teams, and UMass (3-4, 1-3 Atlantic 10) to is 2-0 in those contests. His first 100-yard performance was in the 30-20 win over No. 4 Colgate.

"(Baylark) ran the football as well as I've seen it run," UMass coach Don Brown said.

UNH (4-2, 1-2 Atlantic 10) jumped out to a quick 7-0 lead when quarterback Ricky Santos marched the offense down the field during the game's initial possession. Santos was 7-10 for 55 yards on the opening drive and hit Shaun Diner on a seven-yard touchdown pass to put the Wildcats ahead.

UMass quarterback Tim Day had his second pass of the game intercepted by Aaron Thomas who returned it for a 49-yard touchdown.

With the way the Massachusetts offense had played over the past month, scoring only 21 points in the team's last 15 quarters, it appeared as though the team's losing streak was going to reach five games.

"You go down 14-0 in a game like that in Homecoming, and it would have been real easy to mail it in," Brown said.

"I think that just shows the character and the resiliency of our players. It was a win we badly needed and went out and got."

The Minutemen stayed patient, though, and fed the Wildcats a steady diet of Baylark on their way to cutting the lead down to 14-3 before the first quarter ended.

The UMass defense continued to keep their offense in the game, and Baylark rushed for his first touchdown of the game in the second quarter to get the Minutemen to within four points of UNH.

With the UNH passing-based offense unable to crack the extremely talented UMass secondary since the team's first possession, coach Sean McDonnell made an interesting and questionable decision in regards to his quarterbacks.

Cirillo salvages the season

Two golden goals highlight weekend

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team turned its season around this weekend with a pair of nerve-racking, overtime victories against conference foes Xavier and Dayton.

Yesterday, UMass improved to 6-6-2 and 2-1-2 in the Atlantic 10 when Greg Cirillo scored his first goal of the season with 3:49 left in the second overtime period. Friday, UMass defeated Dayton 3-2 thanks to Mike Mingione's golden goal in the 94th minute.

UMass	3
Dayton	2

UMass' upset over Dayton snapped the team's three-game unbeaten streak and dropped the Flyers to 6-5-1 and 3-2-0 in the A-10. Before the match, Dayton was locked in a three-way tie for first in the conference while UMass represented the cutoff team for the A-10 tournament as the sixth seed.

"Both of the teams were ahead of us at the beginning of the weekend, but now we're right up there in the top bunch," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "You can go from the top to the bottom real quick in this conference."

The Minutemen have now played in a team record eight overtimes this year. The previous record was four overtime appearances, set in 1997, and the Minutemen still have five games remaining.

The Maroon and White have been red hot at home, playing to a 4-2 record at Rudd field and going 5-1-2 overall in extended play.

"We don't feel any pressure playing in overtime so there's no extra anxiety," Koch said. "Having played in so many overtimes, we are able to stick to our game plan while other games feel pressured to attack.

On Friday, Mingione got his chance to end the game four minutes into OT when fellow freshman Greg Cirillo forced a Dayton turnover in the UMass offensive zone. Catching the defense out of position, Cirillo passed the ball to Mingione, who fired an outside shot past goalie Matt Troop for his second goal of the season.

Dayton started the scoring when UMass goalie Nick Billman dove to make a save that deflected to Omar Jarun, who kicked in the rebound. The

Canfield kicks UM to victory

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The goal for the Massachusetts women's soccer team this weekend on its trip to Ohio was to come home with three points in the standings. The result of the trip: mission accomplished.

The Minutewomen (5-8, 3-4 Atlantic 10) dropped Friday's contest at Dayton 4-0, but rebounded with a 2-0 victory over Xavier on Sunday.

Xavier	0

UMass returns to action this weekend with a pair of home matches against Atlantic 10 foes Fordham and LaSalle.

The Minutewomen received huge contributions from its two recent A-10 Rookies of the Week in the Xavier game.

Sophomore goalkeeper Kristin Walker, the reigning A-10 Rookie of the Week, turned in her second shutout in three outings, and freshman forward Britt Canfield, who was named Rookie of the Week two weeks ago, provided the offense for UMass.

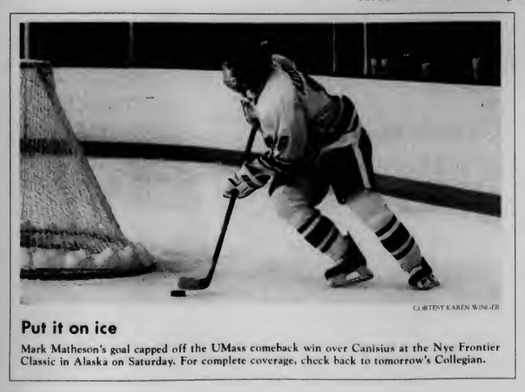
Canfield, known for her ability to provide instant offense, broke a scoreless tie late in the game with two goals in less than two minutes.

With just over 19 minutes remaining in the contest, Canfield scored an unassisted goal, beating the goalie one-on-one. Canfield scored her second goal just over a minute later on an assist by freshman Jenny Roehrig.

That would be all the offense needed for the Maroon and White as Walker recorded six saves en route to blanking the Musketeers (4-10-1, 3-3-1 A-10).

Prior to the goals scored by Canfield, Xavier's defense had been dominant, as they had not allowed a goal in 272 minutes of game action dating back to Oct. 8.

Canfield now has eight goals on the season to lead the Minutewomen in scoring.



Friday's result was not as positive for UMass, but they are not alone among A-10 teams in not being able to slow down powerhouse Dayton. The Flyers improved their league best record to 6-0.

The Flyers have not lost a contest in almost two months as they picked up their 13th consecutive win against the Minutewomen.

Dayton (14-1) opened the scoring early on Tesia Kozlowski's goal 4:52 into the game. The Flyers added a second goal 13 minutes later and took a 2-0 advantage into halftime.

Derosa leads the way

By Eric Athas and Martha Powers
Collegian Staff

Christina Derosa came in first place among Massachusetts runners for the fifth consecutive meet as the Massachusetts women's cross country team came in sixth place at the Albany Invitational. Twenty-one teams competed at the Invitational from all different divisions.

Derosa (18:16) came in ninth place out of 227 runners last Saturday in Albany. Following Derosa was senior Alexis Anzelone (18:47), who finished in 19th place overall. Freshman Cuisle Klerans (18:54, 27th place) rounded out the top three runners for UMass and helped the team to its sixth position. Erin O'Donnel (19:30), Ashley Davidson (19:35), Tricia Silva (19:38), Kara Gillette (19:39) and Amanda Bodette (19:43) finished within seconds of each other.

New Hampshire came in first place overall at the meet and Binghamton came in second.

So far this season, UMass has finished seventh, first, second, 11th and sixth place in their respective meets against stiff competition like it faced last Saturday.

The women's team has a break this weekend as they prepare for the Atlantic 10 Championships on Oct. 30, at Pittsburgh, Penn.

In the men's race in Albany, UMass finished fifth out of 29 teams.

"I was happy with our finish," coach Ken O'Brien said. "We rebounded very well from last week's meet, and this is a truer indication of where we are."

Syracuse finished first, easily beating the entire field. Earlier this season, the Minutemen beat Syracuse.

"Syracuse ran exceptionally well. I found out their team had injuries earlier in the season," O'Brien said. But Syracuse seemed to have overcome them on Saturday when they had "a very impressive, dominating performance," according to O'Brien.

The top finishers for UMass were Ryan Corbett (fifth, 25:23), Matt Klypka (33rd, 26:05), Nils Fischer (40th, 26:20), Matt Clark (46th, 26:24) and Paul Noone (48th, 26:26).

11 arrested in disturbance after Red Sox game

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Eleven people were arrested at the University of Massachusetts early Monday morning during a disturbance in Southwest Residential area for charges ranging from disorderly conduct and failure to disperse to inciting a riot.

No injuries or damage to UMass property were reported to UMass police.

According to UMass police chief Barbara O'Connor, an estimated 800 to 1,000 people crowded into the Southwest Mall at approximately 1:23 a.m. to celebrate the Boston Red Sox's victory over the New York Yankees in the live-hour-two-minute game four of the American League Championship Series.

Students reported that the crowd threw rolls of toilet paper in the air and chanted "Yankees suck" and "Who let the dogs out?" O'Connor said people in the crowd took off their shirts, attempted to start a fire, and set off fireworks, prompting her to give the first of two dispersal orders.

"It was the same kind of behavior we saw ... last year," said O'Connor. "I made the decision to disperse the crowd based on that behavior."

According to O'Connor, several crowds formed in different places, complicating the situation for police. A group in Lot 50 near John Quincy Adams tower threatened to roll over a car. Police stopped individuals from throwing rocks at a Coolidge dorm room window that had a sign that read, "Break this window." A third group gathered on top of the Southwest horseshoe.

O'Connor said that despite repeated and ongoing requests for people to leave the area, many students refused to comply with the dispersal order, causing police to fire several rounds of pepper spray. It took over an hour for police to clear the area.

"I would say [the police work] was successful," said O'Connor. "It was unfortunate we had to do what we had to do."

All available UMass police officers were present in Southwest from the beginning of the game, as well as an undisclosed number of undercover officers among the crowd. Three police horses and one K-9 also responded. Police will rely on housing security cameras to review the incident.

"We take some pride that no one was injured," said O'Connor.

The following students were arrested during the disturbance between 1:23 a.m. and 1:41 a.m. on Monday morning.

Andrew P. Triangle, 18, of Reading, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

William A. Cox, 18, of Wollaston, was arrested for disorderly conduct and attempting to commit a crime.

Brendan O. Luttrell, 21, of Amherst, was arrested for inciting a riot and failure to disperse.

Alexander R. Hamiltaon, 19, of Newbury, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Brett David Miller, 20, of Versailles, Mont., was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

Scott I. Rae, 20, of Shelburne, was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

Hammad S. Chaundhry, 21, of Andover, was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

Charles Thompson, 18, of Nashua, N.H., was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

Carl A. Harmon, 19, of Buckland, was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

Patrick D. Macleod, 19, of Shelburne, was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

Matthew Mark Sullivan, 18, of Easton, was arrested for inciting a riot, failure to disperse, and disorderly conduct.

The last Red Sox-related disturbance on the UMass campus took place on Oct. 17, 2003, after the Boston Red Sox lost Game 7 of the American League Championship Series. It ended in 15 arrests and damage to campus building windows and cars as a crowd of 100 ran up Massachusetts Ave.

UMass students gather in Southwest Residential area in a celebration of the Boston Red Sox's victory over the New York Yankees in the ALCS game Sunday night. The celebration later escalated to a disturbance.

Celebration erupts in Southwest last night

Hundreds of University of Massachusetts students stormed the Southwest quad for the second night in a row last night after The Boston Red Sox defeated the New York Yankees in the fifth game of the America League Championship Series.

At approximately 11 p.m., students were reported to be pouring out of the Southwest dormitories and standing on the pyramid structures, throwing toilet paper, jumping, and waving a Red Sox flag.

The crowd continued to grow in size, and chanted "Yankees suck," and "Big Poppa".

One man reportedly set off a firecracker into the crowd. A small fire started when someone in the crowd lit a branch on fire around 11:15 p.m. Approximately two minutes later, UMass police moved in to break up the crowd, setting off tear gas and shooting "bean bag bullets" according to students. Whether or not a dispersal order was given was not available at press time. The crowd reportedly dispersed behind a dorm.

At least three police were seen on horseback and one K-9 unit was reported. Around 11:25 p.m., students began to fill the pyramids again and another small fire was set. People were reportedly crowd surfing and chanting "F... the cops".

"Being from Philadelphia and hearing about the riots last year, I could have never imagined that this many people could be this passionate about their baseball," said Ty Teltzman, a freshman.

Students reported the crowd to be dispersed by 11:37 p.m. A large firework was shot out of the second or third floor of John Quincy Adams Tower.

"Being a Yankees fan, I think the [disturbances] are ridiculous," said Alison Brick, a sophomore. "I don't see how people can hate the Yankees this much. Sox fans are sore losers, but even more obnoxious winners."

Rivals call foul in Afghan election

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) – The chief rival of interim president, Hamid Karzai, said he has evidence of organized fraud in Afghanistan's election and accused the U.N.-Afghan electoral commission on Monday of ignoring his complaints.

In the second deadly incident surrounding the election, five people were killed by an explosion as they drove near the Pakistan border, the joint U.N.-Afghan electoral commission said. It was unclear whether the vehicle was targeted or whether they hit unexploded ordnance left over from Afghanistan's long civil war.

Karzai, Afghanistan's stopgap president since the fall of the Taliban in 2001, had captured 62.6 percent of the 1.04 million ballots counted by Monday. That put him on course for the simple majority needed to avoid a run-off.

The U.S.-backed incumbent's closest challenger, former Education Minister Yunus Qanooni, was trailing with only 17.7 percent. Ethnic Uzbek warlord Abdul Rashid Dostum was third with 9.3 percent.

Ballots so far have been drawn from 29 of Afghanistan's 34 provinces.

Millions of Afghans braved Taliban threats and poor weather to cast their ballots on Oct. 9, an unlikely democratic experiment after a quarter-century of fighting.

Observers and officials have acknowledged problems, especially with the ink used to mark people's hands to prevent them from voting more than once. A panel of three foreign experts was set up to head off threats by Karzai's 15 opponents to boycott the results.

At a news conference Tuesday, Qanooni said that there is evidence of ballot boxes being filled with Karzai votes in at least four provinces: Ghazni, Herat, Zabul and Kunduz. He says his representatives were threatened when they went to check out suspected ballot-box stuffing in the Zabul province.

He said he has filed more than 30 written complaints to the U.N.-Afghan electoral commission.

"If his excellency Mr. Karzai, my old friend, succeeds in a fair and transparent election, I will congratulate him and cooperate with him," Qanooni told reporters. "But if the result is fraudulent, the legitimacy of this election will be in question."

Establishing the panel delayed the start of the counting and Qanooni, who served as Karzai's Interior and Education Minister, has forecast that the figures will turn in his favor as more votes are tallied.

Four of the five provinces where the count has yet to start are in southern and eastern Afghanistan where Karzai is expected to win. There are no results yet from the 850,000 refugee voters in Iran and Pakistan.

Qanooni also complained that his representatives were unable to monitor ballot boxes during transit from polling stations to counting centers. Organizers acknowledge that some boxes arrived with broken seals, but say that they were damaged by clumsy handling.

"These violations and cheating were organized in advance," Qanooni said.

Sultan Baheen, a spokesman for the electoral commission, rejected Qanooni's charges, saying that the candidate's representatives had declined to accompany ballot boxes brought from Iran and Pakistan.

"There is no indication of what the candidates are saying, that boxes have been emptied and refilled," Baheen added. "There's nothing like that."

Few independent observers believe that Qanooni, a member of the ethnic Tajik minority, could command a country deeply fractured by years of tribal and ethnic warfare.

UMass basketball player arrested Friday morning

A University of Massachusetts basketball player was arrested early Friday morning in an altercation in Lot 50 on John Adams Road in Southwest Residential Area.

Sophomore Maurice C. Maxwell, 22, of Philadelphia, Pa., was arrested at approximately 2 a.m. for assault and battery and disorderly conduct. Maxwell is a forward and returning starter for the Minutemen.

According to UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor, Maxwell was allegedly involved in a disturbance around the Patterson dorm area where one group of people confronted another. O'Connor said Maxwell was allegedly exchanging words with another male party, when an unidentified woman stepped in between the two and Maxwell shoved her.

O'Connor said two cadet officers were present during the altercation and called UMass police, who reported Maxwell to be extremely agitated and to have refused to calm down. Maxwell was then arrested. The UMass athletic department was unable to be reached at press time.

Early voting opens in Florida

COURTESY CNN.COM

University of Florida students gather Sunday night, waiting to be the first voters in the country to cast their early votes in the presidential elections.

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) – Voters began casting ballots Monday in the state synonymous with the election fiasco of 2000, but only a few glitches were reported on a day that marked the start of early voting in several states.

Thirty-two states allow residents to vote at the polls before Election Day, and Texas, Colorado and Arkansas also began the process Monday along with Florida. Several other battleground states have already begun early voting, including Iowa, Nevada, Ohio and New Mexico.

The problems in Florida included a brief computer system crash in one county and voter complaints of incomplete paper ballots. But there were no early reports of problems with the ATM-like touch-screen voting machines introduced since the troubled 2000 election.

Iraqi Prime Minister to extend arms-for-cash

By Tini Tran
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Iraqi Prime Minister Ayad Allawi announced plans Monday to extend a cash-for-weapons program for Shiite fighters in Baghdad's Sadr City to cities nationwide in an attempt to disarm the country.

The announcement came as fresh violence erupted in Baghdad and Mosul. Multiple car bombs over a two-day period claimed at least 12 lives and a militant group, the Islamic Army in Iraq, claimed to have beheaded two Macedonian hostages.

The government launched the cash-for-guns program in Sadr City as part of a deal to end weeks of fighting in the Shiite district of Baghdad and has twice extended the deadline for fighters to hand in their weapons.

On Monday, Allawi told the National Council, a government oversight body, that the program is going so well he wants to extend it to the rest of Iraq.

"The government is determined to disarm cities and neighborhoods because our forces are now ready to fight terrorists and there's no justification for people to keep weapons at home," Allawi said.

Iraqi officials hope that Sunni Muslim leaders in the insurgent-torn city of Fallujah can be persuaded to negotiate a similar weapons buyback deal.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Ayad Allawi speaks to a joint meeting of Congress last September.

But Fallujah, the focal point of the Sunni rebellion, presents a tougher challenge. Hopes that peace talks could resume there quickly were dashed when the city's chief negotiator, Sheik Khaled al-Jumeili, ruled out any quick resumption of talks, despite his release Monday from U.S. custody.

"I'm negotiating on behalf of Fallujah people – civilians, kids, women who have no power except by being represented by somebody," al-Jumeili told Al-Arabiya television. "Since the situation has gotten to this, each can go wherever they want and we don't need to talk about negotiations."

Al-Jumeili was detained Friday a day after talks broke down over the government's demand that the city hand over terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, who Fallujah's clerics claim isn't there.

Car bombs strike Mosul, Baghdad

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

Six people were killed late Sunday when a car bomb exploded in central Baghdad, injuring 26 people near a café.

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – Car bombers struck Baghdad and Mosul, raising the two-day death toll from the weapons to 12 by Monday. The chief negotiator for the city of Fallujah dashed hopes for a quick resumption of peace talks despite his release by U.S. and Iraqi authorities.

In Mosul, a car bomb detonated Sunday morning on a bridge, killing five Iraqis and wounding 15 others, the U.S. military said Monday. The blast occurred when the suicide car-bomber collided with another car, setting off a giant blaze that damaged several other vehicles. A car bomber Monday hit a civilian convoy, killing one and wounding four others.

In Baghdad, a car bomb exploded late Sunday near a police patrol in the Jadiriyah district, killing six people, including three police officers, and wounding 26 others. The blast hit a cafe near the Australian Embassy, although there were no Australian casualties.

The American death toll in the Iraq war reached a grim milestone this weekend: 1,100. The crash of two Army helicopters Saturday raised the toll to 1,097 service members and three civilians. The Associated Press count includes accidental and non-combat deaths.

The Washington Post reported Monday that Army Lt. Gen. Ricardo Sanchez, commander of U.S. forces in Iraq at the time, sent a letter to the Pentagon in December 2003 complaining that supplies were short and that this was adversely affecting the ability of troops to fight.

Sanchez, who has returned to an assignment in Germany, told top Army officials in the Dec. 4 letter that there was a severe lack of key parts for equipment vital to the mission and that the problem was so severe that "I cannot continue to support sustained combat operations with rates this low," the newspaper said.

Sanchez was the top-ranking commander of U.S. forces in Iraq from mid-2003 through this summer.

Soldiers who refused orders were unarmed

By Jim Krane
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) – The U.S. Army Reserve soldiers who refused orders to drive a dangerous route were members of one of a few supply units whose trucks are still unarmored, their commanding general said Sunday.

The soldiers, now under investigation, had previously focused on local missions in safer parts of southern Iraq and had never driven a convoy north along the attack-prone roads passing through Baghdad.

"Not all of their trucks are completely armored. In their case, they haven't had the chance to get armored," said Brig. Gen. James E. Chambers, commanding general of 13th Corps Support Command, which sends some 250 convoys ferrying Army fuel, food and ammunition across Iraq each day.

Chambers, speaking at a press conference in Baghdad, said the 18 soldiers involved in the incident had returned to duty and it was "too early" to determine if any will undergo disciplinary action.

He said a pair of investigations are examining the soldiers' disobedience as well as their allegations that the trucks were unfit for the hazardous journey. He declined to discuss particulars, citing the soldiers' rights.

Chambers said 80 percent of the 13th Coscom's 4,000 trucks have been fitted with custom steel plate, but some of those in the unit that balked, the 343rd Quartermaster Company, were among the last left unarmored, because the unit's mission normally confines it to a less dangerous part of Iraq.

None of the 13th Coscom's trucks arrived in Iraq with armor. Since February, the unit's engineers and private contractors have been working in impromptu maintenance yards to weld heavy metal "boxes" over truck cabs.

Chambers said the 18 soldiers who refused the mission on Wednesday morning - driving seven fuel tankers from Tallil air base near Nasiriyah to Taji north of Baghdad - appeared to have also balked at their mission because of the trucks' bad condition.

"They were concerned about the maintenance," Chambers said. "If there is a maintenance issue, we'll clear it up."

Chambers downplayed the incident, saying the disobedience was not indicative of wider U.S. Army morale or maintenance problems. The 18 soldiers were "moved to a separate location" for questioning and have all since returned to duty, the general said.

But Chambers did not downplay the danger of driving Iraq's roads, a job that has become the equivalent of front-line combat with Iraq's insurgency, whose deadliest weapon is the hidden roadside bomb.

"In Jim Chambers' opinion, the most dangerous job in Iraq is driving a truck," he said. Soldiers take their missions realizing "it's not if, but when, they will be attacked."

The Army announced last week it was investigating up to 19 members of a platoon from the 343rd Quartermaster Company based in Rock Hill, South Carolina.

Artificial heart approved by FDA

By Diedtra Henderson
Associated Press

The FDA approved the CardioWest Total Artificial Heart yesterday.

WASHINGTON (AP) – The Food and Drug Administration said Monday it has approved the first temporary artificial heart for use in patients at risk of dying within 30 days as they await a heart transplant.

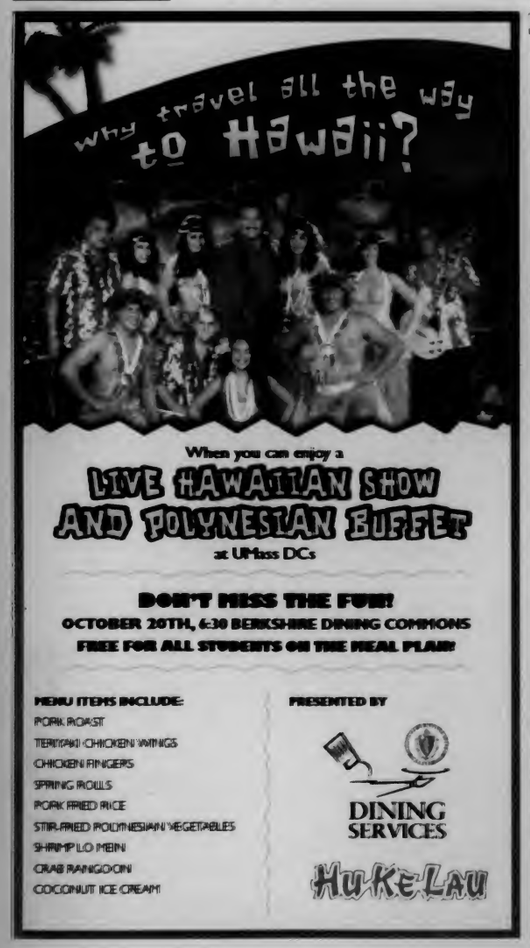
The CardioWest Total Artificial Heart, manufactured by SynCardia Systems of Tucson, Ariz., takes over for the patient's failing heart, restoring normal blood pressure and shoring up such vital organs as the kidney and liver. The "bridge" device is intended to help keep patients alive long enough for a heart transplant.

An FDA advisory committee in March recommended that the agency approve the device with caution, since complex surgery to install the device raises the potential for such complications as infection, bleeding and stroke. Despite those risks, the panel found the device to have benefits for a small number of patients with no other choice.

The FDA approved the temporary artificial heart for patients awaiting heart transplants who don't respond to other treatment and who are likely to die within 30 days due to non-reversible, bi-ventricular failure. In such cases, patients typically are short of breath, even while resting, because their weakened hearts cannot efficiently pump blood.

Donna-Bea Tillman, director of the FDA's Office of Device Evaluation, said the artificial heart to be an option for a very small group of patients, perhaps 100 a year in the United States.

Of 2,200 patients who get heart transplants each year, roughly 500 need some temporary assistance to ensure they're still alive when the donor heart arrives. Within the group of 4,000 waiting for heart transplants, 100 have non-reversible failure affecting both the left and right sides of their heart.



SynCardia's clinical trials looked at using the artificial heart in 81 patients eligible for transplants at five medical centers. All the patients had severe bi-ventricular heart failure.

Jury convicts man of killing pregnant 14-year-old girl and unborn child

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – A jury on Monday convicted a man of murdering a pregnant 14-year-old girl - six months after a different jury acquitted the girl's boyfriend of the gruesome slaying that ended with the girl buried alive.

Lord Hampton, 25, was found guilty of two counts of first-degree murder in the Sept. 28, 1999, slaying of Chauntae Jones and her unborn child. Jones was eight months pregnant when she disappeared just weeks after starting eighth grade.

Jones' body was found more than a month later, buried in a shallow grave on the grounds of the old Boston State Hospital. She had been stabbed, beaten with a rock and buried alive.

Kyle Bryant, Hampton's lifelong friend, was acquitted in April of identical charges in a verdict that infuriated the victim's family and friends.

"I wish they had the death sentence. I'd pull the switch," Pamela Jones, Chauntae's mother, said outside the courtroom. "His friend should have got it, too. Both of them should have got life."

Each man fingered the other, but both were prosecuted under a law saying participants in a joint criminal venture are equally to blame, even if only one actually did the killing.

Judge Nancy Staffier-Holtz denied a defense motion after the verdict to lessen the sentence, dismissing attorney Randy Gioia's plea for leniency on the grounds that Hampton had a hard upbringing and "was not the main antagonist" in the murder.

"Clearly, the jury disagreed with that," Staffier-Holtz told Gioia. "It was murder, cold-blooded, plain and simple."

Shawannika Jones, 38, speaking to the court on behalf of her family, said Hampton should have helped them locate her cousin's body in the weeks after the murder.

"Now he's crying," she said, looking at Hampton. "He feels what we felt. He's going to rot in hell. He's going to get what he deserves."

During Hampton's trial, Assistant District Attorney David Meier repeatedly described Hampton and Bryant as "two men together with a purpose and a plan" who plotted every detail of the crime together, then carried it out together.

Meier said they "together butchered that 14-year-old girl, using a rock, using a brick, using a knife, using a shovel." During closing arguments, the prosecutor showed the jury an X-ray of Jones' fetus from her autopsy.

On an audio tape played for the jury, Hampton said Bryant stabbed Jones, dumped her face-first in a shallow grave and then jumped on her back.

On the tape, Hampton admitted that he helped pile dirt on Jones while she was still alive. But on the witness stand he said he was miles away when she was killed.

Hampton testified that he made a false confession because he had been interrogated by police for hours and believed they would let him go home if he told them what they wanted to hear.

Bryant, the father of Jones' baby, told police it was Hampton who actually killed Jones. He said he stood by as Hampton tried to sexually assault Jones, then choked her, stabbed her with a six-inch steak knife, and bludgeoned her as she yelled, "Kyle, help me!"

Bryant said Hampton decided to kill Jones as a favor to him and hoped he would repay him by killing a man in Roxbury.

Gioia said Hampton was scapegoated by prosecutors eager to hold someone responsible for the horrific crime.

"I do feel like he wasn't on an equal basis with the other person," Gioia said after the verdict.

Chauntae Jones was buried alive in September of 1999. Her boyfriend was acquitted of the killing six month ago.

Gioia said Hampton had no reason to kill Jones, but Bryant did. Three months before Jones was killed, a juvenile court judge threatened to prosecute Bryant on statutory rape charges for getting her pregnant. Jones was 13 when she became pregnant; Bryant was 17.

The first-degree murder conviction carries an automatic sentence of life in prison without parole. Staffier-Holtz denied Gioia's motion to have the sentences run consecutively.

Criticism reported over gay bishop

By Robert Barr
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) – An Anglican commission sharply criticized the U.S. Episcopal Church on Monday for consecrating a gay bishop and called on the Americans to apologize.

The presiding bishop of the Episcopal Church quickly expressed regret for the turmoil set off by the consecration of V. Gene Robinson as bishop of New Hampshire but did not apologize for the church's decision to confirm the appointment.

The commission, led by Irish Anglican leader Robin Eames, stopped far short of demands from conservatives to expel the U.S. church and made no recommendations about whether Robinson should be removed.

It urged the Episcopal Church to refrain from promoting any other clergy living in a homosexual union and proposed that the 38 national churches constituting the Anglican Communion sign a covenant expressing their support for what it called current Anglican teachings.

The report also called on conservative bishops who have offered to forge relationships with disaffected Episcopal congregations to desist from such activities, apologize and affirm their desire to remain within the Anglican Communion.

It further urged those archbishops and bishops who have intervened with Episcopal churches to seek an accommodation with the Episcopal bishop or bishops involved.

In consecrating Robinson last November, the report said, the Episcopal bishops "acted in the full knowledge that very many people in the Anglican Communion could neither recognize nor receive the ministry as a bishop in the church of God of a person in an openly acknowledged same-gender union."

The report invited the Episcopal Church "to express its regret that the proper constraints of the bonds of affection were breached" in Robinson's election. Until there is an apology, the report said, those who took part in consecrating Robinson – which would include Presiding Bishop Frank Griswold – should consider withdrawing themselves from functions of the Anglican Communion.

It also invited the Episcopal Church to call a moratorium on promoting any other person living in a same-gender union to the bishopric "until some new consensus in the Anglican Communion emerges."

Griswold previously expressed regret for the turmoil and withdrew as co-chairman of an Anglican ecumenical body.

Robinson's consecration as bishop has incited anger and criticism among Anglicans internationally.

Bush signs Homeland Security bill

By Jennifer Loven
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) – President Bush signed legislation Monday that gives the Department of Homeland Security about $33 billion to shore up the nation's borders, inspect incoming cargo, protect potential terror targets and train first responders.

Bush signed the bill before leaving the White House for New Jersey, where he delivered a campaign speech in which he attacked Democratic Sen. John Kerry on a wide range of national security issues.

Homeland Security Secretary Tom Ridge and members of Congress were among those looking on at the brief Oval Office signing ceremony open only to news photographers.

Later, speaking in Marlton, N.J., Bush said the law will improve national security through outlays for port security, Coast Guard patrols, the Federal Air Marshal Program, anti-missile technology for aircraft, foreign visitor inspections and security at chemical facilities, nuclear plants, water-treatment plants, bridges, subways and tunnels.

The ranking Democrat on the House Select Committee on Homeland Security said Bush has done too little to secure the nation. Rep. Jim Turner, D-Texas, cited deficiencies in the inspection of cargo for nuclear and radiological material, the lack of a comprehensive terrorist watch list and the small percentage of airplane cargo that is screened for explosives.

"The truth of the matter is that the administration is not doing everything it can and should be doing to protect the homeland," Turner said.

The committee's chairman, Christopher Cox, R-Calif., countered: "Instead of making partisan attacks, it is time for Democrats to check the facts. Today, America is safer than it has ever been before."

The $33 billion measure, almost $900 million more than Bush had proposed, finances the Department of Homeland Security for the current fiscal year, which began Oct. 1.

It cuts spending on police and emergency responders from last year's levels by about $500 million to $3.6 billion for police and other emergency responders. The measure also provides $5.1 billion for the Transportation Security Administration, which is required to triple the amount of cargo inspected on passenger airliners in the next year.

'Too early' to punish soldiers who refused orders officials say

Also Monday, military spokesman Maj. Richard Spiegel reiterated it was "too early" to say if any disciplinary action will be taken against a group of 18 U.S. Army Reserve soldiers who refused orders to drive a dangerous route.

On Sunday, Brig. Gen. James E. Chambers, commanding general of 13th Corps Support Command, said a pair of investigations are examining the soldiers' disobedience as well as their allegations that the trucks were unfit for the hazardous journey. He declined to discuss particulars, citing the soldiers' rights.

Chambers said the 18 soldiers who refused the mission on Wednesday of driving seven fuel tankers from Tallil air base near Nasiriyah to Taji north of Baghdad also appeared to have also balked at their mission because of the trucks' poor maintenance.

On Monday, Spiegel said, "It is too early in the process to tell if any disciplinary actions will be initiated. That cannot be determined until the investigation is complete and recommendations are made to the appropriate level of command."

Meanwhile, Fallujah negotiator Sheik Khaled al-Jumeili said peace talks to end the standoff in Iraq's major insurgent bastion will remain suspended as a protest against his detention by U.S. troops, who accused him of representing the militants.

"The fact is that I'm negotiating on behalf of Fallujah people - civilians, kids, women - who have no power but through being represented by somebody. Since the situation has got up to this, each can go wherever they want and we don't need to talk about negotiations," he told Al-Arabiya TV.

Al-Jumeili told the AP he was released Monday from U.S. and Iraqi custody after being detained Friday after talks broke down over the city's rejection of a demand by Prime Minister Ayad Allawi to turn over terrorist leader Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Al-Zarqawi's group Tawhid and Jihad has claimed responsibility in numerous beheadings and suicide bombings, including two attacks on Baghdad's Green Zone last week that killed six, including four U.S. civilians.

Witnesses said al-Jumeili was picked up after leaving a mosque following prayers in a village about 10 miles south of Fallujah.

Al-Jumeili said he was taken to a Marine base outside Fallujah and then by helicopter to another location. During his detention, al-Jumeili said he was treated well by the Americans and was not handcuffed or blindfolded like his companions. The other three men have not been released, he said.

The Interior Ministry said al-Jumeili was being released on orders of Allawi.

Diversity commission's intentions questionable

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi announced the creation of the Commission on Racial Diversity at a press conference on Friday.

At the press conference, a student asked Lombardi if the commission had been formed as a direct result of the recent controversy over photos of members of the Student Government Association posing alongside caricatures of a Ku Klux Klan member. His answer was the obvious one as well as the right one. By saying that it is a result of a series of race-related problems, the administration is making it seem like they are trying to get to the root of the problem, rather than simply dealing with a single, isolated incident.

In a Daily Collegian article from Oct. 18, it was noted that "officials and administrators are concerned that the current approach is not as effective as it could be" in dealing with issues of racial diversity. This was obviously a reference to the recent SGA controversy. Clearly, the administration would not have formed this commission if the photos had not surfaced.

The Office of ALANA Affairs criticized the administration following the surfacing of the SGA photos for not doing enough to promote racial diversity on campus. Now, according to a statement read at the press conference, ALANA is critical of the formation of the committee, saying that it will take away from the work that is supposed to be done by student minority groups.

While this may seem like a contradiction, and indeed it is on certain levels, the administration cannot expect groups such as ALANA to be satisfied. At least not until the newly formed commission has accomplished anything.

To say that the administration took a step in the right direction by forming this commission would be easy. Of course creating a group to promote and ensure racial equality is a good thing. But there are many questions that still remain. Now that the commission is formed, how effective will it be? How well will it communicate with the students, whether they are minorities or not? Will the commission prove to be a band-aid, appeasing a portion of the campus community, or will it actually produce tangible results that better life for all on campus?

Provost Charlena Seymour said that UMass students should forget the past, and focus on the positive future that is in store for the University. She also said that the administration is not trying to "sweep racism under the rug."

One begins to wonder how much of the commission is meant to move forward, and how much is an attempt to undo previous mistakes.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

If the title made you sick, I would recommend that you stop reading right now. What I will say may render you in critical condition, much like the local baseball team.

Last year, I was watching Game 7 of the ALCS in my room, one of the only Yankees fans among a hostile crowd. Throughout the entire game, it seemed as though the Red Sox were on their way to winning and the fans sure knew how to tell me about it.

Whenever there was a Red Sox hit or run I would mute the television so that we could all hear the reaction of the entire living area. There was no doubt that almost every student was tuned into that game. The room was nearly shaking from all the cheering. Then it happened. Aaron Boone, who had been batting .119, hit the game-winning walk off home run to clinch the series and send the Yankees to yet another world series.

I hit the mute button once again. If teardrops falling on cold, dorm room floors would make a sound, it would have sounded like a flood. Instead, there was dead silence. I turned to the rest of my "friends" and said, "You see that, my friends, is the sound of a Yankees victory at UMass." To me, the silence never sounded so sweet.

You see, Yankees fans do not hate the Red Sox. In fact, hating is not what we do; winning is. There is something about the Red Sox fan culture that is disturbing. Call it the "Yankees-Sox Phenomenon" if you will. There seems to be so much hatred for the Yankees that has built up over the years that it is more common to be anti-Yankees than it is to be a Red Sox fan.

At riots after the Super Bowl, the fans cheered, "Yankees Suck." They knew very well that it was not baseball season; they could not have had that much beer. Still, they were persistent in identifying as anti-Yankees as if it was the one thing that really held New Englanders together. They choose to unite under mutual dislike for the "evil empire" but the reality is the "empire" does not think the same way.

There is a winning tradition in the Yankees organization. I do not want to hear anything about having lots of money. Sure, the Yankees pay a lot of money, but that's not what it's about. If money buys championships, why can't the Dodgers win, why can't the Redskins win, why do the Devils win? Money plays a roll, that's for sure. It even explains why the Royals may never win, but there is definitely more to it than that.

If the Red Sox want to change the way things are going and have been going since 1918, they need to start thinking about this hair thing and, when it comes down to it, discipline and seriousness.

While thinking about this, I realized that the answer is hair. Now, let me explain. I began to think how an organization like the NHL's New Jersey Devils and the Yankees could differ so dramatically in payroll, yet put out such competitive teams every year.

Discipline is the key. No player on the Devils skates with a number higher than 29. No one wears 99 or 77 or 88. Those numbers are for players who want to stand out as individuals. No Yankees player has long hair or unkempt facial hair. Yeah, maybe it took the swing out of Jason Giambi's bat. But you know what, that's the price you pay for becoming a Yankee. If you want to play for a team with such a winning tradition, you must give up your individualism. No Yankee has their name on a jersey, neither home nor away. Your only identity is pinstripes.

Sure, it sounds silly to say it's about hair, but it really reflects on the nature of the team. On the Red Sox you have the guy with dread locks, the guy with the fro and of course, the last of the Mohicans (or Jesus, from what I have heard). There are so many individuals on the Red Sox, I have trouble finding a team.

The Yankees can make a player like Alex Rodriguez, a player of MVP status, yield before a championship tradition. No goatee, no fro, no bleached hair. Yankees are professional. They are there to win and are hired to be professional winners.

One of the problems with the Red Sox is their lack of professionalism. Yeah, maybe Steinbrenner is mean, but he is efficient. If the Red Sox want to change the way things are going and have been going since 1918, they need to start thinking about this hair thing and, when it comes down to it, discipline and seriousness. Just because a guy on your team looks like Jesus doesn't mean he will deliver you from your sorrows. No individual will; no hatred for another team will.

To all Red Sox fans I say this: Stop displacing responsibility, stop blaming the Yankees, stop blaming big check books, stop blaming curses and lastly, stop "believing" because to be a winner, you don't believe. You just know.

Dining common TVs must go

Mike Sances

The budget crisis at this university is well-enough documented that I need not go into it here; suffice it to say that it was with a certain stupid incredulity that I first encountered the new plasma billboards recently installed in each of the four corners of the Hillside Room in the Worcester Dining Commons.

Indeed, the seeming fiscal absurdity alone ought to have been enough to incite mass rioting among students ever eager for the chance to destroy property and trade blows with the local police. Curious as to why this was not taking place, I contacted Ken Toong, Director of Dining Services, who kindly agreed to meet with me and answer any questions I had regarding this mysterious lack of outrage.

Mr. Toong explained to me what I can only presume everyone else had already known: that the new additions to Worcester were not funded by tax dollars, but were instead made possible by surpluses amassed by Dining Services itself, which is actually a self-sufficient organization receiving not one cent from the state.

That sounded reasonable enough (though I half-expected the televisions to have been received at no charge at all, considering the heavy exposure to products and advertising diners are now to be subjected to — but I digress). Yet with the foremost issue defused, new questions arose.

Whose idea was it to install these billboards — or "televisions," as they are often called — anyway? What of these strange ballots handed out at the entrance days after their appearance, asking students if they were for or against them? And why were students not asked this beforehand instead of merely after the fact? This is our dining hall, after all — isn't it?

I was reminded that back in February Dining Services took a poll on their web site, asking students what they believed would best enhance their dining experience. Of the five choices — "reality shows," "live music," "feature movies," "plasma televisions," and "clowns" — half of roughly four hundred respondents had chosen "plasma televisions." I remembered the survey; I also remembered being a little confused as to why the survey did not include an option of "none of the above" for those satisfied with the dining commons as they were.

I raised this issue with Mr. Toong, who replied that the software used to run the survey only allows for a maximum of five options. No matter that almost no one had humor enough to select "clowns" as their preference, or the simple fact that television was ultimately the least obtrusive option on the menu:

Whose idea was it to install these billboards — or "televisions," as they are often called — anyway? ... and why were students not asked this beforehand instead of merely after the fact? This is our dining hall, after all - isn't it?

the people — well, four hundred out of about six thousand daily Worcester customers, at least — had spoken. Driving the democracy point home even further, diners again voted overwhelmingly in favor of the televisions on Oct. 5 — 165 to 41.

Financial and democratic considerations aside, I would have thought it just as obvious, especially at a university such as this, that the value of television — moral, intellectual, and entertainment-wise — ranges anywhere from benignly useless to utterly deplorable. Indeed, so clear is this fact to our society that even ridiculing the machine is one of the most tired clichés, possibly in human history. And that characterization deals with the programming alone.

It is also a significant annoyance to anyone trying to get their homework done or to simply enjoy a quiet meal or, God forbid, to have a conversation with their peers — all of which are now hindered by a simultaneous bombardment of advertising, "news" (from the same networks who miscalled the 2000 election and misled the nation into war), and the multitudes of "daytime" shows (not to mention the eclectic sounds emanating from the dish room).

Diners who actually enjoy television, it might be pointed out, are not allowed access to the remote controls. If unhappy with the volume or channel, they are required to make a request to the staff. It remains unclear how different diners' conflicting wishes are to be reconciled within such a system. Personally, I would suggest putting all the televisions on captions and eliminating the audio — if I were in favor of them remaining at Worcester at all. I'm obviously not; but, since there doesn't seem to be anyone else as incensed about this as I am, I must, like Dining Services, conclude that the lack of protest here signals consent.

Despite all the negative things I have to say on this matter, I must credit Ken Toong and Dining Services for their readiness to accommodate what they perceive as student feedback — on this and other issues as well, such as keeping the dining halls open later. Unfortunately, I feel that there has been a critical misunderstanding on this particular issue.

While I'm aware that mine may be a lonely voice, I still urge anyone of a similar mind to contact Dining Services via their Web site – or perhaps, even, to take the time to respond to the next poll.

False assumptions of D&D

Stacy Kasdin

This past Saturday was the 30th anniversary of one of the greatest games of all time. Roll your charisma check to see if you're invited to the party. If that made any sense to you, you know I'm talking about Dungeons & Dragons. For those who are a little confused, I'll explain. Essentially D&D is a fantasy, role-playing game. Each player creates a character, and one person creates a story, a quest for these characters to go on. Generally these games are set in a medieval time period, although modern games have been becoming more common recently.

I'd never even heard of this game until my sophomore year of college. Three of my friends had started a game and for lack of anything better to do, I sat in and watched one day.

I was hooked. Now it doesn't sound like much, sitting around a table looking through books and sheets and rolling dice, but if you have good players and a good story, it's a lot of fun. I made a character for their game within the next week or so. To date, we have six people playing in our game, and have unfortunately had to turn potential players away due to lack of room at the table.

When we play this game we don't drink each other's blood, we don't worship Satan, we don't rub jell-o all over ourselves and we don't dance around a bonfire.

I don't know what people have heard about Dungeons & Dragons, if anything, but due to some stories I've heard from friends about the discrimination they've received, I feel I should clarify a few things.

When we play this game we don't drink each other's blood, we don't worship Satan, we don't rub jell-o all over ourselves and we don't dance around a bonfire. We're just normal, regular people, who happen to get together on Thursday nights to play a game with our friends. It's really not much different than your poker nights, except we're being more creative.

Although the game was most popular in the 1980s, approximately 4 million people still play Dungeons & Dragons on a regular basis. With the recent popularity of the "Lord of the Rings Trilogy" and "Harry Potter", more and more people are getting interested in the game. One of the people I play with has a six-year-old son who has already joined in with us on a few battles. No, there's no actual hitting in these battles. It's all about rolling dice.

There are books you can buy that tell you the rules for the game so you know how much to add to each dice roll, the statistics on the things you're trying to beat, and how to create your own characters.

This all may sound very confusing, but it's fairly easy to get the hang of. I'll give you an example. My character in our current game is a psion. This means she has magic powers that she controls with her mind. She's 15 years old, and her name is Victoria. Basically, to create a character you just create a physical description, a background story and what you want them to be good at, for example fighting or magic. In the past I've played an assassin and a priestess. They both died last year trying to save the world from an evil, undead wizard. Okay, so it sounds a little silly, but that silliness in itself should be able to attest that the game is all in good fun.

My characters have killed a lot of people in this game. I've never so much as punched someone in real life. That's the whole point of fantasy. That's why people read books, watch movies, and act in plays. Sometimes it's fun being something or someone you're not for a while. Going to the same classes every week and writing papers and taking exams leaves a person desperate for a change in the monotony. Even if there's nothing else exciting going on in my week, I know I have Thursday to look forward to, with a segment of Victoria and company's latest adventure.

If someone had asked me five years ago what I thought I'd be doing for fun when I got to college I certainly wouldn't have said Dungeons & Dragons. I didn't even know what it was. Although, in a way, I'm sort of glad I didn't know anything about it, because I didn't know any of the stereotypes about people who play or the game itself.

I know I used to make a lot of decisions about what I did or did not like based on how it sounded without actually trying it. In this case, I was able to approach the whole situation with an open mind. I imagine if someone had simply told me about a game where people make up characters and roll dice to see what they do, I might not have been particularly interested; but to truly experience the game, you really have to watch it in action.

I've been a gamer for two-and-a-half years now. A few weeks ago, I even made my first attempt at running my own game. Sure, we're geeks, but we have fun. Remember, there are more people playing than you think. That kid sitting next to you in class could be a gamer. Or your roommate. Or even your boss. Why not ask? If you're looking for an escape from classes and homework or just for a good time, and you have a vivid imagination, this may be the game for you. You've got nothing to lose but a bunch of boring nights sitting in front of the TV.

'James Baldwin: Down from the mountaintop'
Bowker Auditorium
UMass
Oct. 16th

By Christopher Gazzara
Collegian Correspondent

The acting of Calvin Levels in his performance of his new solo show, "James Baldwin: Down from the Mountaintop," was convincing, though at times it felt as if the show were more a lecture by Baldwin himself. Rather than putting on an entertaining yet informative play, it seemed that the point was to educate, rather than stimulate.

The structure of the piece was a timeline ranging from Baldwin's birth in 1924 in Harlem to his death from esophageal cancer in 1987. In between, Levels, a Tony Award nominee, painted a stunning picture of New York, Paris, and the many writings of the talented, black author.

At the start of the show, the audience was pin-drop silent as Levels brought us into the world of James Baldwin. Armed with only a few glasses of liquor on the rocks, Levels (as Baldwin) began to describe his experiences as a 14-year-old Minister in his local church. His enthusiasm was outstanding through this particular part of the show.

Later, as the show matured, Baldwin also matures and begins to speak on his experiences with painter friends who taught him how to really see the world and how to look within himself. He begins to work with Hollywood big-shots, and it is here that Levels brought out both the humor in the character and the confusion that surrounded Baldwin's sexual life.

He tells of an incident between Baldwin and the late Marlon Brando. He found Brando attractive, and as Levels put it, apparently Brando didn't think Baldwin was so bad himself. While describing the many interesting people that littered Baldwin's life, Levels is warm and charming, but unfortunately fails to capture a deeper essence of these key players.

After talking about Brando, Levels sends us back to Baldwin's first sexual encounter with a man in an alley. This moment was particularly risqué due to the fact that he described the encounter start to finish. This moment was well-executed, because it was about the fear and confusion that Baldwin felt during the encounter, and Levels did an amazing job at letting that shine through. Later the inclusion of this incident was well-supported when Baldwin explains that his novel, "Giovanni's Room," was misinterpreted as being a purely homosexual book. It turns out that it, too, was about fear and confusion rather than mere sex.

Another important part of the show was when Baldwin described life in the segregated South. He spoke of joining Martin Luther King, Jr. and others who fought in the early civil rights movement.

Even though these moments were outstanding, the show became less personal and more factual. Levels ran through the bullet points of meeting studio actors and personalities like Lee Strasburg, but it was done so blandly that it was hard to distinguish one person's character and achievements from the others'. Again, the spirits of these people were often missing.

Some of the confusion about the material may have been rooted in the fact that some topics seemed downplayed (for instance his work with Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy) while others (like his sex life) were highlighted.

The show had an interesting technical aspect, as well. The set, which included a few living room chairs and a projection screen, was at times used significantly and other times it proved to be barely useful. Pictures were flashed on the screen behind Levels in an attempt to send underlying messages to the audience, a technique often found in the works of Tennessee Williams, who happens to be a figure sited in "Down from the Mountaintop."

The pictures on the screen actually made the dialogue seem weak, ironically. Often, the random and infrequent changing of the pictures actually served to startle the audience, rather than instill a mood. When the picture fit the moment well, however, the effect was worthwhile.

A touching factor that played into the evening was the celebration of Baldwin's work here at UMass and in the Five College community. He taught and lectured here and at many other universities and colleges until his death. There was a true connection through that fact, which was especially noticeable in Level's thank you to the audience, where he spoke further about Baldwin's work in higher education.

Overall the important message that the play carried really made the show. We must be ourselves, and always do what makes us most inspired, even until the end. We cannot give into prejudice, fear, or obstacles that others try to place in front of us.

Compared to past releases 'Size Matters' doesn't make the grade

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

The first mistake Helmet, or rather Helmet mastermind Page Hamilton and his friends, made on "Size Matters," the first new disc from the influential hard-rockers since 1997's "Aftertaste," was the title. Sure, it's a phallic-minded joke that connects it to the band's first album, "Strap It On," but when naming an album "Size Matters," it should, especially after seven long years of no commercial output, be longer then 39 minutes.

Helmet
'Size Matters'
Interscope

Actually, the first mistake that Helmet made with "Size Matters" was releasing it. It is truly painful to declare the long-awaited disc a colossal disappointment, but it very well may have been better for Hamilton to take a few more years and come up with a full album of great material. Perhaps the most frustrating thing about "Size Matters" is that it is so hard to place the blame and figure out why the ever-improving Helmet's new album is their worst.

Many longtime fans place the blame on the new lineup. Since Helmet's breakup following "Aftertaste," Hamilton has played with various musicians, including a band he formed named Gandhi that toured but never released anything. Now he has decided to work under the name Helmet, but with none of the other original members. While this very well may be a sore point, and perhaps irrational, it does not explain the mess that is currently sitting in record stores next to Helmet's classic albums. In fact the musicianship is just as good as it is on other Helmet albums. Guitarist Chris Traynor (formerly of Orange 9mm and Bush) and drummer John Tempesta (formerly of White Zombie) have proven time and time again to be great musicians, and their work on "Size Matters" measures up to the rest of their catalogues. Hamilton himself sounds fairly good, too. From "Strap It On" through "Aftertaste," Hamilton became less of a screamer and more of a singer. On "Size Matters," the singing is still as good as when Hamilton left the public eye, but his screams feel more forced and, in songs like "Crashing Foreign Cars," practically reach the point of parody.

It seems like most of the blame can be thrust upon the songwriting. "Crashing Foreign Cars," vocals aside, is built around such a generic chug-chug riff that most people would assume it's a track by a Helmet rip-off band.

"Surgery" is not a bad song, but it simply doesn't have the energy or creativity of earlier Helmet work. If anything, it sounds like an "Aftertaste" outtake.

"Throwing Punches," a song that was released previously under Hamilton's name on the "Underworld" soundtrack, is built around such a dull riff that the song sounds bored with itself.

But perhaps it's not the songwriting that is responsible for the poor album. Two tracks, "Enemies" and "Everybody Loves You," were leaked to the Internet a few years ago as part of a demo Hamilton made. Those live songs were arguably superior to "Aftertaste" and stirred a lot of interest from Helmet fans, getting hopes up that Hamilton still had some amazing tricks up his sleeves.

Now, years later, the two very strong tracks have been re-recorded, very slightly re-written, and while they are two of the better tracks on "Size Matters," they do not nearly reach the heights that the demo versions reached.

Perhaps the general lack of life and the missing spark that made Helmet so exciting are due to the fact that, for the first time, the band has brought Protools into the mix.

The digital recording device might clean the music up and make for some easy overdubbing, but perhaps it is to blame for the artificial, soulless sound that permeates the album. Or maybe Hamilton was just following his own advice, after all, the chorus for "Smart," the opening track, does suggest to "aim low."

"Size Matters" isn't the worst disc on the market — in fact, it still beats most of the lame Helmet imitators on modern rock-radio — but it is a huge disappointment. Perhaps it is so disappointing because there is no place to put the blame. On paper the record doesn't seem that bad: good musicianship, decent writing, songs that have been proven to work. "Size Matters" is, however, bad.

At its best, it's just a confusing and awkward misstep in Hamilton's career, and at its worst, it tarnishes Helmet's legacy as one of the most innovative and important hard-rock/hardcore bands of the '90s. Even though there are a few good tracks, it's fair to say that "Size Matters" doesn't matter. Next time Hamilton should aim for quality over quantity.

Gere and J-Lo team up

By Tammi Munn
Collegian Staff

From "Officer and a Gentleman" to "Pretty Woman" and "Runaway Bride," Richard Gere is a chick-flick veteran. His role in "Shall We Dance" is no different from the past roles in those films.

Gere stars as John Clark, an estate lawyer who has a pretty cushy and organized life with two teenaged children and a beautiful and ever-so-caring wife (Susan Sarandon) who remembers everything he forgets.

'Shall We Dance'
Directed by Peter Chelsom
Starring Richard Gere Jennifer Lopez
Miramax
PG-13
104 mins.
Grade C

John is missing something in his perfect life, although he isn't quite sure what it is that he wants. Maybe it is that he is going through a mid-life crisis, or maybe it is because he just wants to have some fun. He is intrigued by a woman (Jennifer Lopez) he sees gazing out of a window above the Miss Mitzi's Dance School sign everyday on the train ride home from work. He reluctantly signs up for eight weeks of dance lessons, but chooses to keep it as a guilty secret from his wife.

John meets so many interesting characters during his first night of class. There is the slightly eccentric Miss Mitzi, the instructor and owner of the establishment who frequently takes a swig from her flask before class; there are two other beginning dance students, Vern and Chic, who are both there to learn dance skills to impress a girl; there is Bobbie, a voluptuous, loudmouthed and very flashy woman who comes every night to practice her moves; and then there is the graceful Paulina (Lopez), another dance instructor and John's inspiration for joining the class.

Disappointment ensues when John, Vern, and Chic find themselves as the only three students in their class and that Miss Mitzi is their dance instructor and not Paulina. The original reasons for why the men began dance lessons fall away as dancing prevails as their primary reason for continuing. Each character grows in a way that the audience, and the characters themselves, never imagined.

John's wife becomes increasingly suspicious and decides to hire a private investigator to see if her husband is having an affair. She can't understand why a couple that has shared everything for fourteen years has suddenly become entwined with secrets.

It is very disturbing that an extremely talented actress such as Susan Sarandon continually gets typecast into the perfect wife and mother roles almost as much as the dapper Richard Gere is usually cast as a beautiful actress's tragic loved interest. Sarandon's role in this film, although it shows her sensual side, is almost part of a side story rather than an integral part of the main plot.

Actress Lisa Ann Walter has played only minute supporting characters in the past, but in this film she has the chance as the character Bobbie to show how dynamic an actress she is. Her performance is absolutely astounding with her tell-it-like-it-is attitude and her clumsily extreme dance moves while clad in bright-colored, animal print costumes.

The passionate ballroom dancing is spectacular, and the costumes add to the splendor with a dash of sequins, sheer flowing swaths of fabric and vibrant colors that create visually enchanting moments.

Visuals aside, the actual story, in what should have been a very inventive new tale, was weak. It was originally created as a successful Japanese flick, but the Hollywood rendition is quite mediocre. Sometimes the story dragged on, and it was only jumpstarted by the intense music and dancing, not by the dry humor that tries to be hysterically funny but dwells on the edge of corniness.

Coming out week festivities have a political vibe in 2004

By Lynn Branby
Kansas City Star

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – The annual National Coming Out Week festivities on college campuses last week boasted the typical student event fare: food, friendship and fun.

But in this election year, with the culture war over gay civil rights raging in neighborhoods, churches, state legislatures and Congress, some of the events offered a political edge, too.

The theme this year: "Come out. Speak out. Vote."

At the University of Missouri-Kansas City, university lecturer and gay rights activist Michael Henry urged several dozen people at the Coming Out Day luncheon to counteract use of gay issues as political wedge issues by being open with their friends and families.

They should tell friends and neighbors the pain they feel over bans on same-sex marriage or the lack of protection from job and housing discrimination, he said.

"We're in a huge struggle. We are the targets. We are the pawns," said Henry, who teaches a communications course at UMKC and also serves on the board of governors for the Human Rights Campaign. The national organization advocates equal rights for people who are gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgender.

In a 2003 poll, 77 percent of gays, lesbians, bisexual and transgender people considered themselves "out." But only 32 percent talk to their parents about public policy issues, and 46 percent talk to their siblings about such topics, the Human Rights Campaign Foundation survey found.

"It takes courage to come out," Henry said. "It was easier, actually, last year to come out than it is this year."

Henry was among more than 400 people at UMKC whose names appeared in the campus newspaper last week on a "Declaration of Support for the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual & Transgender Members of the UMKC Campus Community."

Signatories said they supported the university's values of diversity, inclusiveness and respect; they believed everyone should be treated with dignity and respect; and they respected leading honest and open lives as lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender individuals, or as "heterosexual allies."

This was the first year for such a list in Missouri, said Tobi Leuthardt, coordinator for UMKC's new lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender office, which is part of the Women's Center. But some other colleges nationally have printed such lists for years.

Candace Gingrich, the campaign's youth outreach manager, said rhetoric over gay rights this election year brought a new dimension to coming-out events.

At some colleges, gay students are highlighting politics by displaying faux ballot boxes alongside Coming Out Day's more traditional wooden doors. The doors represent the closet of isolation where some gay people take shelter for fear of social disapproval or physical attacks.

"While it's easy to be kind of whimsical with Coming Out Day, I've spoken with a lot of people who feel under siege," Gingrich said. "A lot of college students probably aren't thinking about getting married at this moment, but they realize that depending on how things go, same-sex couples may not ever get to marry."

Coming Out Day participants said by revealing themselves as regular citizens, they could open other people's minds and create tolerance and political change.

"It's hard to hate me as a person, as opposed to this 'mass of gays,'" Leuthardt said.

Maureen Warren, a lesbian University of Kansas student who planned KU's first Coming Out Day dance since the early 1990s, agreed. The dance attracted about 65 persons, with some coming from Wichita and Hays, Kan., for a safe place to dance with same-sex partners.

"I absolutely believe that the road to equality is paved by individuals coming out to their friends and acquaintances," she said. "But on the flip side, I think there are definitely times when it is a mistake to come out."

An international graduate student at the dance declined a newspaper interview because he feared alienating the students he teaches or losing his job, Warren said.

She said she remembers feeling alone as she kept her personal life to herself while growing up in rural southwest Kansas and attending a community college there. But she considers KU a safe environment and now is out to friends and family. She serves as social chairwoman of the campus chapter of Queers and Allies. (Cameron— Is the "she" in this paragraph supposed to be the international student from the paragraph above? –sm)

Not all college students support Coming Out Day.

At UMKC's Coming Out Day lunch, senior Matthew Crandall was disappointed that there was no mention of the belief that people who are unhappy with homosexuality can embrace heterosexuality.

Crandall is a leader with Christian Student Ministries, a group he described as an organization of fundamentalist, evangelical Christian students.

"I think God's message is that there is a reason Christ came and died, and that is so we could live free from any type of sin, including homosexuality, which is very specifically mentioned in the Old and New Testaments as being contrary to God's original intent," Crandall said. "God's message is one of freedom from being gay, from that sexual orientation."

Crandall caught only the end of the event. One of the early speakers was Henry, who told the people that he had just returned from Washington, where he visited offices of conservative senators, including Kansas' Sam Brownback.

He told the senator's staff members that he was gay and supported gay civil rights. A Brownback staff member told him he was courageous for making such an announcement in the office of a senator who sponsored legislation banning same-sex marriage in the Constitution, he said.

But he said he doesn't feel courageous: that label best suits those who feel endangered when they just walk down the street in their town and go out anyway.

He was devastated in August when Missouri voters overwhelmingly approved a constitutional amendment limiting marriage to one man and one woman, even though that limitation already was in state law.

He asked the senators' staffers "if they could understand what it would feel like to be cut out of the Constitution. ... It doesn't feel good at all. It feels like we give to the community, my partner and I are very involved in the community, and our neighbors have turned on us and said, 'Who cares whether you care about our community? We don't want you here.'"

National Coming Out Day began as a commemoration of the 1987 gay rights march on Washington.

Business school professor Lee Bolman, who has gay friends and relatives, signed UMKC's Declaration of Support. He felt compelled to do so, "particularly in the current context," he said. "[Gay civil rights] is a political football. I personally get very concerned about the more right-wing folks who are busily pushing for constitutional amendments to make sure no one is gay anywhere in the world if they can help it."

Kansas City poet and lawyer Joel Brown read his poems. He wants to give young gay people hope.

"You can come from a place of confusion, bewilderment, disillusionment, and reach a place where you are totally comfortable with who you are. You can lead a productive, positive life without engaging in destructive behavior," he said.

J.R. Benmuvhar hosts a mock Jeopardy game titled "Gaypardy" during a National Coming Out Day event held at the University of Missouri, Kansas City on October 11, 2004.

Seventeen year-old Chun Sue's novel titled "Beijing Doll" caused much controversy after being banned by the Chinese government.

Controversial book banned in China

By Molly J. Quinn
Collegian Correspondent

Thought dying your hair and listening to Nirvana made you a rebel when you were in middle school? Try doing the same thing in Communist China.

Chun Sue writes about her turbulent adolescence in her debut novel "Beijing Doll," giving a voice to the attitude of disaffected Chinese youth towards society, authority, and traditional Chinese values with the book's 2004 English translation.

Chun wrote "Beijing Doll" at 17 as a two-time high school dropout and general misfit. Although the book is touted as a novel, it reads like a memoir of Chun's tumultuous teen years, as she flits from high school to magazine writing, from boyfriend to boyfriend, all the while gorging herself on American rock music and casual sex. She tries to reconcile herself with the confusion of living in an old-fashioned communist country on the cusp of embracing modern Western ideals and, above all else, her own identity.

After selling more than 100,000 copies within its first few weeks of publication in China in 2002, the book was quickly banned by the government. However, the initial success of "Beijing Doll" was enough to establish Chun as a cult figure amongst China's cruel youth movement, characterized by their unforgiving approach to realism. Despite being banned, "Beijing Doll" remains popular on the black market today.

'Beijing Doll'
By Chun Sue
Riverhead

Unfortunately, Chun's writing is far from spectacular, and her interpretation of radical life in China is to dye her hair green or red and stay out late, dramatically obsessing about her relationships and, mostly, herself. She details her relationships with boys with observations like, "I wanted to say that no one could plug the hole in my heart, that is was lost, that it was lonely."

Her writing varies from melodramatic to frank and jaded, often in a stream-of-consciousness style. Detailing a night spent at a rock show, she writes, "Like all bars, it was common for shows there to begin as much as an hour late. Ziyu bought two soft drinks. Thankfully not Pepsi, which damn near makes me puke." Frankly, reading "Beijing Doll" isn't much different from perusing your average American teen's angst-ridden diary.

She drops out of school twice, preferring the freedom to sleep in, stay out late, and wear whatever clothes she chooses to the strict rules on attendance and decorum at the vocational high school she attends. She rides around on her bike, scoffing at boyfriends who don't have the money for rock shows or McDonald's and getting into verbal altercations with the parents of one boyfriend who refuse to tolerate her sleeping over after the couple's sexual rendezvous.

Sound familiar? Probably because almost every teenager wishes they could drop out of school, sleep in late, and spend their days contemplating sex, poetry, and rock and roll.

She records her encounters in Beijing's underground music culture, befriending musicians and bands, even writing articles about many of them for various Chinese publications. However, her account of the experience exposes her immaturity as a writer; the descriptions are often choppy and focus more on what is considered fashionable in Chinese than the development of the actual underground scene. "I said I liked U2, Xu Wei, Nirvana, Kafka and computers," Chun writes. "At the time, mentioning Nirvana showed you were hip. Not impossibly passé, like now."

Chun Sue was considered rebellious in her native China.

She quotes songs with intensity, a phenomenon peculiar to adolescents finding solace in the lyrics of their favorite band, regardless of nationality. Her writing is often self-indulgent, and her boredom overshadows the possibility of her expressing any meaningful revolutionary thought. "I've never been the sort of person who has goals," she writes. "Never. And even with a rosy veil over my eyes, I couldn't see the future."

Chun does bring up some of the inadequacies of life in China when she laments that she will probably never be able to attend Beida (Beijing University) due to her poor test scores and will likely be left in limbo at a vocational school. Yet to the American teenage reader, struggling to gain admittance at a prestigious college is likely to be all too familiar. And Chun's inability to stick it out in high school lends little sympathy to her plight.

Her childish musing about the futility and hopelessness of life fall flat in comparison with the daily turmoil of the estimated 400 million Chinese struggling to subsist on less than $2 a day. In a country where there are daily anti-government protests, often resulting in jail time and with many protesters falling victim to police brutality, Chun's novel seems frivolous. However, the fact that her novel resonated so strongly with Chinese youth makes it a worthwhile read for those looking for a glimpse into another side of an often-misunderstood nation.

OSU rape victim looks for justice

By Darren Everson and Michael O'Keeffe
New York Daily News

NEW YORK (AP) – Alison Jennings doesn't remember how she wound up in that room with four football players during a house party five years ago in Stillwater, Okla.

Jennings, then a 22-year-old Oklahoma State University student, says she had been drinking, but not enough to black out. Maybe she was drugged, she suggests. Maybe somebody slipped her something that blotted out portions of the night her life was shattered. But Jennings has no doubts about what happened after she entered that room: She says the four players - including Marcellus Rivers, now a tight end with the New York Giants - sexually assaulted her.

Five years later, Jennings is still pursuing justice. Like Kobe Bryant's accuser and the nine women who say they were sexually assaulted by University of Colorado football players, she's been dismissed as publicity hungry, greedy, crazy. Jennings says she went to OSU to get a degree but left with a harsh lesson: Women who accuse athletes of sexual assault, she says, are vilified and marginalized especially in college towns like Stillwater, where sports are keystones of the local economy and cultural identity.

"In Stillwater, football is a religion and the players are gods," Jennings says. "People there will do anything to protect those players."

Rivers and the other players later told Stillwater police they had consensual sex with Jennings, and Payne County District Attorney Rob Hudson decided not to file criminal charges. Jennings and her attorney Mark Hammons say that decision wasn't based on an objective review of the case, but on a police investigation that seemed to be mostly about protecting football players.

Her quest for justice through the courts has been equally frustrating.

"Frustrating is kind of an understatement," she says. "I just want to get on with my life, but I can't do that until I have some kind of resolution."

She settled civil lawsuits against Rivers and another player, Alvin Porter, last year but both men have fallen behind in their payments and Jennings says she doesn't have the resources to go back to court to press them.

Last month, a federal appeals court denied her request to reinstate a lawsuit filed against the Stillwater police. Jennings had argued that the department's investigation was so flawed, it violated her constitutional rights. But the court said the Constitution does not protect crime victims from bad police work.

OSU spokesman Nestor Gonzales declined to comment for this story. Margaret Love, an attorney who represents the Stillwater police, says the department's investigation into Jennings' allegations was full and adequate. She notes that Jennings didn't file civil suits against Rivers and Porter until after they were drafted by NFL teams.

"I can't judge her motivation," Love says when asked if she is suggesting Jennings was fishing for a big settlement. "I'm just noting her timing."

Rivers' agent, Vann McElroy, says Jennings is a "bad lady" who tried to entrap an NFL-bound player. Rivers told the Daily News last week the rape allegation was nothing more than a shakedown.

"I could care less about the case now," Rivers says. "She can do what she needs to do to try to make a name for herself or get whatever money she needs, but I could care less."

But there's been no big payday for Jennings just four years of frustrating and mostly fruitless legal battles. Her settlement with Rivers is confidential, but Jennings says the money doesn't cover legal fees, travel expenses, counseling and other bills stemming from that November 1999 night. Even worse, Rivers stopped payment on his last check to Hammons, then filed for Chapter 13 bankruptcy; Hammons is listed as a creditor owed $14,000 in the filing from Rivers and his wife LaTasha.

Hammons suspects the bankruptcy filing was an attempt to dodge payment and he asked Oklahoma City prosecutors to determine if any bad check laws were violated, although a spokeswoman for the district attorney's office says it's unlikely criminal charges will be filed. McElroy says Rivers has met his obligations to Jennings and was forced to file for bankruptcy protection because of legal fees stemming from Jennings' allegations.

Porter is even further behind in his payments, Hammons says. Porter, who played two seasons with the Ravens and was cut by the Bengals in August, acknowledges he hasn't met the terms of his settlement. "It's because I'm not playing football anymore. I can't keep up with the payments," Porter says. "Certainly as soon as I start playing, I'll start paying again."

Porter, however, maintains he and his friends did nothing wrong that night with Jennings. "Deep down inside," he says, "she knows none of us forced her to do anything."

Jennings, meanwhile, doesn't have enough money to continue her education. She moved around the country several times and now lives in Rock Island, Ill., and she says she's barely scraping by. "When I first came out, somebody made a comment that, 'Oh, she is suing them because they're NFL players.' Well, it doesn't mean anything because look where I am now."

After the alleged attack, Jennings' friend Jill Roberts, who had been pushing the blocked door to get into the room the players and Jennings were in, immediately took the young woman to a hospital. Three of the players, according to court documents, hid in a closet after the encounter they described as consensual.

The hospital staff called Stillwater police. Twelve hours after the alleged assault, Jennings was interviewed by Detective Robert Buzzard. Buzzard's cousin is OSU athletic department spokesman Steve Buzzard, but the then Stillwater cop has his own longstanding ties to the OSU athletic department - he attended the school on a baseball scholarship and lectured the football team on good citizenship prior to the 1999 season.

Pats defense key in red zone

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO (AP) – New England's defenders let Seattle march down the field. Just 12 seconds remained and the Seahawks had a first down at the Patriots two-yard line.

In the defensive huddle, the message was clear: "No score. We don't care what they do, we're not going to let them in," linebacker Tedy Bruschi said. And they didn't.

Matt Hasselbeck threw two incompletions, a penalty moved the ball to the one, and the Patriots stopped Mack Strong for no gain on the final play, then ran off the field with a 30-20 win Sunday, their NFL record 20th consecutive victory.

It didn't matter to the Patriots that Seattle couldn't have won the game even with a touchdown on the last drive. The end zone is their territory and they'll defend it no matter what the situation.

On their five trips into the New England red zone inside the 20, the Seahawks managed just three field goals and a touchdown.

"That last red zone stand on the goal line was huge for us," strong safety Rodney Harrison said. "It just showed people that, regardless of the score, we're going to continue to play to the end."

The Patriots' defense started brilliantly with interceptions on Seattle's first two series that led to a 10-0 lead. It was 17-0 early in the second quarter and 20-6 at halftime.

But with 11:05 left in the game, New England couldn't stop Seattle after the Seahawks' Michael Boulware intercepted Tom Brady's pass. That drive ended in Shaun Alexander's nine-yard touchdown run and a two-point conversion that made it 20-17.

It was 23-17 when Seattle started at its 26-yard line and moved all the way to a first down at New England's 13. Then a two-yard loss on a complete pass and two penalties forced the Seahawks to settle for a field goal.

The Patriots held Seattle to field goals on three series that went inside the 20 and another that reached the 22. So the Seahawks scored just 12 points on the kicks rather than the 28 they would have gotten had each drive ended in a touchdown and extra point.

"That's the difference of 16 points," Harrison said. "That definitely changed the outcome of the game."

New England (5-0) has allowed just 16.1 points per game this season and played well defending its goal line.

"We weren't very good last year in the red zone, so that was a point of emphasis in the off-season," Harrison said. "If you can't stop them from scoring, at least hold them to three points."

URI's coach looks for milestone selection has five assists and two goals on the season.

A win against Dayton would have made Rhode Island Coach Ed Bradley the winningest coach in school soccer history and after a scoreless first half, Rhode Island struck on an unassisted goal by Jeffery Gonsalves 25 seconds into the second half. It looked as though Bradley was in good shape until Dayton's Darr immediately scored his first goal of the day to answer. In the 57th minute Jarun would head in a cross from Rolfe to take the lead. Rhode Island then tied the match at two apiece in the 70th minute on a goal by Danleigh Borman. But Darr made all the difference, heading in a corner kick from Rolfe to seal the victory in the 72nd minute.

Keeper Steve Ladislaw started in goal for the Flyers and saved five shots.

Rhode Island's Sasha Gotsmanov, who leads the nation in scoring with 14 goals, was held scoreless for the first time in seven games. Dayton had the toughest pre-conference schedule out of any of the A-10 teams and handed number-one Duquesne their only loss in the league. This means that despite being in second place right now it could change as soon as Friday when Dayton travels to Richmond.

Playoff Hopes Hinge on Stopping La Salle Skid

La Salle is 7-5-1 overall on the season which is pretty respectable considering they only won five games total last year. Coach Pat Farrell has lead La Salle for 18 seasons and they won three out of their first four conference games to start A-10 play in October. At that point, one could only assume that La Salle would be a playoff contender behind 2002 Defensive Player of the Year Stash Graham (senior goaltender). However, after losing close games to Temple and St. Joe's at home, the Explorers have fallen to 3-3 in conference play and dropped into sixth place.

It won't get any easier for La Salle. On Friday they are hosting a Rhode Island team with NCAA tournament aspirations that will likely be rekindled after Sunday's loss to Dayton. Then, on October 24th, a hot Massachusetts squad that has won their last three games (all in overtime), comes to town in what will be La Salle's last home game. After playing away at Xavier, the Explorers will be playing second-place Dayton and then finishing up with lowly Fordham.

If the Explorers intend on seeing the playoffs on November 11th in DC they had better start winning. Their schedule is very tough from here on out and they must find a way to beat great soccer clubs. It will be tough, but with such a quick, young team, it is possible. Look for La Salle to sneak into the playoffs as perhaps the 6th seed because beating all of these teams might be wishful thinking.

Temple has Momentum

Temple University is picking up steam after beating La Salle (2-1) and Fordham (1-0) over the weekend. The Owls are tied with Massachusetts for third place in the A-10 with a record of 6-6-2 overall (3-1-2 in the A-10) and could be prepared to make a run at the regular season title.

Unlike Massachusetts, Duquesne, Rhode Island, La Salle and especially St. Bonaventure, Temple has it relatively easy for the rest of the way. Temple plays Duquesne next, and then nothing but mediocre teams are on the horizon. The only other contending team with a similar schedule is Dayton.

Senior goalie Patrick Hannigan who was last year's A-10 Defensive Player of the Year has been superb between the posts, allowing only seven goals in conference play thus far.

On October 1st the Owls beat Rhode Island in overtime, and then they followed that victory with ties against Massachusetts and Xavier. After losing to La Salle they have played excellently in their last two contests. This shows that they can play with the best teams in the league, and after getting the good teams out of the way early, they will have momentum going into the playoffs. This could spell trouble for opponents who may be coming off losses. If they fall short it will be because their forwards didn't score enough goals against porous defenses.

Sooners hurt by BCS

"At this point in the season, it just generates a lot of discussion among the people who like to talk about college football," Sooners coach Bob Stoops said. "In that sense, it's a positive because it keeps people talking about our sport. But it really makes no difference where anyone is ranked today. There is too much of this season left to play for anyone to get too worked up about this now."

Weiberg said that Oklahoma probably was hurt in the computer rankings by having played only one road game. Oklahoma has one win over a ranked team (Texas), while Miami has two (Florida State and Louisville), which also sways computer rankings. Each team's highest and lowest computer ranking is tossed out before an average is calculated.

The Orange Bowl will host the top two teams in the final BCS standings on Jan. 4.

USC, No. 1 in each of the major polls all season, has a big lead in the BCS with a score of .9912 out of a possible 1.000. Miami's score is .9187, while Oklahoma's is .9161. Auburn is fourth with .9036. Florida State, with one loss, is fifth, ahead of unbeatens Wisconsin and Utah.

Utah's seventh-place showing is the best in a season's opening BCS standings for a team outside the six major conferences. It puts the Utes in position to become the first team from a mid-major conference to earn a bid to one of the four big-ticket BCS games.

"It is exciting, and I think it's something that's driven this team," Utah quarterback Alex Smith said. "We're driven to prove people wrong."

The champions from the Atlantic Coast Conference, Big Ten, Big 12, Big East, Pac-10 and Southeastern Conference earn up six of the eight berths in the four BCS bowls – the Orange, Sugar, Rose and Fiesta. The other spots go to wild-card teams.

Finishing in the top six in the standings guarantees a BCS bowl bid. A top-12 ranking in the final BCS standings is necessary to be eligible for a wild-card spot.

KARL MONDON/CONTRA COSTA TIMES

USC's Dwayne Jarrett catches a pass against Standford on Saturday, September 25, 2004.

In the past, results from the AP and coaches polls were averaged, then factored in with other components – a formula that lessened the significance of the polls.

BCS officials scaled down the formula, eliminating bonus points for quality wins and schedule strength, considered redundant because computers and poll voters already take that into account. And the BCS formula now considers the number of votes a team receives in the major polls, not just its ranking.

UMass shines in the clutch

So, when Ralph Pace's shot was deflected and knocked home by Greg Cirillo in the second overtime, it looked like just another day in the office for UMass.

The Minutemen have pulled themselves up from early season troubles and are currently in third place in a very competitive A-10. Only four days ago, the Maroon and White were staring at the sixth and final spot in the playoff race with a youthful squad searching for its identity.

Over the first six games of the season, the Maroon and White teetered between offensive and defensive mentalities. There seemed to be no cohesion, and as the A-10 conference season drew to a close, the 2004 season looked to be a prototypical-rebuilding year for the Minutemen.

Then, with one kick and a defensive alteration, the season turned itself around.

Nearly a week before the start of the A-10 season, UMass had just dropped a heartbreaker to Harvard and lost then-sweeper Tim Kitchell due to a red card. It was clear that the Minutemen needed something to pacify the negativity that was circulating, and on September 22nd, they found the perfect scapegoat.

University of New Hampshire came to town, struggling to get a win, and was tied with UMass 2-2 at the end of regulation. It appeared that the Minutemen were on their way to another tie, when Rob Charest netted his second golden goal of the season.

Since the victory, UMass coach Sam Koch has made a defensive alteration, which puts two midfielders in the back to act as an extra line of defense. Kitchell, upon return, was also moved to the front, where he complements the forwards on offense.

Apparently the move was well deserved as Kitchell has turned into a vital cog in the Minutemen offense.

On Oct. 10, UMass found itself in yet another overtime battle with conference foe George Washington. In the 105th minute, Pace relayed a throw-in out of a mess in front of the Colonial goal. Kitchell came in, headed the ball, and won the game for UMass.

Not only did the goal spark the current three-game winning streak that the Minutemen are on, but it also gave Koch his 150th career win at UMass.

A win is a win, and when the season is over, the numbers don't show the heart of a team. The Minutemen, however, are making believers of their fans. Of its six wins this season, UMass has won five of them in the extra stanza, three in double overtime.

Many would expect this effort to come from a team laden with experience, but the Minutemen have been relying on their youth to go the extra mile.

Of the nine goal-scorers for UMass this year, all but two are either sophomores or freshmen. Oral Bullen, who currently leads the team in goals with seven, has benefited from the underclassmen-scoring surge, as he is no longer the centerpiece for which teams prepare.

As the Minutemen go into the waning weeks of the 2004 season, they are looking poised and more importantly confident. Perhaps this wasn't a rebuilding year; it could be that it was a learning experience with success.

Maybe UMass isn't dominating this year, but it's shown it can hang around with the best to the very end.

And sometimes, a little bit longer.

Eagles and Pats are up to billing

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Even while savoring New England's 20th consecutive victory, Rodney Harrison knew the enjoyment would be short-lived.

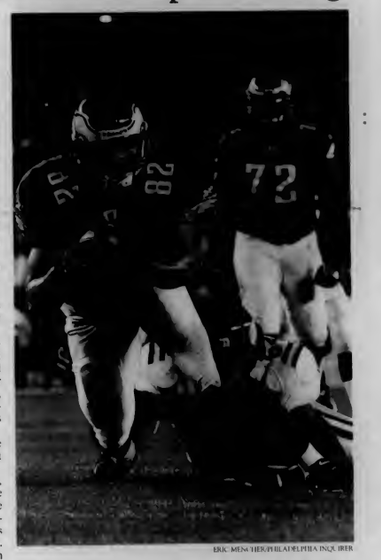
"It's nice now, but when we show up tomorrow, he'll surely have a long list of things that we did wrong," the safety said after the Patriots held off the Seattle Seahawks 30-20 Sunday.

"He," or Bill Belichick, is never satisfied, never content with a victory, always pushing and prodding. He even went after himself and his assistants Sunday, when his first words were: "The coaching stunk. I stunk."

Andy Reid in Philadelphia is a little more taciturn, at least in public.

But like the Patriots, the Eagles are unbeaten and seemingly better than everyone else.

So six weeks into the NFL season, there already is talk about WHEN, not IF, Philadelphia and New England meet in the Super Bowl. That's premature, of course, but this is starting to look like a season when the preseason favorites are truly the NFL's best teams.



That hasn't been the case since the full effect of the salary cap hit late in the last decade.

Starting with the 1998 season, when Atlanta reached the title game a year after finishing 7-9, five of the six Super Bowls have featured at least one team that was under .500 the previous season. The only exception: 2002, when Tampa Bay beat Oakland for the championship (and look where those two are today).

But this year feels different.

Yes, the New York Jets, 6-10 last season, are 5-0, the only unbeaten team besides the Eagles and Patriots.

But when they go to Foxboro on Sunday, they will face their first true test.

ERIC MENCHER/PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Philadelphia Eagles tight end L. J. Smith slips into the end zone for a first quarter touchdown against the Vikings on Monday, September 20th

Their wins are over Cincinnati, San Diego, Miami, Buffalo and San Francisco, combined record 6-22, and none of the victories was especially easy. Down 14-3 at halftime to the 49ers on Sunday, the Jets needed fierce prodding from quarterback Chad Pennington and defensive coordinator Donnie Henderson to inspire them to 22-14 win.

There are other losers from last season doing well.

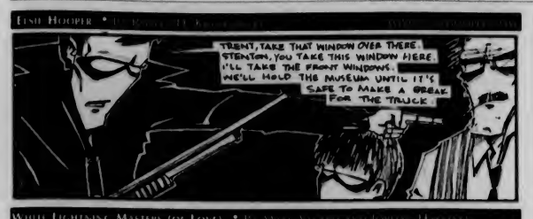
Pittsburgh (5-1) and Jacksonville (4-2) are off to good starts in the AFC; the Steelers certainly are the favorites right now in the AFC North. Atlanta (5-1) leads the NFC South by three games. The Giants are 4-1, the Lions 3-2.

But while all or most of those teams might contend for the playoffs, it's hard at this stage to see them going past the early rounds. And it's certainly hard to see those teams beating the Patriots or Eagles - the Giants have improved since their opening day thumping in Philly but still aren't close in skill level.

The more legitimate Super Bowl challengers all were over .500 last season: Denver (5-1), Indianapolis (4-1) and maybe Baltimore (3-2) in the AFC, and Minnesota (4-1), Seattle (3-2) and maybe St. Louis (3-2 entering Monday night's game) in the NFC.

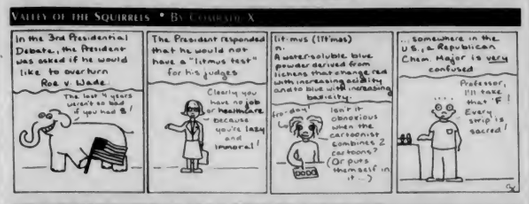
But it's still hard to get beyond the first two – barring injuries, the great equalizer. (There were a few seconds of breath-holding in Foxboro when Seattle's Michael Boulware administered a jarring tackle that dislodged Tom Brady's helmet, and there was some anxiety in Minnesota over Randy Moss' strained hamstring.) But barring that...

"They just know how to win," Seattle coach Mike Holmgren said after his team's late rally fell short at New England. "You think you've got a shot at them, and then someone makes a big play. It's not always someone you expected, but it always seems to happen."



That's why New England currently has an edge over the Colts, probably the second-best team in the AFC. A sack on opening night by Willie McGinest (someone you DO expect) forced Mike Vanderjagt back to 48 yards for a potential game-tying field goal. Vanderjagt missed, and if the Patriots and Colts enter the playoffs with the same record, the home-field advantage goes to New England again.

The Eagles simply have more talent than anyone in the NFC, which was clear to anyone who watched Minnesota's defense Sunday night. Terrell Owens has given Philadelphia the one offensive weapon it lacked, and Jevon Kearse has been a disruptive force on defense.



The Colts, probably the third-best team in the NFL right now, still have defensive questions, although they've been able to overcome them thus far. Maybe Denver can challenge; Reuben Droughns is the team's latest running back plucked from obscurity, and the defense has been playing well.

The cardiac kids of OT

Bob McGovern

Most soccer teams take care of business during regulation. Sure, now and again overtime happens after a hard-fought battle, but for the most part these adrenaline-pumping periods are few and far between.

I guess someone forgot to tell that to the Massachusetts men's soccer team.

With five games left in the season, the Minutemen have gone to overtime an astounding eight times, doubling their previous record of four back in the 1997 season. Oddly enough, seven of these games have taken place over the last eight contests.

On Sunday, I went to go help my colleague cover UMass's game down at Rudd Field. We sat in our press seats, and with a minute left in the game, the Minutemen were down 3-2 to Xavier and it looked like they were on their way to a pivotal Atlantic 10 conference loss.

All of a sudden there was a "blown" call and sophomore Richard Higa found an opening and knotted the game with a mere 16-seconds left, much to the chagrin of Xavier's head coach, Jack Hermans.

With the power of journalistic objectivity keeping me in my seat, I knew the game was over before overtime even started. As the ball trickled past the outstretched hands of Musketeer keeper, Brian Schaeper, and Higa darted away with his arms raised high, everyone, even Coach Hermans, knew the Minutemen had the upper hand.

Tim Kitchell has scored one goal this year for UMass, a game-winner against George Washington on October 10th. The Minutemen have won all but one game in overtime this season and are currently in third place in the Atlantic 10 conference.

Dukes poised to take A-10

Duquesne on A-10 Rampage with Win Over Richmond

The Dukes are number one in the A-10 with a record of 5-1 in conference play (9-5 overall) after shutting down Richmond 1-0 Sunday in their final home game of the season. Preseason all-conference selection Noah Salsi (sophomore defenseman) netted the only goal of the game 52 seconds into the second half, beating Richmond's Eric Sciocchetti from twenty yards out.

Atlantic 10 Conference

Notebook

Last season's A-10 Rookie of the Year Zach Varga (sophomore goalkeeper) had two saves against Richmond and completed his 11th career shutout.

Duquesne has been impressive thus far, with Salsi leading the team in goals (four) and Derek Mackenzie (senior midfielder) leading the team in assists (four).

The Dukes' reign at the top could be short-lived as they have had the luxury of playing six straight conference games at home. They now have to play four straight games on the road against tough conference opponents Temple, St. Joe's, Rhode Island and Massachusetts. They don't have any prolific scorers, but they always manage to get a couple of goals per game, so the burden of victory lies with Varga.

Gotsmanov Held Scoreless as Dayton Stuns Rhode Island

Junior defenseman Nate Darr scored two goals on the road for the Dayton Flyers as they clawed their way past soccer giant Rhode Island 3-2 on Sunday. Dayton is now in second place in the A-10 at 4 -2 and 7-5-1 overall. Rhode Island, who started the day in second place in the A-10, now falls to fifth behind Massachusetts and Temple.

Dayton's junior forward Omar Jarun also scored in a contest that saw all three Flyer goals assisted by senior forward Chris Rolfe. Rolfe, a preseason all-conference

UMass splits in Alaska

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

If you're going to travel over 6,000 miles to play two games, you might as well come out of the trip with at least one win.

Minnesota	1
UMass	0

The Massachusetts hockey team did just that, earning a split of two games over the weekend in Anchorage, Alaska in the Nye Frontier Classic. The Minutemen fell to Minnesota 1-0 on Friday, but came back to beat Canisius 2-1 on Saturday to take third place in the tournament and improve their record to 2-1.

UMass	2
Canisius	1

Mark Matheson scored the game-winner Saturday night, adding the one-two punch 48 seconds after freshman P.J. Fenton tied the game at one with his first collegiate goal, with 13 minutes to go in the game. Matheson's goal was set up by Garrett Summerfield, who also put his name in the 2004-05 scoring book for the first time.

Fenton was assisted by a fellow freshman, defenseman Mike Kostka, as well as senior Jeff Lang, and ended a 107:27-long scoring drought for the Minutemen, whose last goal came from red-shirt sophomore Matt Anderson in the waning moments of their 6-4 opening-night victory over Clarkson on Oct. 9.

Canisius (0-1-1) opened the scoring after UMass freshman David Leaderer went to the penalty box for interference 3:38 into the first period. The Golden Griffins quickly capitalized, as Mike Ruberto took a feed from Billy Irish-Bake and potted his first goal of the season. Canisius held on to the 1-0 lead until midway through the third period, aided by low shot totals from the Minutemen, who only put 12 attempts on goaltender Max Buetow's net in the first two periods combined.

Buetow finished with 23 stops on the night, besting UMass' Tim Warner's total by five saves.

Although Anderson, who earned his first collegiate hat trick against Clarkson a week ago, didn't figure in the scoring, his 13 face-off wins were the game high for both teams.

Though it remains a loss in the record, Friday night's result was a bit of a surprise, as the Minutemen and No. 3 Minnesota locked up for over 19 minutes of scoreless hockey, until David Potulny broke the tie with 31 seconds to go. The Gophers advanced to Saturday's final, but fell 3-2 to host Alaska-Anchorage.

Potulny's goal, assisted by Kris Chucko and Danny Irmen, ended a highly defensive battle, in which goaltenders Gabe Winer for UMass and Kellen Briggs for the Gophers combined for just 37 saves. The first period was particularly slow in the attacking department, as the teams combined for just seven shots, with the Minutemen taking five. Potulny, the brother of former Gopher standout Grant, was an obvious offensive leader, taking a game-high six shots and scoring the only goal.

The Minutemen, who returned to Amherst late Sunday night and took Monday off, will return to action on Friday when they host UMass Lowell at 7 p.m. It is the third-earliest Hockey East game ever for UMass since the program entered the conference in 1994. Previously, the Minutemen opened the conference slate against Boston College on Oct. 13, 2002, and at Lowell last season on Oct. 11.

Junior foward John Toffey has played in every game this season for the Minutemen. UMass went 1-1 last weekend in Alaska.

Ortiz does it again, Sox win

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) – After the game that seemed like it would never end, Boston's season goes on.

David Ortiz hit the 472nd pitch of the game with two outs in the 14th inning Monday night to cap a second straight amazing comeback and give the Red Sox a 5-4 victory over the New York Yankees and send the AL championship series back to New York.

Boston had been three outs from a humiliating sweep in Game 4 before Ortiz's two-run homer in the 12th inning ended a 5-hour, 2-minute marathon at 1:22 a.m. Monday.

Now, after a 5:49 game that was the longest by time in postseason history, the Red Sox are just one win from climbing out of a 3-0 deficit and forcing an anything-can-happen Game 7.

Boston was six outs from elimination in this one before Ortiz's leadoff homer off Tom Gordon and Jason Varitek's sacrifice fly off Mariano Rivera in the two-run eighth.

Mike Timlin, Keith Foulke, Bronson Arroyo, Mike Myers, Alan Embree and winner Tim Wakefield combined for eight shutout innings after the Yankees scored four runs off starter Pedro Martinez.

Wakefield wiggled out of trouble in the 13th when Gary Sheffield struck out leading off but reached on a passed ball, and two more passed balls by Varitek on Wakefield's knuckler left runners on second and third.

New BCS system under scrutiny

By Ralph Russo
Associated Press

The new Bowl Championship Series formula is creating the same old confusion.

While Southern California took the top spot in the reworked BCS standings' debut Monday, look who's second: Miami. The Hurricanes edged Oklahoma, a strong No. 2 behind USC in both The Associated Press Top 25 and the coaches poll.

Put in place after last season's split national championship, this year's stripped-down BCS formula relies more on the AP and ESPN/USA Today polls. The idea was to ensure that when there is a clear consensus top two in the polls – as USC and Oklahoma have been all season – the BCS standings would reflect it.

Instead, BCS officials again had to do some explaining.

"It's obviously very early. It's important that there not be an overreaction to this poll," BCS coordinator and Big 12 commissioner Kevin Weiberg said, adding that when he saw Miami ahead of Oklahoma, "I was a little surprised, to tell you the truth."

Weiberg noted that the top two teams in the first BCS standings of the season have never played in the system's championship game.

"I've never really understood the BCS process," USC coach Pete Carroll said. "And at first look, this year's updated process confuses me once again. I'm not sure how some of the other teams worked out to being where they are. It doesn't make a lot of sense to me."

The AP and coaches polls each count for one-third of a team's total score under the new formula. The other third comes from six computer rankings, and that's where Miami made up the difference over the Sooners. The Hurricanes are ranked fourth in the AP media poll and third in the coaches poll, but have the second-most points in the computer rankings. Oklahoma, the chief beneficiary of the old system last season, came out fifth in the computer rankings.

"Our philosophy is that the only thing we can control is how we play," Miami coach Larry Coker said. "Because we have been named the No. 2 team in the first BCS standings, our job now is to respond and move forward."

Last season, USC finished the regular season ranked No. 1 in both polls but third in the BCS standings – knocking it out of the BCS title game.

Oklahoma finished first in the BCS standings despite losing the Big 12 championship game and dropping to third in the major polls. The Sooners were beaten in the Sugar Bowl by LSU, which was voted No. 1 by the coaches. USC finished No. 1 in the AP poll.

Under the new system, LSU and USC would have met in the Sugar Bowl.

Second win brings second disturbance

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Approximately 2,000 people were dispersed from Southwest Residential Area at the University of Massachusetts during a disturbance late Monday night and early Tuesday morning after the Boston Red Sox defeated the New York Yankees for the second time in the America League Champion Series.

The disturbance was the second to take place on the campus this week. According to UMass police, four people were arrested for charges of disorderly conduct and failure to disperse from a riot, and one charge of assault with a dangerous weapon. Three of the arrests were UMass students.

Police said the disturbance began at 11:05 p.m., after Red Sox player David Ortiz hit the game-winning single. Students rushed out of the dorms and filled the Southwest pyramids, cheering "Yankees suck" and "F... the cops." Some students reported fireworks being set off out of a dorm window and among the crowd. One student was taken to Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton for a sprained ankle. No major injuries or damage to UMass property was reported according to police.

Smoke and pepper ball were used to disperse the crowd and two small fires were extinguished. Another student had some swelling under an eye after being hit by pepper ball. By 12:30 a.m. yesterday morning, police declared the campus secure.

Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and academic life, said yesterday that he is pleased with the behavior of the majority of students.

"There's a high percentage of our students who have been absolutely fantastic," he said. "I think they've enjoyed the games and conducted themselves with the highest level of integrity and respect. This group I stand and applaud."

Gargano said he has been present in Southwest during both disturbances, remaining on campus until 4 a.m. on Monday morning, and 2 a.m. yesterday.

"I think it's important as vice chancellor, I can speak to it as a first hand account," he said.

His presence is equally important in order to observe the good things students are doing, Gargano said.

The University will be swift to deal with any student engaging in riotous or disorderly behavior according to the Student Code of Conduct.

"We still have a small percentage of people who believe ... this behavior is acceptable," Gargano said. "Students will be removed from the campus, perhaps expelled."

The following arrests were made during the disturbance.

Richard M. Stone, 19, of Quincy, was arrested for disorderly conduct, failure to disperse from a riot, and assault with a dangerous weapon.

According to police, Stone allegedly threw a brick at them, but no officers were injured.

Jonathan Pagan, 18, of Southborough, was arrested for failure to disperse from a riot and disorderly conduct.

David Rodriguez-Toomey, 18, of Southborough, was arrested for failure to disperse from a riot.

Philippe Ronald Pelletier, 20, of Gardner, was arrested for disorderly conduct and failure to disperse from a riot. He is not a student at UMass.

Goldman kicks off distinguished series

By Eric Athas
Collegian Correspondent

Sheldon Goldman, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts will be honored for his various accomplishments by giving a distinguished lecture this afternoon on "Judicial Confirmations: The New Battle Zone in American Politics," which will be open to the public.

Since 1965, Goldman has been spreading his knowledge as a professor of political science at UMass.

"I will be talking about Judicial Confirmations and why I believe we've been experiencing such intense battles on the subject," Goldman said. "I have some very interesting documents and memos that administrations often used when deciding whom to select and not select."

Goldman, the chief undergraduate advisor for the political science department, is the author of "Constitutional Law: Cases and Essays." "Picking Federal Judges: Lower Court Selection from Roosevelt Through Reagan," and "The Federal Courts as a Political System." He has spent countless years studying the process of judicial confirmation and will be describing his understanding and views on the subject throughout the lecture.

Goldman is a connoisseur when it comes to the federal judiciary and feels nominees of confirmation have a much tougher time then they did in the past, due to much opposition and aggression. He plans to describe what effects this will have on the upcoming replacements.

"There are certain implications for the filling of future Supreme Court spaces," Goldman said. "Various presidents have been using litmus tests when it comes to this process."

Goldman also plans on discussing certain problems of confirmation in the Senate and an index of obstruction and delay when choosing.

A graduate from New York University in 1961 and a Harvard graduate student where he received his masters and doctorate, Goldman has been mentioned and quoted in highly distinguished literature such as The New York Times, The Washington Post, and Newsweek Magazine.

Following the lecture, Goldman will be receiving the Chancellor's Medal from the university. The award is the highest honor given to those who have given commendable service to the University.

"I am deeply grateful and feel very honored to receive this," Goldman said. "It has been enormously rewarding teaching here. I have taught some wonderful people and the campus is very politically aligned. I look forward to many more years here."

The lecture is the first of four in the series and will be given this afternoon at 4 p.m. in the Massachusetts room of the Mullins Center.

School of Management ranked top in country for academic experience

By Meghan Murphy
Collegian Correspondent

The Isenberg School of Management MBA Program recently received two top 10 national rankings in the 2005 edition of the "Best 143 Business Schools," which is published by "The Princeton Review." The publication features the top 10 schools in each of 11 different categories, including "Toughest to Get Into," "Best Career Prospects," "Best Campus Facilities," and "Best Administered." The Isenberg School was honored in the "Best Overall Academic Experience" category, where it was ranked tenth, as well as in the "Best Professors" category, where it was ranked fourth out of 143 business schools.

The school has two versions of its MBA program: a small, highly selective on-campus version for full-time students, as well as the Professional MBA Program, a part-time version for working professionals. It operates in Springfield, Pittsfield, and Shrewsbury. There is also a growing online-education option offered through the school.

According to Eric Berkowitz, the Isenberg School's dean for professional programs, 95 percent of the courses in the Professional MBA Program and its online version are taught by the school's full-time, on-campus faculty.

Berkowitz believes that the school's placement in the "Best Overall Academic Experience" category says a great deal about the quality of the program. "In that category, we were in the company of Stanford, Yale, Northwestern, and other Ivy League schools," he said, adding that the other public institutions included in the list were UCLA and the University of Michigan.

To rate the schools in the "Best Overall Academic Experience" category, factors such as GMAT scores, undergraduate grades, the percent of students accepted and enrolled, and student-faculty ratio were taken into consideration.

Student survey responses were also weighed in. These questionnaires covered topics such as the faculty, fellow students, and achievement of academic excellence.

Berkowitz cited the Isenberg School's "outstanding faculty" as a huge factor in the overall academic rating. "In fact," he added, "[The Princeton Review] acknowledged them separately by ranking us fourth in the nation in the 'Best Professors' category."

The schools placing in that area was based on student satisfaction ratings. A total of 11,000 students assessed the 143 schools.

According to the Princeton Review, the survey included two factors — teaching effectiveness and accessibility to students outside of the classroom. Berkowitz backed up the rating, saying, "For years, our students have given our MBA faculty high points for their dedication and teaching prowess." He then added that faculty accessibility is "ingrained at the Isenberg School ... it's part of our culture."

Students enrolled in the Isenberg School of Management seem to agree with the Princeton Review's assessment of the faculty. "The professors are honest, up-front, and high quality. I definitely learn the most in my School of Management classes," said Tom Hecht, a sophomore. "They take both friendship and leadership roles. They really do live up to their expectations." He added that the professors are "willing to give an arm and a leg for their students."

Junior Ari Iankelowitz had similar feelings about the faculty at ISOM. "I've never had problems scheduling appointments with faculty or even just walking in when it's not their office hours," he said. "The professors are very friendly and always willing to help their students."

He even cited a time when the doors were opened up on a weekend so that he could show his father where he took classes. "The faculty is very accommodating," he continued.

"They're definitely deserving of this high rating."

Student faces a long recovery

By Brendan Heck
Collegian Correspondent

In the wake of several hit and run accidents this academic year involving University of Massachusetts students, one lucky student is back in school to finish his senior year after an accident last winter left him in critical condition.

After being found unconscious in the middle of the night, spending a month in a state of comatose, followed by months of rehab, Petrit Vasi of Dorchester, Mass., said he plans to graduate in the spring.

At 12:20 a.m. Friday, February 6, 2004, Amherst Police found Vasi on the side of the road at the intersection of Triangle and Mattoon Streets in Amherst.

Vasi spent over a month at Spaulding Hospital in what he describes as a, "state of comatose." Vasi said that he could hear people speak to him, and was able to speak fragmented sentences, but could not open his eyes.

When asked about the accident, Vasi scratched his head and stated, "I can barely remember anything about that night." From what he does remember Vasi had been out with a friend and, "had been drinking." Vasi also remembers going back to his friend's house and waiting for a car to pick him up. That was the extent of Vasi's memory of the night of the accident.

Police stated that Vasi's injuries were consistent with being struck by or falling from a moving vehicle. When asked if he could remember which one it was Vasi replied, "I can't confirm or refute that I was thrown from a car, but I think that I was hit."

Vasi gave reasons for believing he was hit including the fact that his injuries were all on his right side of his body, and also that the friend that was supposed to pick him up and according to Vasi, "the only person I would have ridden with," came to the hospital the next morning.

Vasi continues to speculate on the circumstances surrouding his accident, "It would be more of a story for me to tell you that I got thrown from a car," he then smiled and said, "It would be more notorious, but because of the injuries, I am confident that I was hit."

Police would not comment further about the incident because it is still under investigation.

When Vasi as he called it, "woke up," in early March from his "state of comatose", he remembers not knowing where he was and thinking that he had been in a comatose for much

'Poetry and Wartime' documentary shown at Smith College for the second time this semester

By Dan Kofman
Collegian Correspondent

A free public screening of the documentary "Poetry and Wartime" was shown Monday evening at Smith College for the second time this semester.

The poets featured in the film were from different backgrounds and eras. Some wrote about taking part in historic wars that are only read about today in history books.

Siegfried Sassoon and Wilfred Owen, who first met in a hospital for soldiers recovering from shellshock in England, are heard through their words about fighting for Great Britain in the First World War.

Others conveyed their feelings on the states of war today. A few poets, like Emily Dickinson, Langston Hughes, Walt Whitman, and Homer, are simply regarded as some of the best of their time to put their words into print.

Viewers learned that the film first came about because of a White House function to honor Dickinson, Hughes, and Whitman. When word got out that poets were going to express their disappointment with the Bush administration's policies regarding Iraq, it was soon cancelled.

Soon a group of poets formed so that protests and personal feelings about the conflict could be expressed through poetry in an open forum. The group, Poets Against the War, started a Web site on which anyone could voice their opinions on the war using their own poetic words. The response the Web site received was astounding, with approximately 16,000 poems eventually making their way onto the Web site.

But the film is not about criticisms against the conflict currently going on Iraq. Rather, it is overview of war itself, but not in a familiar context. Instead, poetry is used to try and convey the feelings war gives to people.

The poems bring the sentiments of soldiers and others affected by war to life. Some poems were written by young children who simply wished to have their fathers come home safely from overseas. Other poems were written by actual soldiers as they endured the harsh realities that war presents to its participants.

Ellen Watson, director of the Poetry Center and a published poet, believes that "the film is about how no one returns from war unchanged."

This does not just refer to soldiers. One of the major emphases of the documentary was to note how, over time, civilians have become more and more affected by war. The film points out that the majority of people who get injured in present day wars are civilians and not soldiers and there is not as much the army-versus-army combat.

One of the most striking members of the cast is Lt. Gen. William J. Lennox Jr., the superintendent at West Point. In what Watson believes to seem like a "disconnect," Lennox discussed the truths of war, the beauty of poetry, and how the two have connected over the centuries.

"For an infantryman or a soldier in combat, it's very hard for them sometimes to articulate what they experience," Lennox said. "They go through a whole series of emotions: joy, elation, horror, fear. What literary genre allows you to portray that feeling but poetry? I don't know."

The film is set to be released in theatres sometime in early 2005. It was first shown on September 11 of this year to pay tribute to the victims of the tragedy that occurred three years earlier. Watson received so much positive feedback after the first viewing, that a second screening was arranged so that all who wanted to view it would be able to.

K-9 Maxx assists in arrests; two people in custody

Friday October 15

2:03 a.m. A subject was placed under arrest on disturbance charges in Lot 20 near JQA dormitory. Maurice C. Maxwell, 22, of Philadelphia, P.A., was arrested for disorderly conduct and assault and battery.

3:14 p.m. An additional officer was called in to advise 12 students who dropped off letters to Whitmore Administration building. Students left the area and the area checked out okay.

4:08 p.m. A caller reported that someone had attempted to steal their vehicle. The caller said that items in the glove box were on the floor, the gas tank was open, the battery was askew and there was damage to the steering column.

6:25 p.m. An officer confiscated two thirty-packs of beer that were intended for disposal. The subject fled and abandoned the alcohol.

7:21 p.m. An officer issued summons to individuals for supplying alcohol to minors. Two arrests were made. Brian D. Schonfield, 18, of Braintree, and Patrick J. McGovern, 18, of Braintree, were arrested for people under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Saturday October 16

12:08 a.m. An officer attempted to stop a subject for a check, but the subject ran. The individual was arrested and charged with disorderly conduct and assault and battery on a police officer. Christopher W. Chin 20, of Marshfield, was arrested.

12:34 a.m. An officer made an arrest after a routine traffic stop in Southwest. Jessica A. Lipman, 18, of Woodstock, GA, was arrested for transporting alcohol as a minor and operating on the sidewalk.

1:24 a.m. A caller reported a fight going on in MacKimmie dormitory with no weapons. The officer spoke with the individuals involved and they did not want to press charges, however emergency housing was notified.

8:23. p.m. An officer requested additional units for subjects in Southwest who appeared to be checking out vehicles. Subjects gained entrance to the vehicle and fled. The K-9 unit assisted in the search and the two subjects are now in custody.

9:14 p.m. Three people were arrested in Lot 32 on Massachusetts avenue for liquor law violations. Ashley J. Wadden, 18, of Swampscott, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

Meredith V. Tittler, 18, of Swampscott, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol. Adam G. Soiref, 19, of Swampscott, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

Sunday October 17

12:12 a.m. A caller stated that they have confiscated some marijuana and would like to turn it into the UMPD. Police took the item and an investigation is underway.

12:32 a.m. A caller stated that there was a suspicious vehicle on Massachusetts Ave.; when the officer investigated, one arrest was made. Sandra M. Shambos, 21, of Peabody, was arrested on a warrant.

2:22 a.m. An officer made one arrest after a routine traffic stop. Aaron M. Silsby, 20, of Clarksburg, was arrested for being a minor possessing alcohol and marked lanes violation.

2:25 a.m. A caller reported seeing intoxicated subjects. The officer advised and placed a subject in protective custody. Amherst Fire Department was called for one of the subjects, but signed a refusal form.

3:36 a.m. A caller stated that approximately 20 students were chanting and being loud in the Southwest Circle. The crowd dispersed when officers arrived.

6:01 p.m. A caller stated that they were receiving harassing phone calls and a restraining order is in effect. The caller has been advised to change the phone number and to document any further calls.

Student still recovering

longer than a month. "When the doctors asked me how old I thought I was, I said 27."

Vasi went through rigorous physical therapy. Confined to a wheel chair for the first week, Vasi then graduated to a walker then to a cane. Now over six months after waking up, Vasi can walk without the support of a cane, but still admits it is hard work. "walking to me now is like running used to be to me, and it's a pretty funny sight to see my try to run," Vasi said.

Vasi's memory is still recovering as well, and is, according to Vasi, "still a little shady sometimes."

Vasi reflected on the incident with a positive outlook saying, "I am just happy to be alive, this whole thing has really put things in perspective for me, and has matured me faster than I would have normally."

Worthy of expression

S.J. Port

The inability to express oneself is crippling.

University of Massachusetts students who find themselves unable to speak, comprehend or write proper English face a battalion of challenges invisible to most of their peers.

This community of students includes (but is in no way exclusively comprised of) exchange students, non-native English speakers, English as a second language, children of homes in which traditional proper English was not spoken due to educational, cultural, economic, or other reasons, students with diagnosed and undiagnosed learning differences (note I did not say disabilities, they are not disabled — they learn differently) and even honors English majors. This is by no means a minority group on our campus; it is a solid and established collective of UMass students.

By the time students enter the University they are expected to have learned a general body of knowledge and be able to communicate this body of knowledge through writing. The University's Writing Program determines their placement in one of three college writing basics courses (or grants exceptional writers, based on their testing, a waiver), and off students go on their journey through the University's always confusing curriculum of writing.

Many students will leave their college writing courses feeling confident in their ability to cite, summarize, analyze and so forth, but others will require further assistance. It is here that the University falls them: ESL, BCP, CCEMBS, LDSS, UALRC and other on-campus support resources for students are sinking under the burden of maintaining the appropriate staff numbers in times of budget cuts and harsh resource program chops. Students who once qualified for academic assistance from these programs must often seek help from other sources because of the lack of tutors, advisors, and staffers in general to help all the students who need help.

People who are unable to write a coherent English sentence are admitted to this University every day.

Tutors are expensive, elusive and not always available. Professors are busy publishing, or sometimes do not know how to help their students —especially students with learning disabilities, psychological disabilities that affect the student's academic aspirations, non-native English speakers struggling to comprehend because of the language involved (not because of the intellectual level required by the subject).

Just as likely, students are intimidated by the inherent hierarchy of the teacher-student relationship, which then inhibits their comfort level in asking the teacher for help with "simple" or "basic" things that they "should know by now."

People who are unable to write a coherent English sentence are admitted to this University every day. However, once admitted, these students are left by the University as sacrifices to the merciless gauntlet of written academia. They slide between the cracks of the large public institution that has admitted them but refuses to effectively support them.

Desperate for help to express the brilliance buzzing below their surfaces, often in another language, they seek out alternative generic University support services: on the tenth floor of the DuBois library is Learning Support Services, a free and available service for all University students; or if they happen to be a varsity athlete they are eligible for free tutoring from the self-contained athletic tutoring service in Boyden gymnasium. More and more often students seek solace and support within the welcoming walls of Bartlett 303, home to the University Writing Program's Writing Center.

The Writing Center accepts all members of the University community to come and work on any kind of writing (academic, creative, professional, etc.) at any stage in their writing process (from brainstorming, to drafting, revision, to copy-editing) to discuss any aspect of their writing (how to begin, organization, development of ideas, analysis, form, clarity, grammar, proper citation methods, etc.). However, just as LDSS, ESL, CCEMBS, UALRC, BCP are buckling under the weight of budget concerns and heavy student need, the Writing Center is struggling to balance the perpetually increasing demand of their tutors from students.

The Writing Center runs on a strict budget designated by the Writing Program's similarly severe pecuniary constrictions. However, with the use of peer tutors (who have completed a year-long training course sponsored by the English department and the Commonwealth College) the Writing Center has managed to add to their community outreach yearly. Tutors hold workshops, work extensive hours throughout the week and are in the process of considering the possibilities of online tutoring sessions in order to reach more students.

According to the Writing Program web site it is their "belief that skill in writing is the hallmark of the educated person in any career or profession and is the collective and trans-disciplinary responsibility of the academic community," which drives their work and their constant search for greater funding and recognition from the University.

The disintegration of programs like ESL, BCP, CCEMBS, UALRC, LDSS, and so on, has left a hole at the University for students of all kinds to fall into because of the perpetual challenges written communication provides within academia and the dearth of support for students struggling to express themselves.

Dress it up right

Sanam Hakim

Halloween is coming soon and it's time for me to start thinking of a costume. I did a search online and I got some great new ideas: a sexy vixen, an evil pixie, a naughty Dorothy, a "bad" schoolgirl. Then I started thinking about coordinating costumes with some of my friends: the guys can be the pimps, and me and the other girls can be their "hoes," or maybe the guys can be Santa's and the girls can be the sexy Santa's helpers. Either way, my goal is to dress as provocatively as possibly, because hey — it's Halloween, and that's what girls do.

Why? I really have no idea. It actually surprises me that no one realizes the negative effect Halloween has on our UMass community. Guys come up with some really outrageous, goofy costumes and wear them around to get a few laughs. Girls, on the other hand, spend up to fifty dollars on something skin tight and small, get their friends to wear the same outfit in a different color, and then walk around campus thinking they look cute.

First of all, do not even try to justify your "sexy" costume by saying that you are doing it for yourself. It is really cold outside. No girl in her right mind would wear a "naughty nurse" costume when it's thirty degrees outside, in the name of self-righteousness. If you genuinely believe that you are wearing your sexy costume for yourself, maybe you need to reevaluate your logic because it makes no sense.

Second of all, why do you want to dress sexy anyway? Halloween is supposed to be scary, not sexy. It seems like one year the coolest girl at the party was the one with the really detailed witch costume, and the next year, she was the dominatrix shaking her butt on the table. I don't even remember when that happened. High school? College? Who knows?

Third of all, whom are you trying to impress? You'll put on your sexy outfits, down a few shots, and then go to party. The sketchy guys against the wall will grab you when you walk by, while a bunch of drunken losers try to dance with you from behind and some guy who is dancing with his girlfriend stares at your chest and winks.

Our campus is talking about "isms" all of a sudden — why not sexism and the degradation of women?

Why is it that Sig Ep can have hot body contests, watch girls strip and rub themselves, and then tell the top two girls that they can split the grand prize of $100 if they make out with tongue while standing on a shaky table covered with beer? Why is it that girls will willingly get on that table? Why is it that my English and Education classes are filled with girls, but my Computer Science classes were filled with guys? Why is it that when my roommate gets A's on her engineering tests; she's not smart; she must've flirted with the teacher and wore a low cut shirt that day?

Halloween is supposed to be scary, not sexy. It seems like one year the coolest girl at the party was the one with the really detailed witch costume, and the next year, she was the dominatrix shaking her butt on the table.

Why is it that an overwhelming majority of the Student Government related quotes on the front page of The Collegian are always males? Why is it that when I'm angry, guys will smile at me, and say, "You're so cute when you're mad," instead of taking me seriously.

Society has trained women to partake in the same disgusting mentality that society is supposedly fighting against. It has trained women like Christina Aguilera to cut up a small square of cloth, cover a nipple or two and sprinkle glitter all over herself, while Lil' Kim sings about hooking up with as many guys as she wants without being called loose. It has trained the average woman to despise the word "feminist" because of the "argumentative butch lesbian" stereotype attached to the term when the real definition, a belief in the social, political, and economic equality of the sexes, encompasses not only the average woman, but men as well.

It has trained college girls to look forward to Oct. 31 so they can wear the sluttiest outfit they can find all day long, without hurting their reputation.

The problem is huge and on many different levels: national, local, institutional, communal and individual. It will take a huge solution to fix such a huge problem, and only God knows how long that will take. I say start small and be creative for Halloween. Put away your French maid costume or your naughty Tinkerbell outfit and do something different. Put on a scary mask or paint your face green and go as a witch. Be a mad scientist; wrap yourself in tinfoil and go as a leftover. Be a lobster or buy a wig and be your roommate.

Look at some of the things you do, and think about why you do them. We talk about progress, then dress like sexy devils for Halloween. There is something very wrong with that ... especially since your daughter might someday tell you she wants to be a devil for Halloween too.

Sorry doesn't cut it

Thomas Naughton

My left cheek felt hot; the underlying muscle disturbed and the nerve endings rapid firing the sensation of shock and pain. After his hand jerked past my face and rested once again at his side, my hand flew up to where the heat was coming from, where he had hit me. I cradled my face out of habit; I did what I thought you were supposed to do when you were punched in the face, but my face didn't hurt at all. I was too angry, sad and confused.

I was also disappointed. I was disappointed that my relationship with John had changed so quickly. I was disappointed that I felt like I was in a made-for-TV movie. What's really sad is that after my boyfriend punched me in the face the first time, I was actually thinking about what actors would be available to portray me in the story of two boys who were so wrong for each other.

It wasn't always like that. John and I met in a club in Providence, RI, staring at one another like dazed zombies. There's a crazy thing that happens when you stare into someone's eyes for the first time and they're staring back at you. You're wondering what they are thinking about and they're wondering the same about you. He was big, bigger than me, an ex-wrestler: strong, arrogant and handsome in a way that boys rarely are: he had a big open face, a strong jaw and the bluest eyes I have ever seen. He was not print-model-handsome, but he was handsome in a way you never forget, which is actually more dangerous.

We were dangerous together, voracious from the very beginning. I loved his strong hands pulling me over to him, how small his lips were, in comparison to mine, and how they lit when we would kiss. I remember laughing at him on the inside, this endearingly dumb boy who fared himself an amazing lover with a fierce intellect, which he wasn't.

There's a grace period when dating someone, where you can keep up the illusion that your situation is casual, although sex is involved. In the first two weeks or so of a relationship, you do a great job acting as though seeing your partner is desirable, but not a requirement. You say things like "yeah, dude, I mean, I want to see that new movie, so if you are still alive on Thursday and you don't have any other plans, we should hang. But I mean, I don't want to run your life, you can hang with your friends, unless you know, you're not busy, because I won't be busy."

You should just cut to the chase and say "I want to spend time with you," but you've been burned by other people and the scar tissue from the past scalding has built quite an elaborate set of armor, which you won't let down for anyone. So, you play games until you're comfortable, and then you can say what you feel.

The games never stopped with John. Three months into our relationship, an exclusive relationship, he continued to point out to me other boys he found attractive, discussing how he wouldn't mind having sex with them. I didn't know what to say. Every time he pointed someone out, I looked at them, studied them and then looked at me, studied my own face, body and style to see how I measured up.

When you are crying tears of rage for someone in your life, your relationship is over.

Was he trying to tell me to lose weight, wear more brown, be less loud or even more confusing, or that he wanted to have an open relationship? I would ask him if he wanted to be with me, or just be casual and he would give me an angry look as though I was the one who was parading my sexual interests in other boys around him. I have never wanted to cry or throw a chair through a window with such frequency during any other relationship as I did with John. I felt so alone in the world while this boy who said he liked me so much stood next to me and gawked at other guys. I wanted to vomit; was this my fate as a gay man, to be \just an ornamental boyfriend to a series of apes in a dog-eat-dog dating pool?

I should have left so many times that counting them would only affirm for anyone reading this my ultimate stupidity. Seeing his attraction to all these other boys, totally disregarding my feelings made me feel so empty, so needy, as though I was so unattractive that only he would be with me. I was trapped; I felt crazy. I felt like I was just another trick, just another station on the tracks of his "relationship train." Feeling like you mean nothing to someone who says that you mean so much to them is one of the worst sensations to ever experience.

Except the worst is what comes next.

We fought. We had to. I was sick of acting like his snide comments about looking for my replacement didn't bother me. He said that I think too much, a funny thing to say coming from someone who apparently didn't think at all. It was only a matter of time that our verbal arguments would sink into him just hitting me like he did, or throwing me into a wall. I slid down against the wall, cradling my face, looking up at him with watery eyes from swelling and sobbing as he said "sorry". I continued to cry as I stumbled into his bathroom, crying and insulting myself for crying.

Then I looked in the mirror, and I did what people who are crying usually do when they look in the mirror: I stopped. I looked at my red face, my big lips wet with spit, and my huge red eyes.

"I'm so ugly." I said softly. I thought of my friends and how they had been so angry at me for staying with him. I thought of my sister and how angry she would be at me for letting this happen. I wasn't crying tears of pain, I realized looking in the mirror, I was enraged. When you are crying tears of rage for someone in your life, your relationship is over. It was abuse from the very beginning, and it ended with me driving back to Boston from Providence away from that apartment ... forever.

Give us a leader

Stephen Post

When Alexis De Tocqueville's "Democracy in America" was first published in 1835, America was new; America was fresh. The Revolution, the Declaration of Independence, these were still alive in the collective memory of the nation. Seething with energy and promise, the country looked bright-eyed into its future, scanning the horizon for the progress, indeed the perfection, it knew was within its grasp.

Tocqueville, a Frenchman, toured the country with eyes that knew monarchy, aristocracy, even dictatorship, but American-style democracy? This was new.

Tocqueville was prescient, and parts of "Democracy in America" are nothing if not prophecy of what a "democratic social state" like America might expect in its future. Not all he had to say was rosy.

Toward the end of his massive, two-volume commentary, Tocqueville takes up a particularly chilling theme: the "Kind of Despotism Democratic Nations Have to Fear" (Volume Two, Part IV, Chapter 6). What follows is a discussion that anticipated Huxley's "Brave New World" in outlining a type of tyranny that would rely not on overt totalitarianism, but one that would trap society in a mild, benevolent slavery — a form of slavery that people would come to embrace.

We want protection, safety and comfort. We will emerge from our cocoons in November to pick our master, then retreat.

"The emperors [of Antiquity]," he wrote, "wielded vast power without any counterweight ... Their tyranny ... was violent and limited." In the early 1800s, traveling across a young United States, Tocqueville saw the potential for a new type of tyranny, a kind of "oppression ... unlike any the world has seen before." What he saw in his mind's eye was so different, in fact, that he could not even find the right words to express it: "The old words 'despotism' and 'tyranny' will not do."

Listen, now, to Tocqueville the prophet:

"I see an innumerable host of men, all alike ... hastening after petty and vulgar pleasures ... Each of them, withdrawn into himself, is virtually a stranger to the fate of all the others ... As for ... his fellow citizens, he lives alongside them but does not see them. He touches them but does not feel them. He exists only in himself and for himself, and if he still has a family, he no longer has a country.

"Over these men stands an immense [governing] power, which assumes sole responsibility for securing their pleasure and watching over their fate ... But ... it seeks only to keep them in childhood ... It likes citizens to rejoice, provided they think only of rejoicing ... It provides for their security, foresees and takes care of their needs, facilitates their pleasures, manages their most important affairs, directs their industry ... Why not relieve them of the trouble of thinking and the difficulty of living?"

Tocqueville saw people in conflict with themselves. "They feel the need to be led and the desire to remain free." They participate just enough, "[emerging] from dependence for a moment to indicate their master and then return to it." What does it matter who they think will lead them best? Tocqueville put it bluntly: "The nature of the master matters far less than the fact of obedience."

Tocqueville feared "not that [citizens] will find tyrants among their leaders but rather that they will find protectors." They will want to be protected.

Tocqueville saw us.

We want protection, safety and comfort. We will emerge from our cocoons in November to pick our master, then retreat. Someone, we hope, will take our problems and make them go away. Someone, not us, who will take care of everything. Why not relieve them of the trouble of thinking and the difficulty of living?

And who will it be? Who will fight the "War on Terror" and keep us safe? Who will launch the next preemptive war to keep us safe? Who will stop the "evildoers"? Who will save us from dirty bombs, shoe-bombs, truck bombs, suicide bombs, anthrax, nerve gas, box-cutters, hijackers, extremists, terrorists, dictators, freedom-haters and weapons of mass destruction? Who will lead us? Who will protect us? Who will it be? Oh, who will it be?

Just give us a leader and we'll be fine. Give us a leader and yea, though we walk through the valley of the shadow of death, we shall fear no evil.

Give us a leader, big and strong, to chase our fears away.

Give us a leader, quick, quick! Quick!! to come and save the day.

Give us a leader - bless him God! - and make our troubles cease.

Give us a leader to "stay the course" and even "win the peace"

Bring him soon: a Caesar, Savior, President-King.

Bring him soon ... so we can go Back where we belong Couch-bound and TV-glued to click away our days. Amen.

'Team America' pushes crude humor to the limits

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Two words: puppet sex. That may be the best selling point and biggest encapsulation of what "Team America: World Police" is all about. An absurd, uneven and thoroughly scattershot satire of American foreign policy, Hollywood liberalism and Jerry Bruckheimer-style action melodramas, the movie is at once incisive and crude, subversively hilarious and dismayingly vulgar. Coming from the masterminds behind the "South Park" franchise it's no surprise that the move takes the time to delve into the gutter to root around in the muck of politics.

But a strange thing happened on the way from "South Park: Bigger, Longer and Uncut" to this — their wit has gone hit-or-miss. It hasn't softened exactly, but it has gotten rather slapdash. For every joke that works in "Team America" — and when they work, they work — there's one the falls flatter than the box office of a Ben Affleck movie.

What does work in "Team America: World Police"? The aforementioned puppetry sex for one thing (if you ever wanted to see a pair of marionettes raid the "Kama Sutra," here's your chance), and the film's spoofy soundtrack of hilariously demented songs, ranging from a "Top Gun" style pop-metal cheesefest titled "America, F— Yeah!" to the power ballad that slams Michael Bay and "Pearl Harbor," to the zippy "Everybody Has AIDS" in the devastating "Rent" knockoff "Lease: The Musical."

What doesn't work? Try a sight gag about copious vomit that's passes grossness to the point of ludicrousness, the cheap shots aimed at the movie's celebrity victims, and the homophobic humor, such as the peacenik Film Actors Guild (spell out the acronym).

The politics of the creators, Matt Stone and Trey Parker, are not clear, and at first glance "Team America: World Police" has a seemingly conservative bend to it. There are nasty jabs at liberal, left-leaning Hollywood stars such as George Clooney, Alec Baldwin, Janeane Garofalo, Tim Robbins and Michael Moore, in which the stars organize a peace summit that's really a plot by North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il (voice of Parker, sounding like Cartman doing a stereotyped Asian voice), and get their butts whopped royally (and gorily) by Team America.

'Team America'
Directed by Trey Parker
Starring Trey Parker Matt Stone
Paramount
Rated R
98 mins.
Grade B-

But to say that the movie leans to the right is to miss the point. Team America themselves are a toothy poke at right-wing warmongers who's foreign policy requires them to "fight terrorism" no matter how high the cost. In opening scenes, Team America swoops in to battle Muslim terrorists in Paris (they're language con-sists mostly of gibberish along the lines of "durka-durka-muhammed-jihad"), and wind up destroying the Eiffel Tower and the Louvre, earning the animosity of the world. Later on, they do the same exact thing in Egypt, destroying the Great Pyramids and the Sphinx.

Where are the George Bush caricatures? What about John Kerry? Donald Rumsfeld? Karl Rove? John Edwards? "Team America: World Police" fails to mock any political figure, as if Parker and Stone didn't want to commit to such satire. So the movie takes a fairly easy way out, mucking easier targets such as celebrities sticking their noses where they don't belong and bombastic, jingoistic action movies, the kind that Bruckheimer specialized in. The movie, it must be said, looks good. The movie may star marionettes, but it's an image that is frankly easy to grasp on to. Stone and Parker know how to make their puppets appear convincing.

The movie settles into a comfortable niche, alternating between sharp satire, and potty humor. When it works it's absolutely, positively uproarious, crushing in its wit and accuracy. When the movie fails, it tends to drag like a 10-lb weight in the sea. Unfortunately, the movie often doesn't work. It's a puerile, gross, and immature comedy that has moments of genuinely abrasive, subversive and much needed humor in it. The stuff that is funny works so well that it salvages what doesn't — but only barely. And whether you are liberal or conservative, that's "Team America's" biggest flaw of all.

Odetta shines legacy on Northampton

By Peter Blandino
Collegian Correspondent

I believe that a small and profit-minded elite controls virtually all of mainstream entertainment. None of it, that I can see, offers a plain picture of this world or the people that fill it. Folk music, on the other hand, is the voice of the masses. It represents their collective experiences, their dreams, and their hardships; it is their history.

On Saturday night, Odetta brought this history to life through her vibrant and soulful performances of several folk and blues songs. I arrived at the Iron Horse bar a little early to observe the crowd — Odetta certainly filled seats, but most of the bodies filling those seats were well over 30.

In fact, the only young people present were the waitresses and myself. I am confused over the lack of interest expressed by my peers, and I'm a little disappointed that my preview in Friday's issue had no effect, but enough introduction, on to the show.

The opening act took center stage promptly at 7 p.m. Jeremy Wallace alone with his acoustic guitar performed a handful of his own bluesy compositions. Interwoven in his songs are many stock blues lyrics, demonstrating both knowledge of the blues, and creativity in his writing. For example, in his song "Going Down," one of the highlights of the short set, Wallace sings in his gravelly voice, "You can dig my grave with a bloody spade." This line is taken from Blind Lemon Jefferson's classic, "See That My Grave Is Kept Clean."

Wallace's skillful guitar work combined with his edgy, and at times dark, lyrics provided an entertaining and fitting introduction for Odetta who took over the spotlight at 8 p.m.

She immediately engaged the audience with a sing-a-long of "This Little Light of Mine." "We are reaffirming ourselves here," she said encouraging the audience. "Don't whisper!"

Throughout the set, the beauty of her voice revealed the classical training she received as a young woman. But the emotion poured into the phrasing of each individual verse revealed her deep understanding of traditional American music. Even with a nagging cough, Odetta sailed through the songs with amazing power and grace.

The highlight of the set was her rendition of Bessie Smith's post WWI number, "Poor Man Blues." As a precursor to this song, Odetta applauded the soldiers of the 343rd Quartermaster Company who, concerned about the poor quality of their equipment and trucks, refused an order to transport fuel to another base. She proceeded to sing the blues slowly, with the right proportions of sadness, frustration, and sensitivity. Such verses as, "He'll do anything you ask him in the name of the USA," "Rich man, don't know what hard times even mean," and "if It wasn't for the poor man, rich man, what would you do?" rung with such vigor that Bessie Smith's song transcended 80 years with out losing a lick of social importance.

For the bulk of the set however, this influential performer paid tribute to one of her heroes, Huddie Leadbetter. "Leadbelly to you," she added. Among the Leadbelly covers, "Midnight Special" and "Bourgeois Blues" stood out as highlights of the concert.

She preceded both songs with a little history — a musicologist named Allan Lomax brought Leadbelly to Washington D.C. to record in the 1930s. There, Leadbelly and his wife Martha encountered such racism that he was moved to write "Bourgeois Blues." He expresses the animosity towards blacks in each of the song's five verses, including "Well, me and my wife we were standing upstairs we heard the white man say 'I don't want no niggers up there,'" and "Well, them white folks in Washington they know how to call a colored man a nigger just to see him bow."

Leadbelly wrote "Midnight Special" while locked up in a penitentiary. The title refers to the train that would torture the inmates every night with the sounding of its lonesome whistle. Before launching into an emotional rendition of this classic, Odetta spoke out about the immoralities of prison labor, exposing it as a new form of slavery, and also criticized Bush for his support and overuse of capital punishment. Concerning the song, she talked about Leadbelly's reference to "Jumpin' Judy." This, she told us, was a slang term for the whip that the prison guard would use if an inmate slackened his pace in the field.

The explanations of these songs, along with the magnificent performances, made for an unforgettable concert. The entertainment value was so high, that one could easily forget how much the music teaches us about this country, and the people who live in it. If Odetta comes to these parts again, I strongly recommend people of all ages to attend.

Letterman to appear on 'Regis and Kelly'

NEW YORK (AP) — David Letterman, who infrequently appears on anyone's show but his own, will make a guest appearance next month on "Live With Regis and Kelly."

Letterman, host of CBS' "Late Show," will appear on Nov. 8, the syndicated morning talk show said Tuesday.

"I think it's nice that he visits our show once every 10 years," co-host Regis Philbin told The Associated Press by phone. "But I'm very pleased."

Philbin and Letterman have long traded friendly barbs. He subbed for Letterman in 2000 when the late-night host underwent heart bypass surgery and again in 2003 while Letterman recuperated from an eye infection.

About their friendship, Philbin says, "That's the problem. We're great friends when I go on his show and then I leave and I don't hear from him. But I'm going to settle that on my home ground."

In anticipation of the event, "Live," with Kelly Ripa as co-host, has released its own Top Ten list, with reasons why Letterman is appearing on the show. Among them: "Thinks Kelly is hot," and "Wants to return Regis' copy of 'Deuce Bigalow' in person."

Viacom names new manager

BOSTON (AP) — Viacom, the parent company of WBZ-TV, has replaced the station's general manager in an effort to bolster ratings.

Julio Marenghi, 48, a Watertown native who started his career in the newsroom at WBZ in 1978, will replace Ed Goldman. Most recently, Marenghi was president of Viacom's television group. The company said the decision to part ways was mutual, but Goldman said Viacom initiated the timing of the move.

Goldman, 58, also served as general manager for WSBK-TV (Channel 38) in Boston, and WLWC-TV (Channel 28), in Providence.

His replacement is the latest in a series of moves at WBZ over the past year, all intended to lift ratings that often lag below those of competitors WCVB-TV and WHDH-TV.

Last year, the station rebranded itself by changing its WBZ logo to CBS4 to emphasize its ties to the network. That was followed by the departure of Peter Brown, news director for 10 years, who was replaced by Matt Ellis. And in September, Channel 4 replaced lead anchor Joe Shortsleeve with former History Channel host Josh Binswanger.

New NBC primetime lineup falls flat

Network struggles without hit series 'Friends' and 'Frasier'

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Minus "Friends" or any big breakout hits, NBC has stumbled out of the starting gate this TV season.

The once proud peacock lost again last week in the only ratings battle it cares about, among the 18-to-49-year-old demographic that advertisers seek, Nielsen Media Research said Tuesday.

That makes four losses in four weeks of the new TV season. It's an unaccustomed spot for NBC, which dominated this demo for the last four seasons, and eight out of the last nine, and has taken in the most advertising revenue as a result. It's still early, but NBC ranks third this fall behind CBS and a resurgent ABC among all viewers and among the youthful demographic.

"They've lost some of their core properties and now they have to struggle the way everyone has to struggle when they lose their core properties," said Stacey Lynn Koerner, a television analyst for Initiative Media. The last episodes of "Friends" and "Frasier" aired in May.

Matt LeBlanc's new "Joey" is the classic good news-bad news case for NBC.

With its 13.4 million viewers last week, it was television's third most popular sitcom behind "Everybody Loves Raymond" and "Two and a Half Men." It's the top-rated new sitcom.

Yet the "Joey" ratings are 34 percent off what "Friends" was doing at the same point last year. Combine that with a 14 percent drop for "The Apprentice" and longtime hit "ER" now losing its time slot to CBS's "Without a Trace," and you've got some problems on Thursday, traditionally television's most profitable night.

Other networks' hits have also taken their toll on NBC. The network shelved its new drama "Hawaii" after it tanked in the same time slot as ABC's hit "Lost." NBC is moving another new show, "LAX," into that slot.

Meanwhile, "Law & Order" is down 21 percent in the ratings now that it is competing against CBS's "CSI: NY." ABC's "Desperate Housewives," the season's biggest freshman hit with 20.9 million viewers Sunday, has caused the ratings to fade for NBC's "Law & Order: Criminal Intent."

NBC is down 8 percent from last year among all viewers, and 10 percent among viewers aged 18 to 49, while ABC and CBS is up in both categories, Nielsen Media Research said.

NBC is "not doing any worse than we expected them to be," said Steve Sternberg, television analyst for ad buyers Magna Global. "We expected them to be down. The surprise is how well ABC is doing."

It's ABC that has the watercooler shows, even though NBC had three weeks of Olympics to promote its new programming. With the exception of "The Apprentice" earlier this year, the buzz hasn't been following NBC often enough.

"It's been a slowly building situation," Koerner said, "and there's a lot of pressure on them to come up with something that will work."

On the bright side, the pilot episode for "The Office" — expected in midseason — is hilarious, she said. NBC also has high hopes for some of its reality programming, like "The $25 Million Hoax," which has a woman lying to her family about winning a lottery.

The new NBC season hasn't had the success of years past without the popular television series "Friends".

'Motley Crew' front man gets schooled on reality TV series

By Scott Bauer
Associated Press

LINCOLN (AP) —You'd think he'd be good at the drums.

But there was rocker Tommy Lee, struggling to keep up with 22-year-old University of Nebraska marching band veteran Ben Coleman. No, Lee hasn't left the stage to go back to school — but he's turned the Nebraska campus on its head by filming an upcoming reality show here.

The six-episode, half-hour show, set to air on NBC next year, will focus on the former Motley Crue drummer's experiences while trying out for the band, taking classes on plant identification and chemistry, hanging out in his off-campus apartment — and, no doubt, partying.

"Everyone wants to party with him," said 21-year-old student Burt Kilgore, who's part of Lee's horticulture class. So far Lee has turned down invitations to hit the downtown bars, Kilgore said.

Showing the much tattooed, nose-pierced, high school dropout tearing it up with college students isn't the goal of the show, said executive producer Eddie October.

"That's Tommy's former or original rock star life," October said. "The concept of the show is very much that Tommy is a fish out of water and Tommy is making the effort to fit into this collegiate experience."

Lee will have to watch himself while on campus. He agreed to abide by the student code of conduct, which bans such things as smoking in campus buildings, intentionally disrupting the peace and uninvited sexually explicit behavior. And campus Chancellor Harvey Perlman says before NBC got the green light, he was assured the show would be about the redemptive nature of higher education — not the seamy side.

But Perlman knows there are risks when a personality like Lee is involved. After compiling a standard sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll resume, he became infamous after a honeymoon sex tape surfaced in 1998 of him with then-wife Pamela Anderson. Lee also served four months behind bars after pleading no contest to kicking Anderson while she held their son. "They offered us Tommy Lee, they didn't offer us Snow White," Perlman said.

The criticism began the minute news of the show broke two weeks ago."For years we have been trying to send the message that we are increasing our standards, and that we are a research university that is to be taken seriously. This is not consistent with that message," said economics professor Ann Marr May. "I don't think we want the face of the university through its public relations to be that of Tommy Lee."

The anger stems not from anything the 42-year-old drummer behind hard rock hits such as "Smokin' in the Boys Room" and "Dr. Feelgood" has done since he got here. It's his past that's haunting him.

In his new book released Tuesday, "Tommyland," Lee describes his rock 'n' roll lifestyle: "We drank oceans of liquor, snorted and shot mountains of drugs, crashed cars, watched people die, and watched one another fight, make up, break up, reunite, and break up again."

Local domestic violence and family groups have gone on record with concerns about Lee's show coming to the campus, and the university's Women's Caucus urged members to sign a petition decrying the program.

"They're aligning themselves with a person who has a history of abuse," said Bob Meyer, director of the Family Violence Council. "Will the show give messages that speak to the wrongness of his past behaviors or will it give messages that minimize it or wipe it off the radar screen?"

Perlman acknowledged that Lee had a checkered past, but said some were taking the filming of the show too seriously. Lee is not enrolled at the school and he will not receive actual credit for any classes.

Speedy play makes Beresin a key player

13 minutes left in the game, Beresin's intensity heightened to that of a caged animal. The senior cranked up the pressure once again.

Flipping on the speed, Temple defenders were unable to keep Beresin from breaking away. After several shots and set ups to teammate Adrian Monaco, the senior speed demon finally broke through at the three minute mark with the game tying goal, letting out a ferocious battle cry once the ball hit the backboard.

"She had probably one of the best games I've seen her play in four years," Shea commented. "She was patient, she was poised. She used her speed in tremendous ways, she knew when to speed up; she knew when to slow down. It was funny because after regulation she came off the field and said 'You know what, this is ridiculous we're taking care of it right now.'"

True to her word, Beresin did take care of it, drawing a penalty corner a little over a minute in to overtime that set up Kara Murphy's game winner.

Beresin should continue to be successful, but it won't be easy as now teams are beginning to target the forward. St. Joes shifted its fastest player, midfielder Katie Young, to back for Sunday's game to mark Beresin. Two and three defenders forward this the swift Beresin every time she touched the ball in Sunday's game, yet she still managed to get off three shots. This kind of attention should become the norm over the stretch for Beresin. If she continues to make adjustments, UMass will continue to thrive and potentially gain a sixth Atlantic 10 championship in the Shea era.

UMass takes four in a row

FIELD HOCKEY from page 8

Minutewomen and the St Joseph's Hawks (7-6) on Sunday. In fact, it took two sets of penalty strokes to give the Maroon and White a 2-1 victory.

Leading 3-1, penalty stroke specialist goalkeeper Becky Letourneau saved the Hawk's fourth stroke and trotted back to join her teammates who were linked arm and arm in hopes of victory. The team seemed befuddled as the refs began to walk off the field instead of lining up the Minutewomen's next shot.

It wasn't until coach Shea yelled out, "Hey guys, you won," that the team finally realized that the game was over and began to celebrate the emotional victory.

UMass got on the board very early in the game as Adriane Monaco was given a penalty stroke 30 seconds in to the game.

The Maroon and White held on to that lead for 65 minutes thanks to strong play by Katelyn Woolfrey, Jamie Bawden and Marije Tigchelaar on the defensive end. St. Joe's however continued their relentless pressure and finally broke through with 15 minutes left to play. Nicole Antonini and Jackie Arundchick set up Hillary Moody for the goal on a St. Joe's penalty corner.

In overtime, Christine Tocco was stellar. The senior goalkeeper made eight of her 16 saves in the two overtime periods and did everything humanly possible to keep the Hawks off the board. Her play in overtime set up the stroke off.

UMass takes on Dartmouth (5-7) this evening in its final non-conference game of the season. The game begins at Scully-Fahey Field in Hanover at 5 p.m.

The Big Green and the Maroon and White have faced 25 times since their first meeting in 1976. Although the Minute-women dominate the all-time record (18-6-1), they have not beaten Dartmouth since a 2-1 overtime victory in 2000.

Last year, Dartmouth defeated the Minutewomen, 3-1. Rebekka Stucker scored all three of the Big Green's goals against UMass, but she is not returning this year. Sarah Mulvanity scored the lone goal for the Minutewomen, the first of her career.

Although the Maroon and White out-shot the Big Green in their face-off last season, junior forward Lindsay Gossage earned two assists during the game for Dartmouth, while Big Green goalie Lauren Balukjian earned a career-high eleven saves. Balukjian made eleven saves again this season in a loss against Maine, with a total of 64 saves this year.

Senior UMass goalie Christine Tocco earned eight saves against Dartmouth in 2003, and is currently ranked third in the nation for saves, with 166. Offensively, senior forward Caitlin Beresin leads the Minutewomen in points (14), goals (7), shots (46), and shots on goal (29), while junior back Katelyn Woolfrey and sophomore midfielder Marije Tigchelaar have the most assists, with three apiece.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Junior midfielder Patricia Borneo plays the ball during the 2004 campaign. Borneo has two goals and an assist this year for UMass.

UMass won all three of last week's games, with freshman Kara Murphy scoring two of the three game-winners. For her efforts, Murphy was named Rookie of the Week by the Atlantic 10, as well as by Women's FieldHockey.com.

Sophomore forward Abby Brown of the Big Green also earned a nod this week, named to the Ivy League Weekly Honor Roll.

On Sunday, Dartmouth upset No. 16 Syracuse 3-1. With both teams straight from these crucial victories, the energy will be high tonight in Hanover. UMass faced Syracuse earlier in the season, and fell 3-0.

The Big Green and the Maroon and White have faced five of the same opponents this season and emerged with the same record, 5-2. However, they fared differently against Syracuse and Maine. UMass blanked Maine, while Dartmouth lost 2-1 in overtime.

Minutewomen on a roll

Beresin bolts towards sucess

By Dave Quinn and Paula Aiden
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — Philadelphia was very kind to the Massachusetts field hockey team (6-11, 3-1 A-10) as it was victorious in both its games this weekend. With the two victories, the Maroon and White improved to 3-1 in Atlantic 10 play and solo possession of second place in the conference.

Two minutes into Saturday's contest, freshman back Kara Murphy was pulled from the game and caught an ear full from coach Patty Shea

UMass	3
Temple	2
St. Joseph's	1

"I asked her if she was ready to play," Shea said. "I felt that in her movement and in her reaction she was two to three steps slow. I told her 'You are not a freshman anymore. We're a good 15 games in to the season, you're an experienced player and our expectations are higher.'"

The speech worked.

With the score knotted at 2-2 Murphy provided the game-winning goal just a little over a minute into overtime to give the Maroon and White a 3-2 win over Owls of Temple (6-8). Martje Tigchelaar got the assist on the goal as she found Murphy all alone by the right goal post. The goal was the back's second of the season.

Though things ended well for the Minutewomen, they struggled in the opening minutes of the game. Sloppy passing and sluggish play combined with the Temple pressure put Massachusetts on the defensive early.

"I think after the 10 game home stand, we weren't used to the six hour bus ride and what not. I think it took our bodies a little while to adjust," said senior forward Caitlin Beresin

A "little while" was in fact almost 32 minutes. It wasn't until Andrea Duva of Temple scored the opening goal of the game that Massachusetts finally woke up, and to their credit woke up with a fury.

Just seven seconds after the Temple goal, Beresin evened things up at 1-1. Beresin drove down the left side of the field, drawing Temple goalkeeper Erin Conroy out of the net. Beresin drove the ball passed the off-balanced keeper into the back corner of the goal.

"After they scored it put a little fire underneath us. That's the kind of fire we need to find ourselves, we need to find that fire before we give another team the opportunity to give it to us," Shea said. "They're starting to figure out how to win and how to put it together and even when they're struggling, how to make it work."

UMass carried the momentum in to the second half as they continued their offensive assault on the Owls. Caitlin Beresin and Adriane Monaco lead the Minutewomen charge that fired 19 second half shots. However, it was the Owls who got the first tally of the half on a controversial penalty corner.

"From our perspective they passed the ball three or four times and they took a shot that went flying in to the center of the cage. The original explanation that they gave me was the ball crossed the goal line at 18 inches. It could not have because it landed in the center of the net," Shea said. "After a Temple time out, the umpires talked and the lead umpire came back to me and said that somebody deflected it. It didn't appear to me that it changed direction."

Beresin then struck for UMass again. The senior forward notched her second goal of the game with less than nine minutes left in regulation. The goal tied the game at 2-2.

Two overtimes weren't enough to decide the contest between the

It's often been said by many coaches that there are two deadly assets you can't teach, height and speed. While senior forward Caitlin Beresin isn't the tallest of the bunch, standing just 5-feet, 3-inches, she is with out a doubt the fastest. Now that A-10 play has begun, coaches around the conference are learning just how fast Beresin is, the hard way.

Beresin has come into her own this year leading the team in both goals (7) and shots (46).

Her main weapon of choice has been her blazing speed, in which she can make an average defender appear to be standing still.

There's an old sports cliché about certain players being able to kick it in to "fifth gear." Beresin plays the majority of the game in fifth, occasionally turning on the turbo when she has to.

"Without a doubt, she's one of the fastest players I've ever coached," coach Patty Shea said. "She's really become a dominant threat."

While the forward has always been able to get past opponents, making sure the ball came with her wasn't so easy. Early on, Beresin's ball handling skills had not quite caught up to her athletic ability.

"I used to always be the one who was trailing the ball behind my feet because [the] stick couldn't catch up," Beresin said. "Now it's really coming together and I really think it's helping my success this season. My skills have finally caught up with my speed."

Her combination of speed and skills has been showcased on several occasions this season but never so much as last Saturday's game against Temple. It was one of those special moments in sports where an athlete takes their team on his or her back and carries them to the victory.

After Temple scored the opening goal of the game late in the first half, Beresin wasted little time in responding. Seven seconds after getting the ball back, Beresin used her quickness to drive down the field and blast a shot past charging Temple goal keeper Erin Conroy to tie the game at one a piece.

In the second half Beresin continued to blow past Owl defenders and put pressure on Conroy. When Temple broke the tie with

UMass turns it around

If you follow sports, you are well aware that the term "rebuilding year" is fairly common. In college athletics, with such a quick turnover rate due to graduation, every few years a team ends up with a large group of underclassmen.

Two months ago most followers of the Massachusetts women's soccer program probably thought this year's campaign would be a rebuilding year.

Dan Duggan

The team featured only three seniors while there were seven freshmen who were all expected to see substantial playing time.

Predictably, UMass got off to a slow start losing its first five games, and it seemed that it was time to look to next year.

But then the Minutewomen traveled to New Britain, Connecticut and upset a strong Central Connecticut State team. From there the young squad seemed to gain confidence as they have gone 5-3 since the horrid start.

A major reason UMass was able to turn its season around has been the coaching of Jim Rudy.

Rudy is one of the most accomplished coaches in Division I history with his 274 career wins ranking fourth in women's soccer history.

Rudy has recorded 203 of those wins at UMass and has led the Maroon and White to nine NCAA tournament appearances during his 17 year tenure.

Despite this impressive resume, if Rudy is able to coach this team to postseason play, it may go down as one of his finest coaching achievements.

UMass lost two of its three seniors within the first two weeks of the season and Rudy has been forced to start as many as five freshmen in some games.

Early in the year, Rudy kept the team's focus on being competitive and improving game-to-game. That approach has paid off as five of UMass' losses have been by a goal. Even though the team lost those games, the younger players learned what it takes to win in the process.

Rudy has never once referred to this season as a rebuilding year, perhaps because he knew this strong freshmen group would have such a great impact as the year progressed.

From day one freshmen Jenny Roehrig and Tina Rodriguez have been in the starting lineup.

These two players haven't received as much fanfare as classmate Britt Canfield, but both have been integral to the success of the Minutewomen.

Roehrig mans the midfield and controls play for UMass. She also has shown a flare for the dramatic as she recorded consecutive game-winning goals against Central Connecticut State and Holy Cross.

Roehrig garnered considerable praise from Rudy after the game-winners, as he compared the midfielder to former UMass All-American Erin Lynch.

Rodriguez has only two points on the season but her true value does not show up in the box score.

The gritty defender has stepped in and helped to form an excellent backline alongside sophomore Stephanie Barrett and junior Amy Maffucci.

Among this quality cast of freshmen, Canfield has stood out the most.

The first year forward is the team's leading scorer with eight goals and 16 points and also leads the team in shots and shots on goal.

Canfield has scored the game-winner in two games and has tallied two goals in a game twice this year.

She was also honored as the Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Week for the second time this week, and has to be considered a favorite to be named A-10 Rookie of the Year.

UMass has already come a long way this season, but still has some work to do in order to reach its ultimate goal of qualifying for the A-10 Tournament.

The impetus to make the postseason is even greater this year because the Minutewomen are scheduled to host the tournament from Nov. 4-7.

The Minutewomen will control their own destiny as all of four of the remaining contests are against teams tied with or below them in the league standings.

In order to make this final push for a postseason berth, UMass will undoubtedly rely heavily on its crew of freshmen.

Based on their play thus far, this season, combined with Rudy's leadership, is beginning to look like UMass may end up playing a few more games than anyone anticipated at Rudd Field this year.

Dayton's women vying for first

By Daniel Hillman

Rebecca Sedlacek netted three goals and added an assist for the Dayton women's soccer team this week, as they extended their undefeated streak to 14 matches with wins over UMass and Rhode Island. Sedlacek's seven shots were a game high against UMass, and her team leading 10th goal of the season against Rhode Island.

Sedlacek leads the team in points with 24. With a record of 7-0 Dayton is a top the Atlantic 10 in conference play.

Spiders Attempt to Turn on the Heat

The Spiders of Richmond kept the pressure on the Flyers with two shutouts this weekend against SBU (1-0) and Duquesne (2-0). Against SBU, Senior goalie, Megan Cox recorded 4 saves, as Richmond out shot SBU 24-4. Two days later, junior goalie Kelly Kolker had to make only two saves as the Spiders made it back-to-back shutouts.

Game Winner Helps Hextall Split Rookie of the Week Honors

Kristen Hextall's two goals this week, including a game winner against Temple on the 15th, earned her Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week honors. She shares the honor this week with UMass' Britt Canfield.

The game-winning goal against Temple was her second game-winning goal of the season. Hextall leads the Explorers with 50 shots.

No Goals For Bottom Two

Both Temple and Saint Bonaventure were held without goals this weekend in Conference play. Temple's losses to LaSalle (0-3) and Fordham (0-2) ran the scoreless streak for the Owls to three games. SBU's two losses this week came at Richmond (0-1) and George Washington (0-2). Both teams tied for last place in the A-10 Standings with records of 1-6.

Looking Ahead

Friday Richmond will meet Dayton in a battle for first place. Dayton is ahead two games in the loss column. This will be the first and only time these two teams will meet this season.

Clemens will sit for game six

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS (AP) — Roger Clemens can relax. For now, Pete Munro is the Houston Astros' pick to pitch them into the World Series.

Ahead 3-2 in the NL championship series, manager Phil Garner studied it: the Rocket on three days' rest vs. a journeyman hit hard last week. On the team flight to St. Louis, Munro was told he would start Game 6 Wednesday against the Cardinals.

"I guess I was kind of overwhelmed," Munro said before Tuesday's workout at Busch Stadium. "I'm sure that they'd rather face me than Roger. I mean, I'd rather face me than Roger."

Instead, Clemens will be held back for a possible Game 7, or maybe a start in the World Series opener.

"There are going to be a lot of people saying do the opposite, start Roger," Garner said. "But what I feel in my gut is what I have to do."

Garner could have lined up Clemens and Roy Oswalt to face the Cardinals, bringing both back early in hopes of putting Houston into its first World Series.

But the stats aren't good: since five man rotations became popular, pitchers on three days' rest lose about three times more than they win in the postseason.

During the first round against Atlanta, Clemens pitched on three days' rest for the first time since April 11, 2002. He hung in for five innings, allowing two runs.

"I think it's false to assume that just because you're going to bring Roger back that you're sure to win," Garner said. "Because I'm starting Pete doesn't mean we're giving this game away."

After losing three straight games, the Cardinals assumed they'd be facing Clemens.

"I saw some controversy in the paper, but I kind of think he'll pitch," third baseman Scott Rolen said earlier Tuesday. "I think we all think he'll pitch and then we'll have Oswalt in Game 7, hopefully."

Added Game 6 starter Matt Morris: "Obviously, our position players might rather face Pete Munro rather than a Roger Clemens. We know his capabilities. Although, taking nothing away from Pete."

A day before, the 42-year-old Clemens said he was set. He won Game 3, going seven innings.

"I'll be ready to go whenever he wants to hand me the ball," he said.

Coming off one of the best and most unlikely pitching duels in playoff history, it was hard to know what to expect. The teams totaled just four hits — a postseason record — on Monday night, with Brandon Backe and the Astros beating Woody Williams and the Cardinals 3-0.

Jeff Kent's three-run homer off Jason Isringhausen in the ninth inning won that matchup at Minute Maid Park. The clubs have combined for 20 home runs so far, three off the NLCS record set last year by Florida and the Cubs.

"We're as likely to have a 10-8 game as a 2-1 game," Garner said.

It was right in the middle — 6-4, St. Louis — when Morris and Munro matched up in Game 2. Each gave up three runs and six hits, with Munro lasting 4 and 2-3rds innings and Morris going five.

Munro started the season at Triple-A for Minnesota, was signed by Houston in June and demoted to the minors. He went 4-7 with a 5.15 ERA for the Astros, and has a 13-19 career mark in the majors.

34 people arrested during third disturbance

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

Thirty-four people were arrested on the University of Massachusetts campus last night in a disturbance late Tuesday night and early Wednesday morning following the Boston Red Sox victory over the New York Yankees in Game Six of the American League Championship Series, according to University officials.

UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said a little over one hundred officers were present in Southwest to disperse the crowd of 2,000 that gathered in the Southwest pyramids after the game ended. 44 state troopers, and 10 Amherst officers aided UMass police. Three police horses and a K-9 dog, Max, were also used. The larger police presence allowed officers to make more arrests, and bring some relief to O'Connor's staff, who have been working long hours.

"There have been aggressive pockets of resistance spreading too far out for our department to handle on its own," she said.

Students threw rolls of toilet paper, set off fireworks into the crowd, and started a small fire. The arrests made were mostly for failure to disperse and disorderly conduct, said O'Connor. Police used a P.A. system to give the dispersal order, and pepper balls and smoke to disperse the crowd.

The disturbance was the third the campus has experienced this week. O'Connor said that the main problem is students failing to disperse after repeated orders, remaining behind to taunt and throw things at the officers.

"Some people are clearly looking to fight with police," she said.

"The best way for us to send a clear message is to arrest them, and for the University to follow up with disciplinary action."

The following arrests were made during the disturbance late Tuesday night into early Wednesday morning in Southwest Mall: UMass police, Amherst police, and Massachusetts State Police all made arrests.

Michael Lucci, 18, of Yardley, Penn., was arrested for disorderly conduct.

Michael Torres, 20, of Thiells, N.Y., was arrested for disorderly conduct.

Christopher R. Page, 19, of Harwichport, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and failure to disperse.

Chad P. Mongeau, 23, of Palmer, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Devin Fitzgerald Teagan, 18, of Doyleston, Penn. was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Justin M. Reischutz, 20, of Shirley, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Michael A. Horowitz, 19, of Potomac, Md., was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Paul A. Nuccio, 20, of Peabody, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Scott M. Tureeck, 19, of Stoughton, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Paul Chris Enos, 19, of Needham, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Michael S. Moran, 18, of West Roxbury, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Lindsay Kate-Rose Jagodowski, 19, of Belchertown, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Kevin Michael Fasanelli, 19, of Woburn, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Michael Paul Sullivan, 19, of Wayland, was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Holly L. Kingstrom, 20, of Goshen, N.Y., was arrested for disorderly conduct, inciting a riot, and failure to disperse.

Police mounted on horseback ride through Southwest Residential Area during a disturbance late Monday night. 2,000 people filled the Southwest pyramids after the Boston Red Sox defeated the New York Yankees in game six of the ALCS.

SGA holds meeting with new Senate

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association held its first meeting last night in the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union, where they discussed plans for the upcoming year and the "KKK Nine" photo incident that has slowed the progress of the SGA this fall.

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante congratulated the new senators that he swore in, and promised that it will be a tremendous year.

"At the beginning of the year, we were uncertain what direction the SGA was going," Bustamante said. "At a time where the students needed a voice, we really stepped up more than ever."

Bustamante also spoke about new plans and ideas that he and Speaker Seamus Brennan have been proposing including a textbook rental system and a four-credit course plan.

"My main passion and primary purpose is access and affordability, we are the worst state in the country for financial aid," Bustamante said. "We have two very simple and practical things that I want to implement: the textbook rental system really goes hand in hand with affordability ... we also want to switch to a four-credit class system."

Bustamante reiterated that this new class credit system would greatly benefit University of Massachusetts students for two reasons.

"This is a way to increase class availability and decrease class size which will maximize our quality of education," he said.

Brennan said he was also planning on implementing several ideas that would advance the state of the SGA. He said he

Professor Sheldon Goldman receives Chancellor's Award

By Eric Athas
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts Professor Sheldon Goldman was honored with the Chancellor's Medal yesterday for his accomplishments as a professor at UMass, and gave the lecture "Judicial Confirmations: The New Battle Zone in American Politics," in the Massachusetts Room in the Mullins Center.

In his lecture, Goldman described how the confirmations of federal judges have turned into what he describes as a "battle zone."

"When we go to the polls, our vote for president is also a vote for federal judges," Goldman said, giving this lecture as the 2004 elections draw closer. "Federal judges can, and do rule this government."

Goldman outlined the anticipated plan of action that each candidate would take in selecting a new federal judge, who would by most means be Hispanic, to diversify the federal court system.

He said that President George W. Bush, if re-elected, would act similarly to his father George Bush, and select a "Hispanic Clarence Thomas," and that Senator John Kerry would select a judge much closer to the center.

Sheldon said he is concerned that George W. Bush will pack courts with conservative activists. Goldman followed his statement by noting that no matter who is elected, the judicial confirmations will continue to be a treacherous process that include obstruction and delay of the process in selecting new federal judges. Reading quotations of both Bush and Kerry, he made it clear that the confirmation procedure of selection will remain on the unfortunate path that it has taken thus far regardless of the President.

Among controversial issues that Goldman went into depth about was the subject of partial-birth abortions.

"One June first of this year, a San Francisco federal district judge struck down the federal law banning so called partial birth, on the ground that it places an undo burden on women seeking second-trimester abortions," Goldman said noting, and that it as a type of compromise.

"But what makes a burden undo? To make that determination, they had to exercise a discretion."

Goldman also gave an overview of how previous presidents have determined the selection process of federal judges. He said that Franklin D. Roosevelt appointed judges that agreed with and supported the then-debated New Deal. Ronald Reagan appointed judicial nominees that were most compatible with his administration and sought out ideological candidates. In 1991, George Bush Senior selected Clarence Thomas, who was later accused of sexual harassment.

"I have documents that show that both the Reagan and Bush administrations systematically sought out the most ideologically compatible judicial candidates to nominate," Goldman said.

Following the lecture, John V. Lombardi, Chancellor of UMass, awarded Goldman with the Chancellor's Medal for all of his accomplishments throughout his years teaching at UMass. The Distinguished Faculty nominees are selected by former recipients of the honor. This award is known to be the highest honor that one can receive as a member of the faculty of UMass.

"Shelly distilled in 50 minutes, 20 years of research, because he knows the subject so well," Political Science Chair M.J. Peterson said. "Scholars are supposed to condense a lot of information rather than try to look at the whole picture and that is exactly what he did." Peterson introduced Goldman prior to his lecture.

The Massachusetts Room was filled with an audience of professors, students, and anyone from the public who was interested in attending the lecture.

"The issue of judicial confirmations is one that not that many know about," one attendee said. "I wish that more people understood how important it is, rather than focus on other subjects."

Goldman plans to continue his research and involvement at UMass for many more years. He began his lengthy and illustrious teaching career in 1965.

Sheldon Goldman speaks to an audience in the Massachusetts Room in the Mullins Center yesterday. Goldberg is the first speaker in the University's Distinguished Faculty Lecture series.

New Massachusetts license has identity theft prevention

Massachusetts will soon begin issuing a new high-tech driver's license with special holograms and ultraviolet state seals not visible to the naked eye, to help guard against identify theft and underage drinking.

The new features, which also include a background of tiny criss-crossing lines and special lamination, were developed in response to concerns that professional counterfeiters had found ways to foil security features on the current licenses.

"A license to drive cannot be a license to steal," Gov. Mitt Romney said.

The new license will become available on Nov. 1 and will also come in an under-21 version, which is vertical, easily distinguishing those who are of legal drinking age from those who are not.

Romney said he hopes the state's 5.2 million drivers will trade in their old licenses for a new, more secure one when they become available. There would likely be a fee for this, Romney said, but less than the $20 currently charged for license renewals. Otherwise, drivers would get the new license at their next renewal.

What the license does not address, Romney acknowledged, is how to ensure the validity of identification papers and documents that drivers submit in order to get a license. He pointed out that many of the Sept. 11 terrorists had valid Virginia driver's licenses.

The state Registry of Motor Vehicles will begin a pilot program in November, which will use new technology to scan documents to ensure their authenticity. It will be tested at several locations across the state.

Average price of oil hits the highest price in this decade

BOSTON — The price of heating oil in Massachusetts is at its highest level for this time of year in at least a decade, and the state's commissioner of energy resources expects homeowners will pay about $2 a gallon this winter.

"Our sense is it's going to be a high-priced winter," commissioner David O'Connor said.

The Division of Energy Resources said the average price of heating oil hit $1.99 a gallon Tuesday, up 8 cents in the last week and 67 cents higher that it was a year ago. The average statewide price last winter was $1.48.

At $2 a gallon, a typical homeowner using 1,000 gallons of heating oil over the winter can expect to pay about $520 more than last winter.

The high price of crude oil is driving up the price of heating oil, as worldwide demand for oil has outstripped supply, officials said.

O'Connor said heating oil inventories in New England are slightly above average for this time of year. However, he said since many local dealers stocked up when prices were high, the cost to homeowners will remain high.

Joe Kennedy, head of the nonprofit Citizens Energy Corp., which sells low-price heating oil to the poor, said he's calling on corporations for donations to defray costs earlier than usual this year.

"This is going to be a tough winter," Kennedy said of heating oil prices. "We're facing a winter of unprecedented proportions in terms of prices ... I've never started tasking for donations this early."

Citizens, which sells its oil at half the going retail price, expects to serve about 15,000 families this winter.

Birth control pill cuts risk of heart disease study says

By Marilyn Marchione
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — The same huge federal study that led millions of women to abandon use of hormones after menopause now provides reassurance that another hormone concoction — the birth control pill — is safe.

In fact, women on The Pill had surprisingly lower risks of heart disease and stroke and no increased risk of breast cancer, contrary to what many previous studies have found.

Doctors say the type of hormones and the stage of life when they're used may be what makes them helpful at one point and harmful at another.

"We're still learning more and more about the biology," said one of the researchers, Dr. Michael Diamond of Wayne State University in Detroit.

The new findings are from nearly 162,000 participants in the Women's Health Initiative, the largest women's health study ever done and one of the biggest on oral contraceptives. Results were presented Wednesday at an American Society for Reproductive Medicine conference.

About 16 million American women currently take birth control pills and hundreds of millions have used them since the first one came on the market in 1960. Most combine synthetic forms of estrogen and progestin in various doses.

Women taking these hormones after menopause were more likely to have heart disease and certain cancers.

Previous research on oral contraceptives suggested that they, too, raised the chances of heart disease. The new study found the opposite — lower risk of heart attacks, strokes, high cholesterol, high blood pressure and other heart-related problems among the 67,000 women in the study who had ever taken The Pill.

"There's an 8 percent risk reduction of ever having cardiovascular disease" among women who had ever taken birth control pills, said the lead researcher, Dr. Rahi Victory of Wayne State. "If you use oral contraceptives early on, you're probably going to be protected later in life."

Women on The Pill also had a 7 percent lower risk of developing any form of cancer — a small benefit that increased with length of use, Victory said. For example, women who took birth control pills for four years or more had 42 percent lower risk of ovarian cancer and 30 percent lower chances of developing uterine cancer.

No effect was seen on the risk of some specific cancers — breast, colon or bladder. That was good news because of the previous work suggesting pill use made breast cancer more likely.

Studies in animals suggest that estrogen may reduce inflammation in the bloodstream and help prevent deposits from forming and blocking vessels, Victory said. That was seen in animals whose estrogen levels were relatively constant for a long time.

"Those women went for a prolonged period of time without estrogen and then were re-exposed to estrogen" when they took so-called hormone replacement therapy after menopause, Victory said.

"By that time, they may already have atherosclerotic plaque in their arteries," Diamond added. "At that time, estrogen may aggravate the disease."

Dr. Robert Rebar, a gynecologist who is executive director of the reproductive medicine group, said the type of hormone might make a difference, too. Birth control pills contain four to six times the amount of estrogen as even the lowest formulations of hormone replacement therapy. The most popular form of the latter uses estrogen derived from horse urine; birth control pills use a synthetic, manufactured form of it.

"That is totally different," he said. "We can't equate them."

The $625 million Women's Health Initiative study was done at 40 locations around the country and funded by the National Institutes of Health. Wyeth provided the hormone pills for the menopause portion of the study, but no oral contraceptive makers financed any part of that research.

Sixth Indonesian president sworn in

By Chris Brummitt
Associated Press

JAKARTA, Indonesia — Retired Gen. Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono was sworn in as Indonesia's sixth president on Wednesday, but must now make good on election promises to tackle rising Islamic militancy, battle graft and fix the economy.

Yudhoyono, 55, begins his five-year term as president of the world's most populous Muslim nation amid high expectations after comfortably winning last month's elections — the first in which the country's 210 million people voted for their head of state directly.

Despite his mandate, Yudhoyono will face problems pushing through reforms against deeply entrenched vested interests in the country's business, government and legal elite. He is also up against a potentially hostile parliament, where his Democratic Party only holds 10 percent of the seats.

"In the name of God, I swear that as the president of the Republic of Indonesia I will uphold the law and the constitution ... and serve the nation," Yudhoyono said to cheers from lawmakers at the country's parliament.

A Muslim leader held a copy of Islam's holy book, the Quran, over Yudhoyono's head as he made the oath.

Australia, Malaysia, East Timor and Singapore attended the ceremony in a regional show of support for Yudhoyono. It was the first time that foreign leaders had witnesses the swearing in of a new Indonesian president.

"I wish him well," Australian Prime Minister John Howard told reporters. Yudhoyono's vice president, businessman Muhammad Jusuf Kalla, was also sworn in.

Yudhoyono took over from Megawati Sukarnoputri, the eldest daughter of Indonesia's founding father Sukarno. The 57-year-old former housewife — whose rule has been criticized as lackluster and aloof — did not attend the ceremony, something widely seen as a snub to Yudhoyono, who served in her Cabinet as security minister.

CARE charity suspends operations after abduction

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — CARE International suspended operations in Iraq on Wednesday after gunmen seized the woman who ran the humanitarian organization's work in the country. The victim's Iraqi husband appealed to the kidnappers to free her "in the name of humanity, Islam and brotherhood."

In Baghdad, a car bomb shook the city center at sunset, sending a large plume of smoke rising from the western bank of the Tigris River. There were no reports of casualties among U.S. troops, said Capt. Mitchell Zornes of the 1st Cavalry Division. Bursts of gunfire erupted following the blast, witnesses said, and the smoke could be seen rising north of the Jumhuria Bridge and behind the Mansour Hotel.

Two car bombs also went off Wednesday in Samarra, a city that U.S. and Iraqi forces claimed this month to have recaptured from insurgents. The two blasts, within 15 minutes of each other, killed an Iraqi child and wounded 15 people, including 11 U.S. soldiers and an interpreter, the Army said.

Residents said U.S. and Iraqi forces imposed a dusk to dawn curfew in the city, located 60 miles north of Baghdad.

An influential Sunni Muslim clerical organization demanded the Iraqi government persuade the Americans to forgo a full-scale attack on Fallujah, which the U.S. military believes is a stronghold of Iraq's most feared terrorist group.

CARE director Margaret Hassan, who holds British, Irish and Iraqi citizenship, was seized early Tuesday on her way to work in western Baghdad after gunmen blocked her route and dragged the driver and a companion from the car, her husband said.

Hassan, who is in her early 60s, is among the most widely known humanitarian officials in the Middle East and is also the most high-profile figure to fall victim to a wave of kidnappings sweeping Iraq in recent months.

The Arab television station Al-Jazeera broadcast a brief video showing Hassan, wearing a white blouse and appearing tense, sitting in a room with bare white walls. An editor at the Qatar-based station said the tape contained no audio. It did not identify what group was holding her and contained no demand for her release.

CARE director Margaret Hassan was seized early Tuesday in Iraq by gunmen on her way to work in Baghdad.

Her husband, Tahseen Ali Hassan, made a plea on Arabic television, saying his wife had been helping Iraq for three decades.

"In the name of humanity, Islam and brotherhood, I appeal to the kidnappers to free her because she has nothing to do with politics," he told Al-Arabiya.

The husband told Al-Jazeera that said his wife had not received threats and that the kidnappers had not contacted anyone with any demands as of Tuesday night.

The Iraqi government condemned the abductors. "Her kidnap is a clear indication of the base and bad intents of the terrorists who call themselves 'mujaheedeen,' a clear insult to Islam and Iraq. This is all the more despicable coming during the holy month of Ramadan," the statement said.

Lawyers argue for Padilla's freedom

By Bruce Smith
Associated Press

CHARLESTON, S.C. — Attorneys for alleged enemy combatant Jose Padilla argued Wednesday that the president has no authority to order anyone held indefinitely without charges, nor does any federal law allow such detentions.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen who the government alleges was part of an al-Qaida plot to set off a radiological bomb, is being held at the brig at the Charleston Naval Weapons Station.

"The Constitution grants the president no power to detain a citizen seized in a civilian setting in the United States and to imprison him, indefinitely and without charge, in a military brig," the lawyers said in a court filing. "No statute authorizes such detention."

The motion asks that Padilla be freed while the government decides whether to bring criminal charges.

Padilla, who was born in New York City, was arrested in Chicago after the 2001 terror attacks. He was later designated an enemy combatant, brought to the brig and prevented from challenging his detention.

His attorneys sued, and last year the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York ordered him released unless the government charged him with a crime.

The Supreme Court, without ruling on the merits of the case, decided the New York court had no jurisdiction over the brig commander. The lawsuit was re-filed in Charleston.

The government has until late next month to respond to Wednesday's motion, and a judge will hear arguments in early January.

The defense linked Padilla's case to that of Yaser Hamdi, another so-called enemy combatant held in U.S. solitary confinement for nearly three years after being captured on an Afghan battlefield.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Jose Padilla is being held as an alleged enemy combatant.

Hamdi, who was born in Louisiana, was released last week after the Justice Department said he no longer posed a threat to the United States and no longer had any intelligence value.

The Supreme Court had ruled earlier that Hamdi should be allowed to argue for his freedom. "A state of war is not a blank check for the president when it comes to the rights of the nation's citizens," Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote in the Hamdi case.

An order by President Bush in November 2001 allows captives to be detained as "enemy combatants" if they were members of al-Qaida, engaged in or aided terrorism or harbored terrorists. The designation may also be applied if it is "the interest of the United States" to hold an individual during hostilities.

In their motion, Padilla's attorneys argue, "the indefinite military detention of citizens arrested in the United States based on suspected wrongdoing is entirely unprecedented in American history."

Court rejects school desegregation plan

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — A federal appeals court ruled Wednesday that Lynn's school desegregation plan is unconstitutional because it uses race as a factor in deciding whether to allow students to transfer to schools outside their neighborhood.

The 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned a lower court's ruling that tossed out the lawsuit by parents of six Lynn students who were denied transfers.

"The use of racial distinctions always should be a last resort," the three-judge panel wrote. "Here, the School Committee has failed to show that a racially restrictive formula was necessary to achieve its legitimate goal."

The case was the first challenge to a voluntary desegregation plan to go to trial. Twenty-one other Massachusetts cities and towns and several others across the country have voluntarily desegregated their school systems and were watching the case.

Chester Darling, an attorney for the families — who are black, white, Latino and biracial — said the policy was unfair to families.

"Parents are really annoyed that they can't be involved in the education of their children because of this policy of color," Darling said. "It's tough enough to make a living these days to have a bureaucrat tell you your kids are the wrong color."

Attorney General Tom Reilly said he was "disappointed," by the ruling, but heartened that the court agreed racial diversity was a key component in a good education.

"Lynn's students have long benefited from learning in an environment with different perspectives and ethnicities," Reilly said. "The experience has proven successful in preparing these students to live, work and succeed in a diverse world."

Unlike the Boston public school system, which was ordered by the court to desegregate, Lynn voluntarily initiated its plan 16 years ago to maintain racial balance in its schools. Its school enrollment of more than 15,000 students is about 58 percent minority.

Under Lynn's policy, school officials may not consider race and ethnicity when parents want their child to attend their neighborhood school. But when parents ask that their child be assigned to an out-of-neighborhood school, race or ethnicity may be a factor if school officials feel the assignment would further segregate either the student's neighborhood school or the requested school.

Exceptions from the policy are transfers to unite siblings, or transfers of students identified as "multiracial."

"Despite the exceptions, the Lynn Plan opens the door to unequal treatment based on race," the court wrote.

A federal judge last year ruled the policy was "narrowly tailored" and served a "compelling state interest." The families appealed and the 1st Circuit heard arguments in August.

Assistant Attorney General Richard W. Cole, arguing for Lynn, said the North Shore city's schools were wracked by racial tension before the desegregation policy created a more harmonious learning environment.

The families' attorneys said there are better ways to foster diversity, such as considering family background, income, language, and immigration status.

Dozens of groups filed briefs in support of Lynn, including the attorneys general of New York, Maine, Iowa, and Utah.

One group, the Sacramento, Calif.-based Pacific Legal Foundation, filed a brief in support of the families. Sharon Browne, principal attorney for the foundation, hailed the 1st Circuit's ruling. She said Lynn's desegregation plan wrongly taught students "from the very beginning, at a very early age, that race matters."

The U.S. Supreme Court, in two landmark rulings last year involving the University of Michigan, underscored that racial quotas are unconstitutional but left room for the public universities — and by extension other public and private institutions — to seek ways to take race into account.

Lawsuits already filed over election issues in America

By Deborah Hastings
Associated Press

A new political strategy has emerged in this photo-finish presidential race: File a flurry of lawsuits before the first votes are even tallied.

From Oregon to Florida, Democrats and Republicans are firing away at such issues as touch-screen voting machines and provisional ballots. The lawsuits represent a hard-learned lesson from 2000.

"I have never seen this level of concern about an election," said Laughlin McDonald, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Voting Rights Project.

Others believe the legal wrangling may serve only to damage the voting process.

"It's disastrous for fundamental faith in the system itself," said Doug Lewis, executive director of the Election Center, a nonprofit organization working with polling administrators across the country. "Pretty soon you get people saying, 'Shoot, then why bother to vote?' There has been such a concerted effort to beat up on the system itself that people need to step back and understand that if you destroy the very process by which your candidate gets elected, then what have you gained?"

In more than a dozen states, including the big battleground sites of Florida, Ohio, Michigan and Missouri, a series of lawsuits has been filed in the past few months. Most of the cases were brought on behalf of Democrats.

Two of the most common legal battles are over electronic voting and provisional ballots.

Florida and 28 other states will use touch-screen machines, but that has prompted lawsuits claiming the ATM-like devices are unreliable because they produce no paper receipts that could be used in a recount. On Tuesday, a lawsuit filed in New Jersey asked that 8,000 of the machines be banned on Election Day for those reasons. A trial over the e-voting machines also got under way this week in Florida.

Provisional ballots have prompted intense fighting in battleground states such as Ohio, Michigan and Florida.

In court decisions issued this past week, Democrats won their fight to ease restrictions on such ballots.

Speaker denies photo involvement wants to not only help with the progress of the textbook rental system and the four-credit class idea, but also he intends to reform the bylaws of the SGA, make sure all SGA agencies are properly funded, and ensure that diversity is promoted on campus.

"I have a simple plan, its about accountability and reform. We must address feasible alternatives for students after the game," Brennan said, alluding to the riots that took place in Southwest after American League Championship Series games this week. "We need to address the TVs in the [Dining Commons], is that right?"

Brennan also denied his involvement in the infamous "KKK Nine" pictures taken last March, which showed members the SGA and Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy drinking alcohol and mocking a caricature of a Ku Klux Klan Grand Wizard.

"I was not guilty of any wrongdoing," Brennan said. "[The Dean of Students] dropped all charges because they knew I wasn't guilty. I have not resigned and I will not resign ... but I will make sure these things never happen again."

Brennan was allegedly in the SCERA office last March when the pictures were taken, however, charges against him were dismissed because there was no evidence that he was drinking alcohol or present when the Grand Wizard caricature was drawn.

President Bustamante did not formally call for his resignation but suggested that the individuals who were in the photos resign from their positions.

"I believe that those photographed should step down," Bustamante said, "but it's out of my power," he said urging the Senate to take action against the individuals involved

Bush policies unhealthy

David Lewis

While the War on Terror has kept the public in a virtual information blackout since 9/11, the Bush administration has been quietly eroding gains in environmental protection, workers' health and safety, and the regulation and enforcement of clean air and water standards. These actions directly affect both the health and safety of all of us.

The Bush administration's environmental policy has been fashioned by the overwhelming motivation to cater to the interests of the energy and land use industries. The fact that Bush and Cheney both have fortunes invested in energy underscores the administration's ties to the energy, cattle ranching, logging, and mining industries. These industries have always been fierce opponents of environmental regulations.

Traditionally, the conservative platform on environmentalism pits the economy against the environment. The rationale says that environmental regulations hurt companies and therefore take away jobs. These claims use figures from biased "cost-benefit analyses," which reduce health and safety to abstract dollar amounts. The argument is set up to appeal to people's emotions, rather than their common sense. It is rarely an issue of one poor logger or rancher who will lose his livelihood due to environmental regulation. On the contrary, people in the US are losing years of their lives as a result of the push by corporations for bigger profits at any cost.

The Bush administration's environmental policy has been fashioned by the overwhelming motivation to cater to the interests of the energy and land use industries.

Amidst scientific evidence showing power plant emissions cause cancer and death in surrounding communities and cause asthma in children, Bush's EPA relaxed regulations. In 2001-02, when the EPA was revising its rules for enforcement, the energy companies lobbied to eliminate a guideline in the Clean Air Act that would require future plants to use better pollution control methods. When the new rules were completed in 2002, they included a loophole that gave the power companies the deregulation they had lobbied for. Even the energy companies acknowledged that their success was aided by the White House.

This is merely one example of the Bush administration's industry-friendly policies. But in every category of environmental protection, President Bush has attempted to roll back 30 years of progressive legislation. Bush's "Healthy Forests Act" is a shallowly disguised invitation to let the logging industry into our national parks and forests. Bush's "Clear Skies" proposal is supposedly aimed at reducing air pollution, but at the slowest rate possible, allowing power plants to continue releasing harmful toxins into the air. The president has repeatedly tried to open the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge in Alaska to oil drilling. His EPA has narrowed and reshaped the Endangered Species Act putting far more species at risk.

But, the greatest demonstration of the Bush Administration's environmental policy is not what it has done, but what it hasn't. It has failed to regulate toxic waste dumps known to cause cancer. It has failed to regulate the use of toxic pesticides, known to disrupt children's normal development. It has failed to take any action on the lead paint epidemic still poisoning the inner cities. The Clear Skies proposal also fails to regulate mercury, known to cause brain damage. This widespread deregulation of hazardous toxins is directly responsible for deteriorating health in working communities.

President Bush has also reneged on his campaign promise to limit carbon dioxide emissions, widely acknowledged to be a cause of global warming. In fact, in the face of overwhelming evidence (including reports released by the White House) and a broad scientific consensus, the President continues to deny the existence of global warming. Bush is now the only leader in the industrialized world who has refused to sign the UN Kyoto Treaty, which called for the reduction of the emission of greenhouse gases (the main causes of global warming). The U.S. is the leading polluter in this category, producing over one third of the world's greenhouse gases.

The Bush administration's attacks on the health of Americans are not limited to environmental policy, but also include workers' health and safety regulations. According to the Communication Workers of America (CWA) Web site, "the Bush administration has repealed, withdrawn, blocked or weakened dozens of job safety standards," and failed to draft any improved standards. The list of about 50 drafted health and safety codes that were withdrawn by the administration includes air quality measures, protection from toxic fluids and sprays, construction hazards, heavy machinery, and personal protective equipment. The administration even withdrew drafted health and safety codes for workers from Bush and Cheney's own industry partners (codes on oil and gas well drilling, mine dust, mine rescue teams, and many more).

Bush's worker health and safety and environmental policies are irresponsible and destructive to our collective well-being. They show a blatant disregard for the health and safety of the American people that he continually vows to "defend." They are clearly not creating jobs, since 2 million jobs have been lost in past four years. Instead, these policies are only benefiting big companies and their stockholders, and at our expense.

When these policy decisions are threatening your health, you don't have to be a tree-hugger to be concerned about what is happening to our environment under the Bush Administration. All you have to be is alive.

Forgiveness is divine

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

On Sept. 26, Great Britain announced a new effort to help lesser-developed countries (LDCs) reduce their huge debts by offering to pay off 10 percent of the total owed to international agencies. The plan is to encompass the world's 32 poorest nations. The move is largely symbolic since the estimated £100 (US$180) million that will be annually allocated to a debt forgiveness fund is already part of Britain's development budget, but the decision nevertheless marks a turning point in the global struggle for effective LDC development. London has challenged its peers to follow suit.

Debt relief is currently one of the most contentious topics in developmental economics, despite the consensus that it is a vital component for successful aid to underdeveloped parts of the world. Since foreign debt is often debilitating to poor economies and forces governments to choose between repaying international lenders and making much-needed investments in healthcare, education, and infrastructure, most countries have benefited little and suffered much from IMF and World Bank loans.

In several countries, debt servicing totals to more than a quarter of export revenue, and in a couple of the poorest African nations this number reaches a full half. No nation may meet its social and fiscal obligations under such extreme circumstances, much less enjoy the promised prosperity of free-market economic policy.

Furthermore, the stringent economic conditions disproportionately affect the poor in LDCs, thereby worsening the already impoverished living standards of the vast majority of the population in these states. Clearly this is a dire situation in need of remedy, yet the most appropriate manner to approach the problem is the subject of much scholarly and governmental debate.

Several of the leaders of the world's wealthiest states have suggested temporary market-oriented measures to help finance LDC debt. For example, Britain's Chancellor of the Exchequer (Treasury), Gordon Brown, has suggested a revaluation of the IMF gold reserves- currently held at 1/10 market value- with proceeds going to debt payments. Yet such a plan is unlikely to be implemented since it could cause dangerous currency price fluctuations in developed countries. In July, Belgium proposed an LDC treasury tax on capital conversion into local currency that would profit poor countries when foreign investment is abundant. This proposal, however, undermines the ability of LDCs to pursue autarchic growth strategies by placing revenue in the hands of corporate project designers.

The majority of the proposed strategies tell of the lack of political will for effective global financial reform on the part of policymakers in the developed world. Rather than sacrifice politically valuable domestic resources, most politicians simply transfer responsibility to mythical stores of international capital and espouse rhetorical policy advice for LDCs that they know to be in violation of IMF criteria or WTO protocol. That is why the UK's announcement is so significant: it takes direct responsibility for paying debts and allocates real funds to doing so.

Freeing LDCs from the tremendous burden of debt without adversely affecting their credit ratings allows them to pursue the type of development that their societies see fit, thereby maintaining their cultural autonomy and rendering social welfare compatible with economic growth. This is the ultimate goal of every LDC on the planet. The idea should have tremendous appeal to developed nations like the United States since it constitutes a specific set of one-time payments and not a structural shift or a change in the rules of the game that permit US prosperity.

Debt relief is currently one of the most contentious topics in developmental economics, despite the consensus that it is a vital component for successful aid to underdeveloped parts of the word.

It is high time the countries of the North lived up to their own norms of social and economic justice and made a genuine effort to alleviate the underdevelopment problems of their neighbors in the South. It is not just a question of morality: it is good economics. Growth in LDCs is faster when domestic wealth is less stratified, and stronger economies everywhere means better trade for everyone. The North would be well advised to follow Britain's example.

Enter the manipulation of this very important issue to forward my own domestic political preferences. US Treasury Secretary John Snow joined Gordon Brown and other European leaders at last week's summit of G7, IMF, and World Bank (WB) financial representatives in advocating for 100 percent debt relief for at least 27 of the world's poorest countries. Yet the talks have fallen fall short of the expectations of many going into the meetings. Unfortunately, Mr. Snow was not authorized to offer much in the way of money to pay for debt forgiveness and the Bush administration has called simply for the IMF and WB to cancel debts and deal in grants rather than loans. This could do more harm than good in disabling the lenders by severely cutting into their funds for future aid.

Whereas George Bush has been accused of not doing enough to improve living conditions around the world and allowing total US foreign aid to decline in real dollars over the course of his administration, John Kerry has noted that he would bring the issue further into the public eye in order to garner support for funding debt relief without placing undue strain upon international lenders. In fact, Kerry has tied debt relief to his plans for international and homeland security as well as the alleviation of AIDS in Africa. This should allow him to address all three issues more effectively and forward his goal of repairing the U.S.' broken reputation around the world and regaining the trust of nations.

The downside of the Kerry plan is that it places too much emphasis upon beneficiary compliance with social and economic programs devised by Washington, and not the UN Millennium Development Goals. It is nevertheless a large step in the right direction for a nation that has more responsibility than any other and should be supported at the polls on Nov. 2.

On a more serious note, however, the issue of relieving LDC debt ranges far beyond the upcoming presidential election. Whether or not democracy and liberal economics have the potential to improve peoples' lives around the world will be their biggest test in the post-Cold War world of center-periphery economic relations. The actual policy of the next U.S. president is of small concern to the future of LDC development and debt relief in international forums. Rather, the U.S. Congress will eventually have to alter its selfish, protectionist tradition and allocate real funds to improve the world and make it a better place for everybody to live in according to the universal standards upon which liberal, democratic states are founded.

Hopefully, this will occur sooner than later.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WOMEN ON HALLOWEEN

I cannot thank you enough for printing Sanam Hakim's column, "Dress it up right," in which it was argued that women ought not wear sexy costumes on Halloween. It is high time that society returns to the good old days when women knew that it is unacceptable to express themselves as they choose. Women need to be reminded that sexuality is not socially permissible, especially in their manner of dress, regardless of the holiday being celebrated. My only point of confusion is Miss Hakim's support of this heathen celebration, especially since this year it will fall on a Sunday, which is God's day. I can only hope that Miss Hakim will be deep in prayer and not participating in the worship of Satan this October 31st.

Of course I'm kidding. Miss Hakim's column better supports the belief that women ought to conform to male-dominated social mores than it does to "empower" women. So easily she forgot that women dance at Sig Ep parties and dress in provocative costumes because they choose to, not because men force them. This sort of activity never would have happened a hundred years ago, but then again, neither had women's suffrage.

Instead of opposing sexuality and free choice, we should be embracing it. It shows that women in our society have the freedom to dress like a naughty schoolgirl rather than in a burka or a corsette and gown. If you feel that sexy Halloween costumes are hurting women, then "maybe you need to reevaluate your logic because it makes no sense."

TVS IN DINING COMMONS

When I first saw the new wide screen TVs hung on each corner of the dining hall I thought to myself, "This is great!" My opinion hasn't changed. I still think that they are a valuable addition to the University. When I was visiting other colleges trying to make the lifelong decision of choosing my future, I was amazed at the wonderful atmosphere that is known as college. I couldn't help but notice the enormous amount of technology at these institutions. It seemed like every classroom had a computer, every building had wireless access, and every common area had a television.

The new TVs in the dining hall make UMass more appealing for prospective students. They make this campus more attractive. They give the impression that we are college students who care about the world around us, and that the University is providing access to this world for its students.

Frankly, I don't care where the money came from. It's at such a marginal cost compared to the budget of the University that it doesn't even compare to other expenses. I'm not a huge baseball fan, but it's a lot of fun to go down during a Sox game and cheer with hundreds of other students all glued to the televisions. I am glad that the University is taking on more of these ventures and think that the costs are well justified by the benefits to every student and parent who walks in to grab a bite to eat.

Danny Ainge vs. common sense

Matthew M. Burke

I'm sorry to break the news early to "The Nation" and its fans, but the Boston Celtics are a horrible disappointment again this year, showing no signs of improvement in play, or personnel decisions. Front office jobs will be available soon, I promise, Rick Pitino and M.L. Carr need not apply.

Assuming that 99 percent of Massachusetts's residents did not watch the Boston Celtics and Paul Pierce in their fourth preseason game on Tuesday night, they lost to the Chicago Bulls 93-92 in a heartbreaker.

I'll bet that, instead, you saw Curt Schilling prove that having heart goes a long way. With many questions surrounding his health after game one, the answer was clear in Game 6 at Yankee Stadium. Schilling won that game with guts not tendons. He magically willed our Boston Red Sox to victory.

He said God helped him, and maybe that's true, but I feel that the Sox helped themselves in the offseason by acquiring him and that is why they are our passion, more so this year than the last.

Paul Pierce has the same heart and the Celtics refuse to take the appropriate steps to bring in the kind of talent that Schilling was surrounded with for that victory. People like Ortiz, Millar, and Cabrera really made a difference. We could hoist an NBA title back to the rafters in Boston under the leadership of Paul Pierce by handing out some money. He is that good. He is the "Truth." I hate the fact that the Sox finally pulled out their checkbook last season and when it's time for the Celtics to do the same, before Pierce is too old to raise the banner, the management balks and assures us that things are going great. They aren't.

The C's still have four preseason games left and although these games mean nothing, the facts are simple. Paul Pierce is the cornerstone of a championship, Danny Ainge is clueless, Doc Rivers is a good coach who now has nothing to work with, Ricky Davis is a head case, Gary Payton is old, Mark Blount can't hang with Shaq or Jermaine O'Neal in the Eastern Conference (forget about the West), Tom Gugliotta and Raef Lafrentz are injury prone, Marcus Banks is too careless with the ball, Jiri Welch is not a scorer, and their draft picks are immature and could take years to develop.

Pitching like Schilling is one thing, but when five NBA basketball players smack you while you are in flight driving to a hoop 20 times a game then you need some help. Paul Pierce is an amazing player and he may bring them to the playoffs again this year but without some moves on the ownerships behalf they are destined for another first round exit. I blame Danny Ainge, who controls every aspect of the team.

Danny Ainge, who Red Auerbach said "bleeds green" was brought in to rekindle an organization in decline in 2003. He has since mangled a contending team into a shadow of what it once was. I was willing to give him a chance until he got rid of Antoine Walker. Pierce needs another scorer, and I remember a certain Antoine scoring 30 points and wiggling down the parquet floor. Ainge should not have been so quick to add him to a Western Conference juggernaut.

Ainge then decided to add so much mediocrity I wonder if they are trying to drive Pierce either crazy or out of town. The ownership is cheap and always has been so I wouldn't put it past them.

In Tuesday's game, the C's played the Bulls for the second time in a week. The first time they played, to open the preseason, the Celtics won by 30 points. This time it was a different story. The Bulls are young and may be good someday, but for right now they are the weakest opponents on the preseason schedule. Tomorrow the C's play New Jersey who already beat them this preseason with a depleted roster and new coach. Then we see Cleveland for two games and the season begins. The 76ers are the Celtics' opening day opponent, and will probably beat them.

It is so hard to be optimistic at this point. I grew up with green and white on everything. Bird, McHale, Parish, and even Ainge were all over my walls. Now I'm more frustrated with them than I ever was with the Red Sox. The Celtics have won 16 titles and are now as average as they come. Paul Pierce deserves better. The fans of Boston deserve better.

I'm told that I'm jumping the gun and that I should give them time to grow together. I shouldn't be so cynical so soon. I know its just preseason. I've heard it all before, but I know a mediocre basketball team when I see one.

Politics meet pop culture

The first time I saw it I knew I had to have it. The bumper sticker read "W.: Let's not elect him in 2004 either." Something about its sentiment struck a chord with me. Still I found it funny that at 20 years old I was shopping around for political paraphenalia. That extra $2.50 could have gone to beer or something equally college-friendly, but instead I invested it elsewhere.

While no one, not even me, can argue that buying a bumper sticker is interesting, what this shift represented is. For the first time in decades, since our parents were in college, young people seem to be taking an active role in politics — or at least in aligning themselves with political views. Not since the '60s and '70s has political discourse been not only prominent but also cool. It is our sweet blessing and our dreadful curse. Our generation has the tremendous honor and immense responsibility of deciding what is being called the most important election of our nation's history.

Of course, with this rise in political awareness comes the rise of products aimed at this governmentally minded population. Ours has always been a culture that defines itself by things. The natural progression for partisan views, therefore, was to T-shirts and books. Our cars, our bodies ... these are our canvases with which to tell our story through expression aside from words. Throwing a clever right-wing euphamism on a Hanes Beefy Tee is not exactly reinventing the wheel, however in the last year political apparel has become not only clever but fashionable as well. For Bush's biggest squabblers sites like http://www.cafepress.com/aroseisarose allow customers to either choose from stock anti-Dubya sentiments (one shirt bears his picture and says "Like a rock... but dumber.") or make original of their own. Liberals and conservatives alike will enjoy the selection at www.ChoiceShirts.com, which features a balanced selection of anti-Kerry and Bush attire with

Stewart takes on 'America'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

The image on the cover of "America (The Book): A Citizen's Guide to Democracy Inaction" perfectly encapsulates the book's attitude. Jon Stewart, host of the popular Comedy Central fake news program "The Daily Show" sits at a desk, an American flag draped behind him, staring quizzically at the American bald eagle perched next to him. It's the expression of a patriot exasperated by the iniquities, injustices and hypocrisies of the land he calls home. It's the image of a man who's become skeptical, maybe even a bit disillusioned, by his home, but still holds out hope that everything will be all right in the end.

The book takes on that exact same tone. Well, maybe not exactly the same tone. As this

Sex, drugs and political scandals

In America we look to our federal government to be the model of truth, justice and what it is to be a proud American. We oftentimes rely so much on this notion that we almost don't want to know when our beloved government has done something wrong — and boy, do they mess up sometimes (think cointelpro, the new deal, and where oh where have the weapons of mass destruction gone?).

We have become so dependent on the need for our government and its public figures to protect and serve us that sometimes we forget that they are only human and make mistakes just like us — sometimes big, sometimes small.

but mistakes nonetheless. Now, when you and I make a mistake it can be a problem, it can make our lives difficult or even miserable, and yes, this is unfortunate, but look on the bright side. It could always be worse. You could have the entire world watching, judging and determining your entire future based on a mistake you made (because yes, you are in fact human), and capable of mistakes just like them.) They then give your mistake the most nasty, vile title that any public figure dreads — scandal. So the next time you find yourself in a compromising, embarassing situation that you wish would just go away, just think of those before you, whom no matter what they do, they will always be remembered for that single, solitary moment (or period) of poor judgement, and then ask yourself — was it really that bad?

THE LEWINSKY SCANDAL

It's hard being a college student. You have classes, work, extra curricular, and a host of other issues to deal with. But nothing can be harder than being publicly known as the intern who gave oral sex to the president. In 1995, Monica Lewinsky was hired to work as an intern at the White House during President Bill Clinton's first term. After much flirting, the two became engaged sexually, in closed quarters of the White House. As Lewinsky's relationship with the President became more distant, Lewinsky confided details of her feelings and the President's behavior to her presumed friend, Linda Tripp. Little did Ms. Lewinsky know that Tripp was recording their telephone conversations, and eventually delivered the tapes to Kenneth Starr, the independent counsel appointed by Congress to investigate the president on various other matters.

News of the scandal first broke on Jan. 17, 1998 on the Drudge Report website. The story broke in the mainstream press on Jan. 21 when it hit the Washington Post. The story swirled for several days and despite swift denials from Clinton, the demand for answers from the White House grew louder. On Jan. 26, a visibly flustered President Clinton addressed the public in a White House press conference from which the most famous Clinton quote was born: "I did not have sexual relations with that woman."

Well as we would later find out, this was not true. Clinton did in fact have sex with Ms. Lewinsky, and the evidence was all there in black and white (how can we forget the infamous blue dress with the president's love juice on it?). President Clinton would later go on to say that he did in fact have oral sex with the woman, but not sexual intercourse, and therefore he had not committed perjury. Well, the Supreme Court did not agree and this failure to see eye to eye led to the president's impeachment for perjury and obstruction of justice regarding the affair.

Today the scandal has become one the most famous events of the Clinton administration years, not the funding to public programs, not lowering the natinal deficit, and not Whitewater, but his relationship with a yound intern by the name of Monica. Needless to say, Lewinsky has experieced her share of unavoidable publicity. Now, after almost 10 years since the initial allegations have been made, Monica Lewinsky's name is still synonymous with oral sex — what a way to be remembered.

MARION BARRY DRUG SCANDAL

Many would agree that Marion Barry is the poster child for what happens when the pressures of public office get to you a little too much. The former Washington, D.C. mayor was a great example of hope, determination, and overcoming adversity. As a civil rights activist, and the first elected chairman of the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee, Barry became involved in politics when his position in SNCC brought him to Washington, D.C. in the 70's. Barry had served three mayoral terms, until he was arrested for the possession of cocaine in 1990, but Mayor Barry did not get caught with just any cocaine. No, the mayor of Washington, D.C. was arrested for the possession of crack cocaine. The cheapest, most addictive narcotic of the early 1990s. Mayor Barry had been under surveillance due to an investigation being led by the Washington, D.C. attorney general, and had been videotaped smoking crack cocaine in a D.C. hotel room with a female companion. The long run of events linking Barry with drugs began in December 1981 — but was not made public until March 1983 — when Barry attended a party at a nightclub.

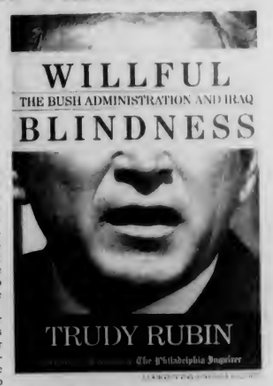
Smith grad explores Bush Administration's 'Willful Blindness'

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

In the world of journalism today, reporters and columnists often receive a great deal of flack when they opt to make predictions about the future of political topics. The outcome of these predictions could bring glory or harsh criticism to one's career. Famed Philadelphia Inquirer Worldview columnist, Trudy Rubin made predictions about the Bush administration, her choices led to a book deal.

"Willful Blindness: The Bush Administration and Iraq," the new book by Rubin released on September 30, 2004, chronicles her columns printed in the Philadelphia Inquirer from July 2002-June 2004. The columns predicted with almost absolute precision, just exactly what was to unfold with regards to the Bush administration and their faulty preparation for a war with Iraq.

Rubin, a graduate of local Smith College and also the London School of Economics, has been working with the Philadelphia Inquirer since 1985. Since, she has received numerous honors, including a Jefferson Fellow at the East-West Center in Honolulu. In 1990 she worked as a journalist exchange for the Moscow News in the Russian capital of Moscow. Finally, in 2001, Ms. Rubin was nominated, and became a finalist for the most prestigious award in journalism, the Pulitzer Prize.



In what appears to be a collection of some of Rubin's finest writing, she speaks about how Bush, Cheney, and staff alike stumbled into a dangerous situation with Iraq with little ideas of how to remove troops.

'Willful Blindness' By Trudy Rubin Philadelphia Inquirer

The collection also includes a great deal of additional bits and pieces, that reveals just how she believes the Bush administration misjudge and vehemently made a mess of the war and Iraq, and subsequently the alleged post-war that Americans currently face.

The series illustrates Rubin's experiences on three trips she has taken since the fall of Baghdad. It quickly becomes clear that Rubin is not just your average awkwardly places journalist in the heat of conflict, and in the pursuit of developing her career. We see that Rubin has close relationships with Iraqi clerics, members of the newly formed Iraqi government, and even the local citizens of Iraq. This concept proves to be the foundation of this collection. It is Rubin's knowledge of both sides that leave the reader in total respect of the author. She may lean to her opinion, but it is an educated opinion, and in the end, that is what a column should be about.

This is a distinguished achievement in the career of Rubin. She has done what very few of her peers have done in their coverage of the war in Iraq. Her knowledge and experience with the politics that surround the war and the country of Iraq make her a true spot of wisdom. She has an immense air of truth to her words. I'm sure this is not the last we will see of Trudy Rubin.

Rubin's new book takes a critical stance against the Bush White House's activities in the war in Iraq.

Modern politics combine with modern pop culture

a few Nader gems thrown in for good measure.

But manufacturers have gone above and beyond the usual fare, and with candidates like these, who could blame them? The talking Bush doll and Bush-in-a-box, available through many websites, are just the tip of the iceberg.

Politics have invaded television, film and even boardgames. "The Road to the White House" (Mayfair Games Inc.) and "The Oval Office Board Game" (Talicor) are fairly unbiased in terms of party affiliation, but their mere existence proves that politics are no longer confined to Capital Hill. In the true spirit of democracy, politics have spread to all areas of the household, even the family computer.

"The Political Machine" by Ubisoft, available in stores now, gives gamers the chance to not only plan their own presidential campaign, but to custom tailor the candidates running for office, appear on news talkshows, give speeches and raise funds. Two of the candidate looks are strikingly similar to those of John Kerry and George Bush, and with all the options for shaping your presidential hopeful's personality, it is easy for "Political Machine" players to simulate this year's election, and if all doesn't go as we had hoped, there is the chance to get the election results you want time and again with this game.

The political invasion has not only taken hold of fashion and games. Our airwaves have also been stricken with the political fever. Since Bush's election into the White House both Hollywood and the music business have raised their collective political voices. Many in the public eye have realized their power in influencing the American people probably goes beyond that of even the highest ranking officials. After the 2000 election there was an overall sense that someone had not done their job, and our celebrities have been sure to not make the same mistake this time around.

On the forefront of this revolution has been Michael Moore, a frumpy documentarian armed with a Michigan State hat and a rage for the current administration. In 2002 he released the award-winning "Bowling for Columbine" establishing himself in the industry and in July of this year he realeased the widely harolded and harshly criticized "Fahrenheit 9/11." "Fahrenheit" attacked the Bush Administration and has been a hot topic of discussion for any politically minded citizen.

Moore has not been alone. Influential musicians like Dave Matthews, Bruce Springsteen and Bonnie Raitt have all gotten together for the 11-date "Vote for a Change" tour, with all concert proceeds benefiting the work of America Coming Together. A slew of major musicians have also contributed to anti-Bush compilation albums such as Fat Wreck Chords' "Rock Against Bush" collections.

The explosion of political awarness on the pop culture scene has drastically altered not only the way we understand our role in the government but also in the way we interact on a daily basis. At every step of the way there is a chance for today's college students to expand their mands and express their views: shirts, notebooks, punching bags, books, documentaries and more, but for those that aren't interested in computer games, talking dolls and/or extensive volumes of "Bushisms," and who still want to get in on this pop culture trend, at least there is always the cleverly scripted bumper sticker.

'America' revealed

comes from the cast and the crew of the mock-news show "The Daily Show," it is a corrosive, audacious and dead-on satire that has the guts to cut through political bull. The book is a little funnier than the above paragraph.

'America (The Book)' By Jon Stewart, Ben Karlin and Dave Javerbaum Warner Books

Actually, the book is a lot funnier than the above paragraph. Just as the show imitates the style of an evening news program, the book replicates the staid style of a high school history textbook, complete with colorful infographs, discussion questions and sidebar trivia. The only difference is that the book is hardly serious. While the matters it discusses are serious, it handles them in a parodic manner that alternates between sharp jabs, absurdist goofery and lewd, crude humor (there are plenty of prostitute, orgy and oral sex jokes to go around.)

The purpose of the book is to help guide the reader into establishing their own full-fledged democracy. The book is a guided tour through the various steps into initiating a democratic nation a la the great 200-plus year experiment that is America. In nine chapters Stewart and his co-writers, "Daily Show" scribes Ben Karlin and David Javerbaum, illustrate the various elements of a thriving democracy, from the President to the Supreme Court and Congress and beyond.

After a forward by none other than Thomas Jefferson, our third president and drafter of the U.S. Constitution (a forward that Jefferson concludes by wondering if Halle Berry is still single) we are launched into the first chapter, "Democracy Before America." Beginning with the line "It is often said America invented democracy. This view is, of course, an understatement; America invented not only democracy, but freedom, justice, liberty and 'time-sharing.'"

From that line on, we know that this tome, this instructional guide, will be irreverent, subversive, truthful and absolutely necessary in this modern world's muddy, messed-up political climate.

The first chapter guides us through the earliest examples of democratic nations (i.e. the Greeks) through the Magna Carta and the 17th and 18th centuries. (The chart helping you decide what kind of government is right for you is priceless.) The birth of the American empire is detailed in Chapter 2, with the presidency, congress and Supreme Court getting respective individual chapters in chapters three through five. The electorate system and the process of campaigning are skewered on chapter six; the following chapters go to quick work on the media, democracy's future and, of course, the rest of the world.

I'll refrain from going into much detail about the jokes found within the covers of this snarky, sardonic volume; those are for the readers to discover and enjoy. If I spoiled the surprise than what kind of writer would I be? (though I'll give fair warning: avoid the spread on pages 98-99 at all costs.)

"America (The Book)" is as necessary and indispensible now as a voter registration. It both mocks and celebrates the diverse land we call America. And in this time we need this kind of humor more than ever.

Fans deal with life outside Fenway

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — A harried Tom Bowen admitted being a step or two late Wednesday morning as he hustled through Boston to his job as a daytime bartender. Another draining late-night rooting for his victorious Boston Red Sox had left him elated, but worn down and a little tardy.

"It's like a second job, but you've got to do it," said Bowen, 62, as he stopped to grab the morning sports pages.

For the second straight year, the Red Sox and New York Yankees have pushed the American League Championship Series to a seventh and deciding game. But this time, the series has a surreal intensity for Boston fans, even by the standards of this storied rivalry, that's been keeping fans up late in Boston and in the city that never sleeps anyway.

Each of the last three games has been decided on the last pitch. Each has lasted more than four hours, sometimes stretching well past midnight. And Boston has put together a string of three wins, becoming the first team to rally from a 3-0 series deficit.

Boston's success against their archrivals — the team with the bigger payroll, the bigger stars in a bigger city — has Sox fans wondering if this is "the year" their fortunes change. Or will New York win like always at the expense of the hapless Sox?

Weary Boston fans struggled between fearing the worst and hoping too hard.

"It's a killer," said Dan Fink, 23, a paralegal from Brookline. "Your hands are cold, your heart races, it's as nerve wracking an experience as a big test, a big date or a big day at the office."

Sleep isn't even optional, said Steve Risti, 49, an electrician from Stoneham.

"You can't leave and go to bed because you can't sleep," he said.

The Red Sox and Yankees rivalry stretches back to 1920, when Boston sold Babe Ruth to the Yankees and began their string of championship futility. The Yankees, meanwhile, have won 26 championships since the Ruth deal that spawned the fabled Curse of the Bambino.

Last season, Boston was just five outs from finally defeating New York before the Yankees came back from a three-run deficit and won in extra innings on Aaron Boone's home run.

This year, the games have been jammed with similar drama, mixed in with trash talking between players and fans.

Pedro Martinez was taunted with chants of "Who's your daddy?" at Yankee Stadium, a not-so-thinly-veiled reference to his calling the Yankees his "daddy" after a frustrating loss to the Yankees in the regular season. Sox fans at Fenway countered with "Who's your Papi?" after Sox DH David Ortiz won two playoff games with extra-inning hits.

Yankees fans were treated to a walloping by their boys in pinstripes in a 19-8 run-fest in Game 3 that looked like it had sealed the series for New York. Boston fans were treated to a win in Game 6 by ace Curt Schilling, hobbled by a torn tendon in his ankle, taking the mound even with blood seeping through his socks.

"He just blew me away," said Mark Keough, 41, a registered nurse from Warwick, R.I., who stopped to buy a Schilling jersey at a local sporting goods store. "To get out there, injured like that, it's just, I don't know what to say, I just get so emotional."

Keough has barely gotten any sleep the past several days. He's been watching the games at home alone, drinking water just so he can get up in the morning and be alert at his job. For Game 7, he had other plans.

"Tonight I'm going to be watching with friends, though. I can't take being alone. It's too stressful," he said. "I need to talk the game through with people, not just yell at the TV by myself."

Though Sox fans have as much cause for hope this year as any, they remain a skeptical lot with the persistent bout of fatalism that has made them famous. That nervousness doesn't disappear after a few wins against the Yankees.

"It's not if they'll collapse, it's when," said Sox fan Mark Fernandes, associate principal at New Britain High School in Connecticut.

But truck driver Richard Murphy, 55, of Mansfield, said even though the Red Sox have "broken my heart for 50 years," this team has sucked him in. His game-watching strategy this year is to project as solemn an appearance as possible, to better handle the stress. But Murphy admitted his insides are roiling.

"You're afraid not to believe, but you're also afraid to believe," he said. "You've been taught since childhood to hate the Yankees. So emotionally, it's a roller coaster."

Cathleen Ronaghan, 42 of North Attleboro, said she's watched every pitch, as have many in the finance company where she works. She learned to accept she'll be spent the next morning, no matter how the game turns out.

"If we win, I'm tired and happy," she said. "If we lose, I'm tired and cranky."

The gut-turnings series has pulled in Yankee fans, too, though history has made some less anxious.

Hamm finds out his fate today

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

Whether he's talking to family, friends or random people he meets out in public, Paul Hamm hears the same thing over and over: Are you going to be able to keep your Olympic gold medal?

Hamm won the gold Aug. 18 with one of the most spectacular comebacks in the sport's history, rallying after being in 12th place with only two events left. But two days later, gymnastics officials discovered that Yang Tae-Young of South Korea had been wrongly docked a tenth of a point on his second-to-last routine, the parallel bars.

Yang ended up with the bronze, 0.049 points behind Hamm. Add that extra 0.100, though, and Yang would have finished 0.051 points ahead of the American.

On Thursday, he'll finally have an answer.

Two months after Hamm won the men's all-around title at the Athens Olympics, the Court of Arbitration for Sport in Lausanne, Switzerland, will announce at 9 a.m. EDT Thursday whether the gold medal stays with him or goes to a South Korean gymnast who claims it should be his.

"I'm obviously looking forward to this whole thing being done with," Hamm told The Associated Press in a telephone interview Wednesday. "I wouldn't consider this (process) to be a pain, but it's always something that's being discussed, whether it's with my family and friends or people I run into on the street. People say, 'Whatever happened with that medal thing?'

"People are trying to find out about it, so it's constantly on my mind."

McGinest vows to stay a Patriot

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — Willie McGinest grabbed the ball out of the air and returned the interception 27 yards to set up a touchdown. In his 11th NFL season, all with the New England Patriots, he still makes big plays on a team that won its last 20 games.

And he wants to keep making them for the Patriots until he stops playing.

"I've been here for a while and I plan on retiring here," the linebacker said Wednesday. "This being my only team that I've played with and with free agency and all the stuff that's going on in the NFL now, that's a hard thing to do."

He joined the Patriots as the fourth pick in the 1994 draft and has had ups and downs, enduring injuries and losing seasons.

But at the age of 32, he's tied for the team lead with three sacks. Last Sunday he picked off Matt Hasselbeck's pass on the first series of New England's 30-20 win over Seattle and was tackled from behind at the Seahawks 26-yard line.

"Of course, I wanted to score a touchdown but I just don't want somebody to try to knock the ball out," McGinest said of his fourth career interception. "Anytime you get an interception or a turnover, the worst thing that can happen is (for) somebody to come up and knock the ball out and they get it back."

His biggest plays recently have come toward the end of games.

He helped preserve a 27-24 season-opening win over Indianapolis when he sacked Peyton Manning for 13 yards, forcing Mike Vanderjagt to try a 48-yard field goal that missed.

He saved another victory over the Colts last Nov. 30 two plays after limping off with a knee injury. He returned to tackle Edgerrin James on fourth down with the ball at the Patriots' 1 with 14 seconds left. New England won 38-34.

"He's found the fountain of youth," Patriots safety Rodney Harrison said. "I see a guy bouncing around. The guy's a leader. His play has just stepped up. It seems like he's getting younger the older he gets and it's a good sign because it gives all us old guys hope."

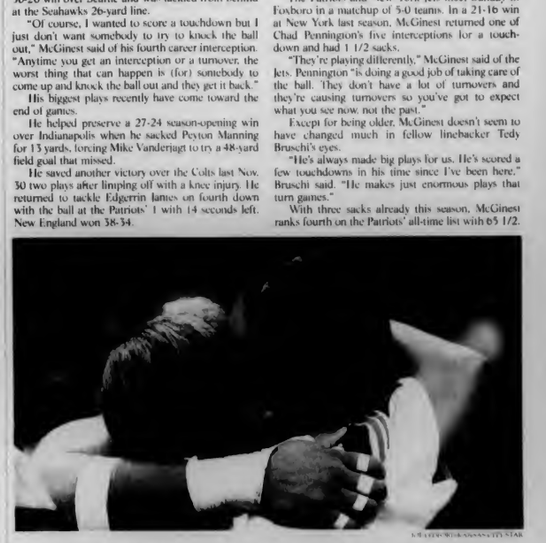
As a rookie out of Southern California, McGinest played all 16 games and had 4 1/2 sacks. But the Patriots lost in the first round of the playoffs.

They were 6-10 the next season but followed that with a trip to the Super Bowl where they lost to Green Bay 35-21.

His only other losing season was in 2000 when the Patriots were 5-11 in Bill Belichick's first year as coach. But they won the Super Bowl the next season and again two years later.

One bad year, though, doesn't make him appreciate the good ones more.

"That's all in the past," McGinest said. "The only thing that really matters is what's going on now and this week."



The Patriots and New York Jets meet Sunday in Foxboro in a matchup of 5-0 teams. In a 21-16 win at New York last season, McGinest returned one of Chad Pennington's five interceptions for a touchdown and had 1 1/2 sacks.

"They're playing differently," McGinest said of the Jets. Pennington "is doing a good job of taking care of the ball. They don't have a lot of turnovers and they're causing turnovers so you've got to expect what you see now, not the past."

Except for being older, McGinest doesn't seem to have changed much in fellow linebacker Tedy Bruschi's eyes.

"He's always made big plays for us. He's scored a few touchdowns in his time since I've been here," Bruschi said. "He makes just enormous plays that turn games."

With three sacks already this season, McGinest ranks fourth on the Patriots' all-time list with 65 1/2.

Willie McGinest cries tears of joy as he hugs his mother Joyce McGinest the Patriots 20-17 victory over the St. Louis Rams to win Super Bowl XXXVI Sunday, February 3, 2002.

Doctors use cadaver to find a quick fix for Schilling's ankle

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Somewhere on a slab in Boston is a citizen of Red Sox Nation who actually gave his body to the cause.

With the team's future increasingly dependent on Curt Schilling's right leg, doctors decided to try an apparently unprecedented procedure to keep a tendon from slipping around in his ankle. But first, they wanted to test it out.

So they used a cadaver. No way to know if it was a Red Sox fan.

"We were going to try to do everything we could to try to stabilize the tendon," Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein said Wednesday night before Game 7 of the AL championship series.

"We were only going to do it as a last-ditch effort."

Schilling hurt the ankle near the end of the regular season and tried to pitch with the injury for Game 1 of the series against the New York Yankees. Unable to push off the mound with full force, he allowed six runs in three innings — his worst postseason performance since 1993.

The Red Sox lost the game 10-7 and went on to fall behind 3-0 in the best-of-seven series. They won the next two to stay alive in the series, but they used every available pitcher in the process and found themselves needing Schilling again.

The Red Sox training staff thought of various ways to keep the tendon in place. Special high-top shoes didn't work, and they hit upon the idea of sewing skin in Schilling's leg to the tissue underneath, creating a wall that would keep the tendon in place.

"It seems extreme. We couldn't find a case of it ever being done before," Epstein said. "It was the best way to allow him to have his normal mechanics."

Schilling had three stitches put in at about 2 p.m. on Monday, about 90 minutes before he tested his ankle on the bullpen mound in Fenway Park.

"If it didn't work, he's in the same situation he was before," manager Terry Francona said.

"We went out to the bullpen, he did pretty well without it. ... Schill kind of bought off on it, and they did it a day early to see if he could get used to it and let him get comfortable with it. And it certainly seemed to do the trick."

Although there was some fluid and blood leaking through Schilling's sock on Tuesday night, Epstein could see after the first pitch that Schilling was throwing like normal.

The sutures were taken out after the game to avoid infection; if Schilling pitches again, they would be put back in. Epstein said there was no problem repeating the procedure a couple of more times.

"We only have one more series," he said. "People think it's reasonable to do it a couple more times."

Epstein said he did not have further details about the cadaver or where the test procedure took place.

yards in six games, which is already good enough for sixth place on the all-time list.

URI quarterback Jayson Davis' two rushing touchdowns last week against William & Mary gave him 29 for his career, putting him into first place in the school's record books. He leads the team with nine rushing scores this season.

The Rams have a running back-by-committee system but Jason Ham leads the team with 134 carries for 608 yards and three touchdowns. Calvin Poole, D.J. Porter, Chad Campbell and Jerrell Jones will all see action running the ball this weekend. The Rams have rushed for 20 touchdowns so far this year.

On the other side, the main reason for UMass' ineffectiveness on rush defense is the line's youth and relatively small size. It hasn't helped that the biggest force on the line, Keron Williams, had missed some time due to an injury earlier in the season.

Against, New Hampshire, though, UMass held the Wildcats to minus-two rushing yards on 12 carries in the entire game.

The Minutemen have won 15 of the last 18 games between the two schools including the previous seven. UMass has played URI 78 times in the school's history, marking the most times UMass has played any team. Its 43 wins are also the most against any one opponent.

ball on the ground. Jayson Davis is now a third-year starter in Stowers' complex system, and has evolved into a heady rusher with a good feel for the offense. He will likely try to throw off a young UMass defense with a myriad of various fakes and misdirections that have become a staple of URI football.

For the Minutemen, they must rely on their speed to contain the Rhody ground attack and keep the option moving laterally rather than up field. Despite losing speedster Wendel Williams to graduation, URI still has wingback Jason Ham, and will be successful if they can get to the corner consistently, no matter who is carrying the football.

UMass' defensive players must tackle well and commit to staying home, lifting their lanes and remaining conscious of their assignments to keep the Rams from getting what they strive for each and every down: the big play.

When the Rams pass

With the talent in the UMass secondary and the lack of any appearance of a passing attack, it would not be shocking if Rhody went without a completion again on Saturday. The onus will still be on the Maroon and White's defensive backfield, however, in playing the run and filling key assignments on the outside.

Brown needs his defensive backs to come prepared for a physical football game, and not be afraid to stick a helmet in on every play to work on stopping the run as a unit.

When the Minutemen run

A week after junior tailback Steve Baylark ran for nearly 200 yards in UMass' 38-21 win over New Hampshire, Brown will likely be content giving the ball to No. 5 again as the Minutemen look to establish tempo with their run to help stymie URI's plans. UMass' offensive line had its best game as a group against the Wildcats, and should be poised to take advantage of a young and undersized URI defensive front.

Despite the fact that Brown continues to sing his praises, freshman tailback Bryan Smith has actually seen his limited action decrease over the last two weeks. His speed could be a nice compliment to Baylark's power against a weak and inexperienced Rhody defense, but Brown may be content with using Baylark exclusively after he showed he could carry the load at UNH.

When the Minutemen pass

With junior quarterback Tim Day back on track after a solid performance last Saturday, Brown and offensive coordinator Kevin Morris might finally be able to begin focusing on the play-action game like the offense was designed to.

Despite a recent drop in production, Jason Peebler can still be considered Day's security blanket, and should have an easier time against Rhode Island's secondary than he has in the last month. Sophomore Brandon London has proved himself to be a top-flight receiver in the meantime, and both should be able to take advantage of URI's defensive backs with speed and size, respectively.

URI returns Virgil Gray to anchor the safety position, as well as three returnees at cornerback, but that has not necessarily translated into success defending the pass. Couple that with a shaky run defense as well, and UMass should be able to establish a well-balanced, ball-control offense to wear the Ram defenders down.

Boston's Johnny Damon watches his grand slam home run in the second inning of game seven of the ALCS at Yankee Stadium. The Red Sox will face either Houston or St. Louis this Saturday at Fenway Park in their first World Series since 1986. The Cardinals and Astros decide their series tonight.

Sox win Game 7, will host World Series

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Boston blew away decades of defeat with four sweet swings.

Believe it, New England, the Red Sox are in the World Series. And they got there with the most unbelievable comeback of all, shaming the New York Yankees, the Evil Empire to the south.

David Ortiz, Johnny Damon and Derek Lowe made sure of that.

Just three outs from getting swept out of the AL championship series three nights earlier, the Red Sox finally humbled the dreaded Yankees, winning Game 7 in a 10-3 shocker Wednesday night to become the first major league team to overcome a 3-0 postseason series deficit.

Red Sox	10
Yankees	3

There is no torture this time, no hour of humiliation. Better yet to Boston fans, it's the Yankees left to suffer the memory of a historic collapse.

Boston didn't need any of the late-inning dramatics that marked the last three games, leading 6-0 after two innings.

Ortiz started it with a two-run homer in the first off broken-down Kevin Brown, and Damon quieted Yankee Stadium in the second inning with a grand slam on Javier Vazquez's first pitch.

After Derek Jeter sparked hope of a comeback with a run-scoring single in the third, Damon put a two-run homer into the upper deck for an 8-1 lead in the fourth.

Lowe, pitching on just two days' rest, silenced the Yankees' bats and their boasting fans, who just last weekend assumed New York's seventh pennant in nine years was all but a lock. He allowed one hit in six innings then Pedro Martinez started the seventh, his first relief appearance in five years

Three hits and two runs got the crowd going, but the rally stopped there and Mark Bellhorn added a solo homer in the eighth for a 9-3 Boston lead.

On a cool, crisp night in the Bronx, the historical pattern was broken, and the World Series will start at Fenway Park on Saturday night against St. Louis or Houston.

Minutemen set for Ram tough URI

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team (3-4, 1-3 Atlantic 10) will wrap up its difficult month-long road trip on Saturday when the Minutemen travel to Rhode Island (3-3, 1-2 Atlantic 10) to do battle with the Rams at Meade Stadium.

The Minutemen hit the road on Oct. 2 to play Division I-A cross-state opponent Boston College and lost 29-7 in front of the third largest crowd to ever witness a UMass football game.

They next traveled south to Virginia on Oct. 9 to take on No. 19 James Madison, and the Dukes scored 28 points in the final quarter-and-a-half to come out victorious 28-7.

UMass ended its four-game losing streak last week at New Hampshire at homecoming. The Minutemen came back from a 14-0 deficit in the opening five minutes to beat the Wildcats 38-21. UMass was led by a big performance from running back Steve Baylark (43 carries, 192 yards, three touchdowns), who won the Knight Trophy as the game's MVP.

Rebounding nicely from a tough couple weeks was quarterback Tim Day, who was 18-for-33 for 293 yards and two touchdowns.

Once again anchoring the defense was safety Shannon James, who recorded seven tackles and intercepted two more passes. He is second in the country with seven picks this year, and he is the active leader in career interceptions with 15. James was the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Week for his performance, and it was the second time in three weeks that he has won the award.

Saturday will mark the second game in a row in which the Minutemen will go on the road to face a team during homecoming. They are 3-1 all-time at URI during homecoming. When they return home on Oct. 30, it will be their homecoming game against Maine.

The most important matchup in the game this week will be in the trenches as Rhode Island has a run-dominated offensive game plan and UMass' inability to stop the run has hurt them in games so far this season. Part of that matchup will be UMass reserve defensive lineman Matt Stolte and his brother, Mark, who is a reserve offensive lineman for URI.

The Rams average an astounding 321.8 yards per game on the ground, which is the best in the Atlantic 10. The Minutemen allow opponents to rush for 151.9 yards per contest, which is ninth best in the A-10.

The Rams' only A-10 victory this season was over Towson 28-16 in a game that featured zero pass attempts from URI.

URI coach Tim Stowers had brought his running philosophy when he was hired. During his first four years as the coach, the Rams have had the four highest single-season rushing totals in school history. This year's team has already rushed for 1,938

Rhode Island will use strong running game

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team has experienced a contrast in styles this week, as they prepare for Rhode Island and coach Tim Stowers' double-wing rushing attack a week after defending New Hampshire's record-setting passing game.

Despite being effectively eliminated from Division I-AA playoff contention, coach Don Brown and the Minutemen still have something to play for. At 1-3 in Atlantic 10 play, they sit just two games behind Northeastern in the loss column for first place in the North Division, and just one game behind the division's other four teams.

Saturday's game will likely come down to execution, as the Minutemen seem to hold the advantage in taking a look at the various matchups.

When the Rams run

The University of Rhode Island's run-oriented spread offense spoke for itself during a 28-16 win over Towson in which the Rams did not complete a pass. With UMass undersized and banged up along the defensive front, the Rams will present a stiff test one year after they led the nation in team rushing yards, and will likely not waver from a game plan of continuously moving the

26 arrested Wednesday after Sox win

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

The Boston Red Sox victory over the New York Yankees in the American League pennant Wednesday night resulted in the largest of four disturbances the University of Massachusetts has experienced this week.

According to campus officials approximately 5,000 students filled Southwest Residential Area cheering, waving Red Sox flags and throwing rolls of flaming toilet paper after the pennant game ended around midnight. Fireworks were set off next to the John Quincy Adams Tower, where residents dumped trashed out of the windows onto the crowd below. Several women exposed themselves to the crowd.

Over 100 UMass police officers, Massachusetts State Police and Amherst Town Police aided in arresting approximately 26 people.

A State Police helicopter circled the campus to monitor the crowd, while police worked until 2:10 a.m., using three police horses and one K-9 to disperse the large crowd.

After repeated dispersal orders from the police, the crowd moved out of the Southwest quadrangle to the Campus Pond, tearing down University signs, tipping trash cans and climbing the Minuteman statue as they moved across the area.

In front of the Campus Pond, A fire approximately six-feet-high was set with materials taken from the W.E.B. Du Bois Library construction site and tree branches. Amherst Fire Department and the UMass Office of Environmental Health and Safety extinguished the fire, according to UMass officials. Police also reported several students swimming in the pond.

The campus has experienced a disturbance after every Red Sox victory in the American League Championship series in the past week. Approximately 75 people have been arrested so far, mostly on charges of disorderly conduct, inciting a riot and failure to disperse, according to UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor.

During the most recent disturbance, an officer injury was reported after Michael Bayroe, 20 of Stoneham, allegedly struck the officer in the eye while being arrested. He was charged with assault and battery on a police officer. The officer was evaluated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

The following people were arrested during the disturbance Wednesday night into early Thursday morning.

Gabriel B. Berkowitz, 19, of Brookline, was arrested for disorderly conduct.

Joshua William Ginsberg, 18, of Andover, was arrested for disorderly conduct.

Sean Thomas Hennebery, 19, of Lexington, was arrested for disorderly conduct.

Senator Rosenberg addresses UMass Faculty Senate on education issues

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts State Senator Stanley Rosenberg told the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate about a "Fair Share" plan discussed by senators to "get rid of the ups and downs" in student's educational costs. Rosenberg also reported to the Senate his work with the Higher Public Education Special Task Force, which he cochairs with State Senator Steve Panagiotakos, at the Senate's 633rd meeting yesterday.

According to Rosenberg, the task force was formed after a caucus last June spent a full hour discussing nothing but public higher education. The Senator, a UMass alumnus, said that in all the years he had been in legislation that was the longest time ever spent on the topic of public higher education.

"Through the course of the conversation a number of senators who had previously been pretty much mum on the subject spoke up and talked about a range of concerns they had," Rosenberg said. "I was pleasantly surprised at the range of discussion."

Panagiotakos and Rosenberg have been working together for a number a months to come up with a set of recommendations and a report to be filed by the beginning of next year.

"First is finance," Rosenberg said. "We'd like to focus on adequate funding for institutions and reasonable student charges."

The Senator stressed the need for consistency and permanent policies in order to get rid of "ups and downs."

"I would like to keep student charges within a particular range. Why should one group of students have tuition go down and then for the next group it goes way up?" Rosenberg asked, urging for consistency regardless of the economy.

Rosenberg said he hopes to have some very specific recommendations for the proposal, but warned that not everyone will be able to get 100 percent of what they want from it.

Lowell High offers college and military bound students $1,200 laptops

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

LOWELL (AP) — There used to be pats on the back, or pizza parties, but now it's prepaid credit cards and new car lotteries. What's next in the effort to get students to go to class?

Lowell High School is offering seniors who maintain excellent attendance and gain acceptance to college or the military a free, $1,200 laptop computer at year's end.

"It makes students want to come to school more," said Buntha Sok, a 19-year-old who has returned to school after a year off that included running with a street gang.

Sok returned to school because he wants to be a cop – not for a free computer – but he said the appeal is undeniable.

"I grew up in a poor family. I never had the chance to use a computer," he said. "I always wanted a laptop."

David Conway, one of five house masters at Lowell High School, said school administrators came up with the laptop idea after seeing daily attendance dip last year to 85 percent at this campus of 3,000 students. To avoid sanctions under regulations of the federal No Child Left Behind law, attendance this year must reach 95 percent.

"Attendance is a societal problem," Conway said. "Nobody really has the answers. There didn't seem to be any innovative ideas. It seems as though we rely on the punitive part: detentions, suspensions, telling the parents."

Nationwide, schools are turning to incentives in the face of the federal No Child Left Behind education law that requires every school to report truancy figures. Attendance is a factor that helps determine whether schools go on the "needs Improvement" list, which can force them to let students transfer and risks losing some government funding.

At Trimble Tech High School in Fort Worth, Texas, attendance jumped nearly three percentage points last year to 94.7 percent after officials announced eligible students could win a 2001 Ford Mustang. It's one of several car giveaway programs at Fort Worth high schools.

In Kansas City, Mo., officials say incentives roughly doubled enrollment in summer school. Kids who didn't miss a day received a prepaid Visa card worth $125.

The buzz about the laptops already has improved Lowell's attendance, Conway said. The daily rate so far this year is 91 percent. To qualify for a laptop, a student must not be absent more than eight days in all classes, reflecting a 96 percent attendance rate, and must be accepted into the military or a two- or four-year college.

Educators in Lowell, an old industrial city 30 miles north of Boston, also hope the laptops will help deserving students offset college expenses. This year, three state colleges are requiring for the first time that new students own a laptop. More state schools will adopt that rule next year. It will add about $1,200 to the total cost.

"We do have a lot of lower-middle class students," Conway said. "Their parents are scrambling on how to pay for college."

About 90 Lowell seniors would have qualified last year for the laptops. Conway expects at least 125 of this year's 775 seniors to make the cut.

About 10 percent of the laptops – some of which are being donated by area colleges and businesses, and others paid for through fundraising – will be distributed to seniors in extenuating circumstances. Conway and others acknowledge that some kids miss classes because they must care for a sibling or earn money for their family.

Critics say incentives are not the best answer.

Allie Kohn, a Massachusetts-based former teacher and author who lectures nationally on the dangers of rewards – including grades – says when teachers are "dangling goodies" in front of kids, the kids are less inspired.

"The intrinsic motivation to learn, read, or even show up, tends to decline when kids are bribed to do what the adults want," he said.

Victims of domestic violence honored

By Matt Hoffman
Collegian Staff

A vigil held to honor victims of domestic abuse brought local legislators and University of Massachusetts community members together last night to raise awareness of the issue during National Domestic Violence Awareness month. Approximately 60 people gathered in the Student Union for the vigil.

A woman is sexually assaulted every 12 seconds in the United States, according to the Everywoman's Center, which organized the event. Ben Atherton-Zeman, one of the organizers, hoped that the vigil would raise awareness of domestic violence.

"This event will make the community aware so that in the future, vigils like these will not need to be held," Atherton-Zeman said.

Massachusetts State Senator and UMass Alumnus Stan Rosenberg, was one of several speakers with inspirational words for the gathered community. He emphasized the mission of community awareness in his address of the issue.

"It is too late when you have to shed tears over a victim who has been murdered due to physical abuse. We must work to prevent such situations from arising in the first place," Rosenberg said.

Students participate in a vigil to honor victims of domestic violence sponsored by the Everywoman's Center in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union last night.

Ellen Story, the Massachusetts State Representative for Amherst and Granby, talked about how much progress has been made recently. "When I was elected twelve years ago, the banner 'Love Shouldn't Hurt' would not have been plastered across the PVTA bus that I saw as I drove here today."

Story's words showed the increase in community's awareness of domestic violence. However, she said that there was still more work to be done.

Michael Dover, co-director of the Men's Resource Center put a twist on the evening by emphasizing that domestic abuse against women "is men's work." Dover was disappointed at the lack of men in attendance at the vigil.

"Every time I hear of a man abusing a woman, and do not do anything, I am reinforcing to society the fact that those abusive men represent the definition of masculinity in society ... I'm tired of other men saying rape is okay."

The Everywoman's Center pointed out that abuse is not restricted in the form of violence from men against women.

Fidel Castro suffers bone fractures

By Anita Snow
Associated Press

HAVANA (AP) — Cuban President Fidel Castro's advancing age – and ultimately his mortality – were brought home Thursday after he fractured a knee and arm when he tripped and fell at a public event.

In a communist society where the 78-year-old leader has played a larger-than-life role for more than four decades, the tumble was the latest reminder that Cuba's commander in chief is an aging man who will not live forever – with an elderly brother as his designated successor.

"I'm all in one piece," Castro declared on state television Wednesday night after tripping on a concrete step while returning to his seat after an hour-long speech in the central city of Santa Clara.

A medical examination early Thursday confirmed Castro suffered a broken left knee and a hairline fracture in his upper right arm, said an official notice carried by state media.

"His general health is good, and he is in excellent spirits," it said, adding that Castro hoped to be "back in place" soon.

"He asked that it be made known he is in condition to keep overseeing fundamental questions in close cooperation with government and party leaders," the statement said.

Parliament speaker Ricardo Alarcon, who has been by Castro's side more than four decades, said Thursday he was confident the president would recover quickly.

"He is a man of much strength," Alarcon told international journalists in Havana.

Nevertheless, Castro's tumble captured by Associated Press Television News, but not shown by state television cameras – was sure to cause speculation about the communist leader's health after 45 years of ruling this island of 11.2 million people.

Castro's health has long been closely watched – particularly by his political enemies in Miami, home to a large Cuban exile community.

"Sometimes, people have this idea that he's some sort of god, that he's omnipotent," said Yanisset Rivero, spokeswoman for the Cuban Democratic Directorate, a Miami group that supports dissidents on the island. "It's a sign ... that he's human."

K-Mart exec to receive $90 mil.

TROY, Mich. (AP) — Outgoing Kmart chief executive Julian Day is getting about $90 million in stock options for his leadership at the discount chain, which emerged from bankruptcy nearly a year and a half ago.

Day resigned Monday to make way for fast-food industry veteran Aylwin Lewis as head of Kmart Holding Corp., but will stay on the board.

Day was named Kmart's CEO in January 2003 and had been president and chief operating officer since March 2002.

If the company meets certain performance goals, Day's exit package will total about $94 million by January 2008, based on Kmart's closing stock price Wednesday of $90.31, The Detroit News reported Thursday.

Kmart closed nearly 600 stores and shed 57,000 employees after filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in January 2002. It emerged from bankruptcy in May 2003.

The company earned $155 million for the 13 weeks that ended July 28, compared with a loss of $5 million a year earlier.

Day deserves the money, said retail analyst Ulysses Yannas of Buckman, Buckman & Reid in Red Bank, N.J.

Rosenberg addresses Senate

Addressing the issue of how much of a contribution students should make towards their education, the senators came up with the "Fair Share Plan."

"Although this is not the perfect plan, everything cannot be achieved in the real world," Rosenberg said. "I challenge everybody who has an interest in the public education system, in absence of perfection, to get together and light to make a realistic plan happen."

In his opinion, the Senator believes that on any given day there are one million people in Massachusetts who have an interest in the public education system.

"The missing element is those one million people who are all on the same page, singing the same tune, pushing for the same idea, insistent on a winning plan to move the higher education system to what this community needs," Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg also took the time to talk about the proposal for a public law school in Massachusetts. He said that experts put the cost of funding the law school at about $50 million, saying that it therefore needs to have a major public discussion.

During the meeting, Chancellor John Lombardi said sternly that there was no group at UMass Amherst pushing for the law school.

"No, we are not in the mode of proposing that the Commonwealth invest in a law school on this campus," Lombardi said.

Student killed in Kenmore Sq. riots

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — A 21-year-old college student died Thursday from injuries she received as police tried to subdue the rowdy crowd outside Fenway Park following the Red Sox's series-clinching win over the Yankees, a hospital spokeswoman said.

Victoria Snelgrove, an Emerson College journalism major from Bridgewater, was injured on Landsdowne Street early Thursday morning as fans poured out of bars and into the streets around Kenmore Square after the final out in Boston's 10-3 win at Yankee Stadium, authorities said.

A spokeswoman for Brigham and Women's Hospital said Snelgrove died there at 12:50 p.m.

Mayor Tom Menino told WBZ-AM that Snelgrove was hit in the head by a "non-lethal weapon," but he did not elaborate. Menino did not immediately return a call from The Associated Press Thursday afternoon.

David Procopio, a spokesman for the Suffolk district attorney, said the office is investigating the incident.

"One factor that is being investigated is whether her injuries were sustained in any way during crowd control measures," Procopio said. "That has not been confirmed or determined yet."

Sixteen people were injured in all, including a police officer whose wounds were not severe, a police spokeswoman said.

Several small fires were set, fireworks shot into the sky, a trash can was thrown at a fast-food restaurant sign and numerous lights broke out.

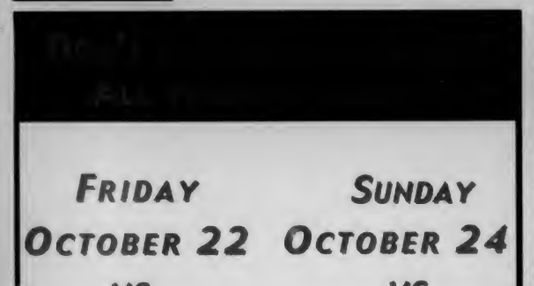
lence," said Banu Subramaniam, a UMass Women's Studies professor. Subramaniam cited the riots in the Southwest residential area of campus as an example of violence that pervades the U.S. culture.



Subramaniam told of the experiences in her Introduction to Women's Studies class, in which representatives from the Everywoman's Center provide information to her students.

"They ask the young people to stand up if certain abusive situations, which are read aloud, have occurred to them or to someone they know ... The room always goes quiet at this point, due to the amount of memories that this event triggers," Subramaniam said.

The professor noted that students do not treat this subject as purely academic, due to the extent to which it permeates many people's lives.

After the speeches ended, the attendees walked around campus to collect red cutout boards shaped in the figure of people who have died in Massachusetts due to physical violence. Students in attendance also carried candles as they walked the campus.

Return to Wonderland

If America was a person, she'd be a valley girl named Alice, who struts her stuff down the hallways of her junior high with her nose in the air, a little too pleased with herself to notice what's going on around her.

Don't get me wrong. Alice has her good points. She's got a commitment to helping people achieve their dreams, and putting their lives back together after tragedy. But she's still has a severe near-sightedness that keeps her from feeling connected to the rest of the world.

Jake Monte

And then on Sept. 11, something terrible happened to Alice. The Junior High bullies beat her up, broke a few bones, and threatened to kill her the next time they got the chance.

Now, let's step out of the analogy for a second. What exactly does this mean? It means that America has finally joined the rest of the world. We have lived with the illusion that we were immune to the everyday pain of the world. Our near-sightedness has finally reaped its Karma. But nothing happened to us that day that hasn't been happening to people everyday, everywhere else, since the dawn of time. There's genocide, starvation, torture, murder, rape and suicide. But we hardly see it. It was only Sept. 11 that could wake us up. But did we awake?

We need an America capable of self-reflection ... we need to help her find her way back to sanity.

No. After the bullies threatened Alice, she went back to walking down the hallway in the same conceited, self-centered way. The rest of the students, Italy, Japan, France, and so on, all felt badly for Alice. The administration shut school down for a day, which had never happened before, even when other students were abused much worse than Alice had been. But Alice didn't care about the other students and made enemies with them quickly.

This is exactly what America has done.

Alice became a bully, just like those that had abused her. She couldn't self-reflect and see the errors of her ways. She was loved by those around her and took it for granted. She went after the bullies with reckless abandon, passing around a petition to kick them out of school, a petition no one signed. Eventually, after the other children saw this, they began to dislike Alice. They saw that she had gone from being a valley girl to a monster. Alice has become one of the great evils in the world, a terrorist like the one's we light against.

We need an America capable of self-reflection. When Alice makes a mistake, she needs to admit it. And now that Alice has become a bully, a monster, hell-bent on revenge, we need to help her find her way back to sanity. That sanity is being offered; help and guidance is on the way. In fact, that's the campaign slogan: help is on the way. His name is John Kerry and he believes America should take the advice of the other students, stop walking down the hallway with her nose in the air, and look inside for the solution rather than lighting everyone outside.

The truth is, the bullies are just as likely to kill Alice now as they have ever been. It was a threat, and an important one at that, a threat that Alice should have learned from. Where Alice will go from here remains to be seen. She could continue on the path that she's on and become one of the world's great monsters; or, she could wake up to the fact that she is a member of the human race, no better, no worse, and that she must now use her considerable talents to make the entire world a better place. That was Alice's first dream; the one everyone loved her for.

Midterms: not the end

It's that time of year again: the leaves are turning orange, flip flops are disappearing and UMass professors are once again assuming their class is the only one you take. Midterms and essays are ruling your life.

Chris Eckel

With two tests tomorrow and three papers due next week, not to mention figuring out what to wear to class (you don't want to wear those sweatpants again) on your mind, it's no coincidence that college students have some of the greatest concentration of mental health issues of any age demographic.

A recent study done by a team of researchers at UCLA showed that more than 30 percent of college freshmen stated that they felt overwhelmed a great deal of the time. Homework is a big part of that. Now is when the work really starts pouring in, and the need to beat stress becomes very important.

A recent study done by a team of researchers at UCLA showed that more than 30 percent of college freshman stated that they felt overwhelmed a great deal of the time.

I'm no psychologist, but if college has taught me anything, it's the best ways to blow off steam. The trick is to take your mind off your work, even if only temporarily. The brain needs a little break every now and then. So for those of you who are sitting late at night thinking your only hope is buying a voodoo doll of your professor or praying for a snow day in October ... try these alternatives first.

Take a 3 a.m. trip to Dunkin Donuts. This one's pretty cliché, but most people aren't getting the most out of the trip. Talk to the guy behind the counter; he'll be glad for some company. Then, ditch the fluorescent lights and head over to Wildwood Elementary School. Climb on the swings. You might remember this one from way back: put your feet on the ground and kick off. Repeat. Breathe. Repeat.

Drink your triple cinnamon espresso with whip cream on top. Your brain's nice and mellow, but your heart will be going 300 miles an hour. Everything gets crossed up, and it pretty much resets the body. Now you're ready to go back to work.

Throw on your shoes and hit the streets. It doesn't matter if your name is Michael Johnson or you haven't run around since second grade kickball. Take it at your own pace and work up a good sweat, but don't go overboard. It's not about burning off that DC's chocolate cake; it's all about regaining your focus. When you get back, take a nice hot shower and get a cold drink. You'll be in fine form to sit down and homework-it.

Fire up the Nintendo. Seriously. So what if your last two girlfriends dumped you because of it? It's still a good friend, and it'll never nag you about that essay. For my money, there's nothing more satisfying on a bad night than blowing up aliens or nailing the quarterback with a cornerback blitz. Sadly, none of us will ever get the chance to do either in real life. So choose the next best thing and find a friend to play with you. Just make sure you don't get so caught up in saving the world that you forget the homework.

Accomplish the impossible: do your laundry, clean you room, wash those moldy dishes or empty your trash. That way, you can wear clean jeans to class, eat any donuts you bring home, keep your closet from smelling and put off doing the work for a few extra minutes.

Hit Stop & Shop at a crazy hour of the morning. Take a moment to look around and admire the fact that you've got the store to yourself. It's almost as good as being Britney Spears and being able to shut down the Prada store so you can pick out another wedding dress. Sure, creamy corn isn't as exciting as white silk, but once you realize how much money you've saved with your Stop & Shop card, you'll be pretty pumped up and creamy corn does have some mysterious revitalizing properties.

So, I figure at least one of those ideas should appeal to you. If not, then obviously I'm not cut out for the advice business. But here is one good bit of advice: if you're feeling overburdened around this time of year and caffeine and cleaning isn't cutting it, then look around for a good person to talk to. You've got plenty of options, from your RA to the folks at University Health Services to one of your professors. There's no shortage of compassionate people at this school, and unlike me, they know what they're doing. Good luck with midterms, UMass.

DNC beaten at its own game

With the election just eleven days away, you can bet it's crunch time for the Kerry and Bush campaigns. The most heated campaign of my lifetime will soon come to an end, and America will decide which man will be leading us for the next four years. The war chests are being emptied, and the campaigns have gone into overdrive.

Ben Duffy

As I might have expected, the Democratic National Committee — in a stunning display of its confidence in John Kerry — is prepping itself to cheat. You don't have to take my word for it, trust the documentary evidence.

The DNC has recently distributed its 66-page election day "mobilization plan" to dozens of state committees within the Democratic party. One of these states was Colorado, where this internal document was leaked to the Drudge Report, and later picked up by alarmingly few other news agencies. One section of it reads:

Democrats are entirely too willing to believe that Republicans are guilty of voter intimidation.

> If no signs of intimidation techniques have emerged yet, launch a 'pre-emptive strike' (particularly well suited to states in which these techniques have been tried in the past).
> Issue a press release
> Reviewing Republican tactic [sic] used in the past in your area or state
> Quoting party/minority/civil rights leadership as denouncing tactics that discourage people from voting

Prime minority leadership to discuss the issue in the media: provide talking points.

Place stories in which minority leadership expresses concern about the threat of intimidation techniques

Warn local newspapers not to accept advertising that is not properly disclaimed or that contains false warnings about voting requirements and/or about what will happen at the polls.

It occurred to me that the document might not even be authentic. As much as it conforms to my pre-conceived ideas as to how the DNC actually operates, I didn't believe that the Democrats would be stupid enough to put the policy in writing and distribute it nationwide.

So I checked out what the Democrats had to say on the matter, and found that they didn't even deny the authenticity of the document.

"We make no apologies for fighting these tactics by exposing the dirty tricks when they happen, and helping educate local officials and activists about past Republican tactics so they can prevent them from occurring this year," responds Iano Cabrera, DNC Communications Director.

Sorry Iano, but I can read. It advocates a "pre-emptive strike" in states where "no signs of intimidation have emerged yet." It has absolutely nothing to do with the "exposing dirty tricks when they happen," and everything to do with fabricating dirty tricks when they don't happen. I've always believed that this was the modus operandi of the Democrats but never before have I had such solid evidence.

If an election looks close, the first thing they do is cry foul, even if no basis for such a claim exists. Second, they mobilize their all-too-willing media assets, and "place stories," no matter how irrelevant. Third, they play the almighty race card; they drag out faux "civil rights leaders" and whisper in their ears what they should say to the media. They provide "talking points," and generally exploit white guilt.

The DNC Web site claims that the excerpt quoted above is taken out of context and provides the entire section of the mobilization plan concerning voter intimidation. It was hardly exculpatory evidence. Check it out yourself, at www.democrats.org.

The largest part of it outlines alleged voter intimidation techniques used by Republicans in the past. "Alleged" is the key word here.

The broader document explains what to do in the event of "expected voter intimidation;" keep in mind that the Democrats are already expecting it, whether it happens or not. They prescribe "Emphasizing a message of outrage, but designed to appeal to the broader community: 'We thought this community was better than that,' 'We thought those days were behind us,' 'Nothing is more despicable than trying to deprive any American of the precious right to vote, the foundation of our democracy for which so many have sacrificed.'"

At least they've got their canned catchphrases ready. They advocate "Inpugning the source of divisiveness – the GOP, the opposing candidate, whoever can credibly be said to be behind it." Oh really? "Credibly be said to be behind it" in whose mind? It seems to me that the real "source of divisiveness" here is the DNC.

What was so beautifully demonstrated here is that Democrats are entirely too willing to believe that Republicans are guilty of voter intimidation. They don't even have to wait until election day, they know it's going to happen. They don't have to prove it because it's inevitable. It's almost as if they think that all elections are tainted with voter intimidation, and lack of evidence to that extent only means that the Republicans got away with it.

Therefore, no real evidence is needed before the Democrats leap into action in their own self-righteous crusade.

In a way, I'm guilty of the exact same thing as the DNC. The Democrats believe that they know exactly how the Republicans operate, to the extent that they can assume, without any type of evidence whatsoever, that the Republicans will try to suppress the vote.

I have my own preconceived notions. I believe that I know exactly how the Democrats operate: through scare-tactics, racial victimization and unfounded accusations, all focused through the cooperative liberal media establishment. The difference between the DNC and myself is that I have the evidence to prove it. They made the fatal mistake of making official policy out of what I already believed was their backroom game plan.

Then they got caught. Shame on you, Democrats.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

STATEMENT ON FUNDRAISER

As a representative of the Everywoman's Center, I would first like to appreciate the good intentions of the groups that organized and participated in the fundraiser for the Everywoman's Center. At the Everywoman's Center we long for the day when women can feel free to celebrate their bodies and their sexuality without fear of violence or humiliation. We support the right of women to choose how they express their sexuality whether privately, with a partner or in public (as long as that expression does not harm others).

Unfortunately, we also recognize that we live in a culture that exploits and degrades women's sexuality and promotes violence against women. We understand the strong feelings and opinions on campus and we at EWC are not always able to successfully represent the diversity of ideas and values inherent in the "women's community."

However, the lingerie fundraiser and subsequent letters to the editor have prompted an internal discussion within EWC about developing and articulating clear standards for fundraising events; standards that we as EWC staff feel can clearly represent our mission statement. Once these standards are developed we will be happy to share them with the community.

TEACHERS HAVE FREEDOM OF SPEECH TOO

In his editorial, "Bombarded by Liberal Bias," Michael Busack implies that we should all stay in our boxes, even if they are big boxes. "The cashier at Wal-mart doesn't give me advice on school. I don't expect my mechanic to tell me the best way to get a date." And he doesn't want his professors to venture outside their discipline.

Aside from the other good advice Mr. Busack may be missing from his mechanic, democracy invites the cashier, the mechanic, and the teacher to give advice on crucial matters by voting.

I have no idea whether Professor Simurda has tenure, but the tenure system was developed to guarantee professors the freedom to express ideas without having to fear those who would have them "monitored," as Mr. Busack suggests, for political sterility. Colleges promote the free exchange of ideas because it works.

Mr. Busack is ratting out Professor Simurda for having stated that the Bush administration had long premeditated the attack on Iraq. According to President Bush's original Secretary of the Treasury, Paul O'Neill, this is true. Many members of the current administration, including Donald Rumsfeld, Paul Wolfowitz, and Richard Armitage, signed letter to President Clinton in 1998, which can be viewed at www.newamerican century.org/iraqclintonletter.htm, stating: "The only acceptable strategy is one that eliminates the possibility that Iraq will be able to use or threaten to use weapons of mass destruction. In the near term, this means a willingness to undertake military action as diplomacy is clearly failing. In the long term, it means removing Saddam Hussein and his regime from power."

What Mr. Simurda said, then, was hardly even controversial, much less worthy of censure or censorship.

I am disappointed that an editor of the Collegian would think that the only person from whom we should accept unsolicited opinions should be, by his logic, the writer of an editorial. What a boring world that would be.

ELECTION IS A CHANCE FOR CHANGE

On Nov. 2, the people of Amherst and Granby have a chance for change, and UMass has a chance to get some real help.

The current State Representative is one of only 39 out of 160 Representatives to actually vote to increase the income tax. She is one of a handful of representatives to vote against the Safe Haven bill that allowed distressed teenage mothers to safely give their unwanted children up at fire houses and hospitals. This overwhelmingly bipartisan bill will reduce the incidence of infanticide and abortion, while protecting emotionally disturbed women.

The current State Representative is one of a handful that voted against strengthening sex offender laws. The overwhelmingly bipartisan bill she was against closed the loophole of repeat sex-offenders who were arrested for other crimes.

She is proud that she is a liberal, but there is a difference between being a proud liberal and a dangerous extremist. Since she has been in office, the budget for UMass-Amherst, the district's single largest employer, has been repeatedly slashed. She has been unable to stop the bleeding because she is so far out of the mainstream that she has no relationship with the governor or the former Speaker of the House.

Wouldn't it be better to have a moderate Representative who supports UMass and is able to work cooperatively with both the governor and the new Speaker of the House? Wouldn't be better for Amherst and Granby to elect an independent minded moderate? If you think things aren't working now, maybe it is time for a change. I encourage you to turnout and vote for Jeanne Taester, a moderate, for State Representative on Nov 2.

Rock out

Northampton showcases rock and roll's greatest

By Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

The Academy of Music Theatre in Northampton is once again off and running. Yes, they are back in business and what better way to celebrate than with a five-day long Rock N' Roll extravaganza.

The Academy of Music Theatre has a history that traces back to 1890 when Edward H.R. Lyman built it for a total cost of over $125,000 including monies spent on the decoration of the interior. Ever since, the theatre has been a staple in the Northampton arts. In 1892, Mr. Lyman deeded the theatre to the city of Northampton, and so began America's first municipaly owned theatre. It is also one of America's six oldest theatres.

Starting tonight, Friday Oct. 22, the Academy of Music Theatre is bringing a series that will hopefully bring a young crowd to the scene. "Rocktober: A Rock and Roll Movie Extravaganza," will begin tonight and continue throughout the next five nights. It will play ten of what are considered to be some of the greatest Rock and Roll movies of all time. Here is a run down of what is in store.

Don't Look Back

This film depicts a young Bob Dylan in the spring of 1965. At the age of 23, Dylan is at the height of his first explosion into popular music. Director D.A. Pennebaker follows Dylan around to concerts, hotel rooms, and even conversations with many notables.

The cameos in this film are appealing in themselves. Not only do you get an oppurtunity to see a young Bob Dylan, but we also see the famed folk Joan Baez and creepy singer-songwriter, Donovan.

This film shows Dylan as young, inscrutable, and at his peak.

The Monterey International Pop Festival

This 1968 music festival is what paved the way for Woodstock and the careers of many influential artists. Just take a look at some of the performers: Mamas and the Papas, The Jimi Hendrix Experience, Janis Joplin, Jefferson Airplane, The Birds, The Who, Otis Redding, Ravi Shankar, Simon and Garfunkel, Buffalo Springfield, The Greatful Dead and many others.

It's like mixfest, but good.

This is Spinal Tap

From the world of genius mock-umentarian Christopher Guest comes his original classic, "This is Spinal Tap." You might have to be a little sheltered to have never heard of this gem, and if so, check it out.

The film focuses on a mock 1982 British heavy metal band named Spinal Tap. They are filmed by Marti DeBergi in an attempt to make a comeback in America. The film includes performances, now legendary lyrics, and comical interviews and conversations that lead to the spirling end of America's most famous band that never really existed.

Rock N' Roll High School

This classic was originally titled "Disco High" until the directors were able to land a guest spot by pioneers of punk, the Ramones.

The film takes place in the fictional Vince Lombardi High School. The school has a problem with holding on to their principal position; all of the previous principals ended up having nervous breakdowns because the students have a complete disregard for the authority. To quote Kiss (never thought I'd use that one), the students "wanna rock and roll all night, and party every day."

One student, Riff Randell, is a massive fan of the Ramones. When the new principal, Miss Togar comes to bring an end to the rockin' students, the kids revolt with the help of the Ramones, and take over the high school.

With the recent demise of Johnny Ramone, this movie is not only incredibly entertaining, but also timely. Go see it. Seriously, do it. I dare you to.

Stop Making Sense

This is the 1984 film that chronicles a concert of those crazy Talking Heads. It includes costume changes, dancing and running, and plain old freaking out, but yet it seems to all be timed right. Everything goes pretty smoothly.

The brilliance of this movie shines through in David Byrne. Ultimately, the combination of Byrne's performance skills and Jonathan Demme's direction is quite astounding.

Purple Rain

"Dig if u will a picture / Of u and I engaged in a kiss / The sweat of your body covers me / Can u my darling / Can u imagine this ?"

What other five foot tall man would have ever had the balls to not only write these lyrics, but also insist that that "you" be spelled "u" instead.

Prince is a legend, and this is his legacy. This movie is rare in so many ways that it would be difficult to list them in a brief. It is a must see.

Wattstax

Wattstax is the Woodstock you probably have never seen.

In 1972, 100,000 fans stuffed into the LA Coliseum for a night of musical ecstacy. This concert includes the likes of Isaac Hayes, Rufus Thomas, and the Staple Singers.

A young Richard Pryor hosts this film and helps to bring it to life. This is probably a movie that you have not seen, and that is a shame but you can change that.

Tommy

This classic of the rock-opera genre has earned its way to this distinction as one of the top ten Rock and Roll films of all time.

The film is about Tommy, a boy who through psychological trauma becomes deaf, dumb, and blind. Oddly enough, as a child, Tommy witnessed the murder of his dad by his stepfather. When his mom and stepdad told him to forget everything he saw and heard, he takes this lar too literally.

Of course, Tommy finds solace in none other than, the game of Pinball. Okay, so I guess that wouldn't be the first place you would expect him to look, but nevertheless, musical elation pursues and Tommy becomes the center of a religious cult.

The soundtrack to Tommy is awesome and with the Academy's new sound system, it should sound great. Also, there are cameos in this movie from everyone of note from the time. Elton John, Eric Clapton, Tina Turner, Keith Moon, and even Jack Nicholson appear in this classic.

The Filth and the Fury

"The Filth and the Fury" is a complete documentary of one of the most mentioned punk bands in history. The Sex Pistols rose from the streets of London in the 1970's to become one of the most notorious bands in history.

This film is Julien Temple's directorial debut, and a good debut it is. It chronicles the story of the Pistols through their rise, and eventual fall with the tragic accusations of murder, and death of lead singer and frontman Johnny Rotten.

Rude Boy

"Rude Boy" is the final film in this immense series. It is part documentary and part character study that features one of the most influential rock bands in Britain's history The Clash. It oddly mixes a fictional fan amidst actual events that occurred in The Clash's history.

This film is especially interesting when considering that it is a rockumentary that takes place over a few years time. Though, thankfully, the footage is heightened by the scale of events the time period allows for. This is truly a rare classic.

Wrapup

So that is it folks, some of rock's greatest moments. A limitless pass to all of the shows is only $50 (yes, I know, it's a steal.) If you would like to just see one night (two shows), the cost is only $10, and if you just want to see one show it is only $7.

Eve learns from a close friend

Original Sin
Eve

I would never have thought I would lose sleep over a girl. Not just any girl though: my best friend. And I will openly admit, I am heartbroken by her behavior. Let me explain.

When it comes to my relationships with my girlfriends, I am very serious, probably so seriously that it may justify my reasoning for not wanting a relationship with a guy, and if this is what I must sacrifice for a stable friendship, it is well worth it.

All of my girlfriends have similar characteristics; they are independent, experienced, strong, loyal, and beautiful. Each one, however, is so unique, that separately they fulfill specific emotional voids in my life, and visa-versa. This mutual attitude inevitably creates a deeply bound trust that should never be broken, and it never has … until today.

I did not meet her by coincidence. We live in an international dorm, and we latched onto each other because we were alike, but not really. She is the opposite of me in character, and defied my stereotypical type of friend. I remember how innocent she used to be, how she looked to me for life's most important answers, how dependent and loyal she was as a friend. My other girlfriends intimidated her but, they accepted her because she was good to me, and I trusted her.

Over time, we grew extremely close. I allowed her a place deep within my heart. We dealt with daily hardships together, we celebrated weekly victories together, and we learned a great deal from each other. She soon became my second half, maybe my better half.

A few years later, she landed an internship at one of the most prominent workplaces in New York City. This would be the opportunity of her lifetime. And I couldn't have been happier for her. This was her chance to blossom into the independent, strong, and experienced city girl that she had always wished to be. I had no choice but to eagerly wait out the transformation.

When the time had come, one full semester later, I wished I had never waited. The city failed as a positive influence. It literally erased the very essence of her beauty. She returned cold, unmoved, and selfish, and I cried for her. She forgot everything and everyone. She forgot about me, and us, and who she use to be. How can six months change someone so dramatically?

I see her eyes, and I notice a blank, emotionless stare. It is a look of loss, a look of sadness. I know she knows I see this. Is that why she is avoiding me? Does she fear this change? I have made numerous attempts to save whatever may be left in our friendship, but she pulls away. It is as if we are strangers living in the same dorm. And I feel as if I am missing a piece of my happiness. It is rare that I find room in my heart for a new friend, but I managed to for her. Now I am beginning to think that was a huge mistake.

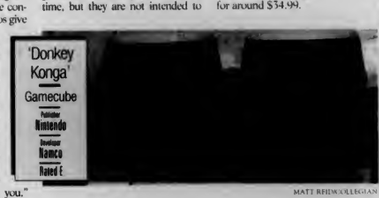
I choose my friends wisely, so as not to deal with unnecessary disappointment and unrealistic expectations, and this instance is a reminder of why I have friends with similar baseline characteristics. My true girlfriends maintain this bond independent of change, and maybe it is safer to just remain satisfied with what I have, as opposed to what I have lost. But as I think about all of the wonderful friends I do have, I realize I haven't lost much: she has.

Bongos enhance video gaming

Press Start to Play
Reid Davenport

Nintendo has attempted to do something that many other games have failed at before: to create a music-based video game. Past games such as "PaRappa the Rapper" and the popular "Dance, Dance Revolution" tried creating hits out of music-based games, but only "DDR" has managed success. Past systems have tried things like maracas and guitars instead of controllers, but the controls ended up being too weird to be widely popular.

"Donkey Konga" proves that Nintendo can create success even where others failed. The game comes along with the "DK Bongos," a set of bongos that act as the controller for the game. The bongos give players the hands-on experience, while the game provides some random but memorable songs to create beats for.



The game play itself is easy to learn, as the games are self-explanatory. You can play to different levels of complexity to earn more coins to buy mini-games. Some of the random songs include "The Impression that I Get," "All the Small Things," "Louie Louie," and "We will Rock you." Nintendo also provides classic Zelda and Mario themes with a few twists to the songs. Playing along with the song consists of hitting the bongos or clapping with the specific symbols.

While you will find some of the songs a bit childish or weird for bongo playing, such as the "Pokemon" TV theme, its fun to play with friends and it gets you more hands-on interactivity with a video game. The downside is that you should not expect to become an expert bongo player by playing the game over and over. The "DK Bongos" are not meant to be played in the way a real bongo set would be played. But if you already play the bongos, then the game might be a little easier for you.

The mini-games, while fun at first, are not the key part of this game. They are simply there to provide an actual game to play, but you also have to earn enough coins to purchase them. They are basic games that can help your reaction time, but they are not intended to entertain you for hours.

One of the better purchase options you get is to buy sounds for your bongos. You can have some of the most random sounds play as you bang your bongos to the songs. Sounds like dogs barking, in-game sounds from "Legend of Zelda," or even sounds taken out of old NES games are available as a drum noise set.

"Donkey Konga" is a great game to pick up if you want something to entertain you every now and then. It's one of those games you can play forever at first, but then you need a little break before you pick it up again. Overall this is a decent game to get for you Gamecube owners if you need something completely new to play. It's great for all ages and is a step up for hands-on video games. "Donkey Konga" is available now for Gamecube for around $49.99. It does include one set of DK Bongos and additional bongos are available for around $34.99.

Six brand new fall releases: What to buy, and what not to

Marilyn Manson
Lest We Forget: The Best Of
Interscope

Marilyn Manson's, satanic dark lord shock-rock persona is now so quaint and expected that it's hard to fathom that he was once capable of scaring an unsuspecting Middle America. Manson is now one of the late '90s pre-eminent pop culture-time capsule oddities, and the fact that he continues to mine this, boo-scary Halloween horror show tradition despite steeply declining records sales is kind of cute, in a sad kind of way. Manson is also a smart guy, so one wonders why he sticks to such a moldy old template. A typical Manson song is often the sound of typically sludgy nü-metal gossiped up with a drony Goth sheen. The lone new song is a revamp of Depeche Mode's "Personal Jesus," which joins two other covers (a funereal "Tainted Love" and the admittedly strong, creepy "Sweet Dreams (Are Made of This)") "The Fight Song" is cathartic, but the rest of the album is the same turgid stew of monotonous industrial beats and swampy hard rock.

Don't Look Down
The Fear In Love
Nitro

The new album from the guys in Story of the Year is pretty cynical and downcast. It's called "The Fear In Love" and has song titles like "Right Where It Hurts," "Stages of Dying," "Down and Out" and "Visiting hours Are Over." The lyrics address disillusionment, destruction, death and … wait, you're telling me this isn't SOTY? Is it a new Boy Sets Fire album? No, it's Don't Look Down? Who's Don't Look Down? Oh, they're one of the many new melodic post-hardcore bands that have sprung up in the wake of success of bands like Thrice and Thursday. It's solid, muscular emotional rock, but nothing you haven't heard before if you've already picked up the last Boy Sets Fire album.

mewithoutYou
Catch For Us The Foxes
Tooth & Nail

There's some great music to be found on mewithoutyou's "Catch For Us the Foxes." Too bad it's continuously ruined by they're lead singer. See, he doesn't sing exactly; what he does is talk really, really passionately over the music. Since the quintet apparently has a killer live show, this could possibly work in person. But it doesn't translate to CD. The music is fervent, electric, artful post-emo; the vocals are spoken word irritations. It's like they're actually trying to be an accessible version of the Liars. And no one really needs that.

The Music
Welcome to the North
Capitol

The Music may have the most apropos name of any band in history. Both the name and the, ahem, music have the same kind of pompous grandiosity that grates on the nerves. "Welcome to the North" is the follow-up to the Brit rocker's eponymous debut, and it's a slightly less irritating collection of overstuffed songs. Here you can actually make it through one of them without wincing. In fact, there are even a decent slew of good ones, like the funked-up old-school rock of "Freedom Fighter" and the latter parts of the title song, which sounds like something Sting should be clamoring for. Alas Rob Harvey's falsetto-friendly vocals often hit such a piercing high note that it gets kind of scary.

Nonpoint
Recoil
Lava

There's something poignant and charming in watching the last of the standing nu-metal bands play on as if the genre hasn't become a universally derided "art form." Nonpoint, whose sole claim to fame is that they are Latino, is one of those bands. They play angry, post-grunge hard rock like it was still 1999 and Fred Durst was still "cool." There's nothing horribly awful about "Recoil" except that it sounds incredibly dated, generic and unnecessary. It's hoodie-wearing mook-rock that should have expired years ago. The Latin rhythms that open "Rabia" are fairly interesting, and the album works to if you want to release some pent-up aggression, but really, this is like eating week old bread.

A Wilhelm Scream
Mute Print
Nitro

Punk rock music isn't a genre known for its malleability. It's built on a foundation of three-chords, snarls, and a rage at the system that manifests itself in an aggressively corrosive style of rock'n'roll that is less about musical virtuosity than spitfire emotion. A Wilhelm Scream are the latest to enter the punk sweepstakes and they continue the tradition of ever faster-louder dynamics. This isn't necessarily a bad thing. They sound an awful lot like recent major-label signers Rise Against, but they still make compelling hardcore punk noise. There's nothing much new here that hasn't been done before, but the Screamers do it well.

Final tune-up for UM

Martha Powers
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, the University of Massachusetts men's cross-country team will travel to Connecticut to compete in the Blue Devil Mini Meet. The race, hosted by Central Connecticut State, includes nine schools such as Rhode Island, Hartford, Fairfield, and Holy Cross. Last year, Massachusetts finished third out of eight teams.

The length of the course will be three miles, as opposed to the five miles the Minutemen usually race. This is because the meet comes just one week prior to the highly anticipated and competitive Atlantic 10 Championship.

"My goal, in planning the season, was to use this meet to rest anyone who had handled the past competitions pretty successfully," said coach Ken O'Brien. "But, on this team we still have some people, after talking to them after the past few races, who feel they've run well but also know they've made mistakes. From my observations and their feedback, most are not pushing the envelope; they have been holding back trying to assess the situation."

The team will be running without their consistent top runner, Ryan Corbett, who will be sitting out to focus on next week-end's race.

"Our order has been fairly established in one respect," O'Brien said. The team's top runners have changed slightly every race but the "spacing between those runners has been really close."

"I'm not expecting any gigantic change in the order, but it wouldn't surprise me if there was a lot of shuffling," O'Brien said. "My hope is that they all reevaluate their race plan, and five or six of our runners become our 'second runner,' meaning they are at the level of the second runners of the other teams."

And O'Brien knows his team well.

"I watch them during the race, I watch them after the race and I talk with them. Sometimes they need some distance from the race, and I'll talk with them later; on the bus ride home or in the locker room the next day. They will communicate to me how they felt during the race, and from that you can draw the conclusion of whether they were reckless, conservative or if they went out too fast," O'Brien explained.

"A lot of issues are due to a lack of confidence which is a result of a lack of experience. Our younger runners haven't had to evaluate the five-mile run before," O'Brien said.

It isn't just the younger runners who are in a new situation.

"Some of our older runners who have been on the team haven't been in the position of a top runner before. In the past, they have had the role of supporting runner, so even though they are returning runners, they have a new role," O'Brien said.

Two weeks ago, O'Brien began double practices a few times a week. "I felt that the mental approach and focus of the team was sliding. We hadn't had enough time with the academic and practice schedules to focus on an area which is really important to our success, and that is an organized flexibility training program," O'Brien said.

"Before, we had left it up to the individual. Now we are making it formal as opposed it informal. In addition to daily practice, the newly added morning runs consist of easy jogging and 45 minutes of the flexibility program," O'Brien said.

The race will be held at Stanley Quarter Park in New Britain, and the starting time is noon.

"We want to use this meet to work out any reservations the team may have and to polish ourselves up physically and, even more importantly, to polish ourselves up mentally," O'Brien said.

Minutemen look to keep on rolling in Atlantic 10 play

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

A year ago, it looked as though the Massachusetts men's soccer team had postseason birth in the bag. Then, after a series of conference losses beyond their control, the Minutemen (6-6-2, 3-2-1 A-10) were sent home early with a 3-0 loss to Rhode Island in the last game of the season.

Now, with only four conference games left, UMass is in a very similar situation, thus adding weight to this weekend's match ups at Fordham (3-8-2, 1-3-2 A-10) and LaSalle (7-5-1, 3-3-0 A-10).

The Minutemen will travel to the Bronx today to face-off against Fordham at 1 p.m. and will head south to Philadelphia to play LaSalle on Sunday, also at 1 p.m.

UMass is currently in third in the Atlantic 10 and is looking to not only attain a high seed in the conference tournament but also keep their post-season hopes alive. There is currently a differential of two points between the third-place Minutemen and the sixth and final spot, which happens to belong to LaSalle.

The Maroon and White are the archetype for showing how fast a team's position can change in the A-10. Before last weekend's 3-2 and 4-3 overtime victories over Dayton and Xavier, respectively, the Minutemen were seated sixth in the A-10.

It appears that UMass has a bit of momentum going into this weekend after two pulse-pounding victories last weekend. However, the road has not been favorable to the Minutemen, as they have gone 1-3-2 this season.

This will certainly come into play when the Maroon and White face LaSalle in the confines of McCarthy Stadium. McCarthy is the biggest venue in the A-10 with the capability of holding 7,500, and the Minutemen will be the last team the Explorers play at home during the 2004 campaign.

Fordham has had a difficult season so far and are currently on a three-game losing streak. The Rams are currently tied for 10th in the A-10 after dropping matches to Temple, St. Joseph's and Duquesne.

Pacing Fordham's offense has been the play of Shaun Moamem, who has a team-leading four goals on the season. Moamem is also tied for first in assists with two.

Also contributing has been the sharp shooting of Luke Nephew, who has two goals and two assists this season. Nephew has been particularly accurate for the Rams as he has only needed four shots to score his two goals.

LaSalle has also had troubles putting numbers in the win column as it followed the same route as Fordham and lost to Temple and St. Joseph's, respectively, last weekend. The Explorer offense has been on halt as of recent, only scoring four goals over the last four games.

Most of LaSalle's success has come from their stymieing defense, which has only allowed 1.24 goals per game over the course of the season.

Leading the way for the defensive unit has been keeper Stash Graham, who has recorded three shutouts this season, which ties him for second most in the conference. He is also in second for saves per game, stopping an average of 6.17.

True fans are in paradise as Red Sox take the pennant back home to Boston playoff win that are rah-rah Red Sox because most of those people couldn't name an American League East team outside of the Sox and Yanks.

It has been a frustrating time for the grass roots fans who have been following this team since Wade Boggs and Roger Clemens were still heroes in Boston. It's frustrating because these "fans" are trying to grab a share of whatever the Sox may end up winning this year.

You are all gold diggers. There is no such thing as a Red Sox bandwagon so whatever it is that you are trying to jump on, find something else. You are born into Red Sox Nation. There is a lot more to it than just clinging onto a team that wins (the last two years are as close to saying the Sox are a team that wins than anything else we have ever seen). Those of you who are guilty of this are the same type of people who fell in love with Derek Jeter and the Yankees in 1996.

This team isn't for you.

This team is for everyone who suffered through Buckner, Bucky, the Big Red Machine or the Cardinals in 1946 and 1967. This is for the younger generation of fans who cried with their friends while watching Aaron F. Boone ruin one of the best pitching performances of Tim Wakefield's career.

This is for the Sox fans who made Yankee Stadium our personal playground until the cops kicked us out sometime early Thursday morning. This is for the old man we hugged who was crying tears of joy by himself as the Sox celebrated on the field.

This is for me because revenge is oh so sweet. I watched Jeter and Co. celebrate on my field, in my park, at my place of worship after their Game 5 win in 1999. And I just did the same to them.

This is for my father, who made me the negative, glass-is-much-more-than-half-empty Boston sports fan I am today.

This is for you, the true Sox fan you are, for sticking with a team that had been constantly bullied around by all things in pinstripes, the cruel national media and Babe F. Ruth and his unrelenting ghost.

This is for every Yankees fan who continues to tell us that we haven't won anything yet; because we certainly have.

We knocked off the most hated, overpaid group of sellouts who have no worthy excuse of why they haven't won a championship since 2000. We knocked off an organization that takes relief, not pleasure, in winning.

Have some pride, Red Sox Nation.

We just beat the New York Yankees.

Breaking the Hockey East ice

Minutemen take on Lowell tonight at the Mullins Center

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

If the Massachusetts hockey team wants a reminder of where it was a year ago, at the beginning of its almost-Cinderella season that brought it to within one deflected slap shot of the Hockey East title, it needs look no further than the other side of the Mullins Center ice surface tonight, when it takes on the UMass Lowell River Hawks.

While the two programs belong to "sister schools," they've often been very different in terms of their status within the Hockey East conference. Although Lowell has never really challenged for the top spot, the River Hawks are a charter member of Hockey East, and their only finals appearance was in 1994, one year before the newly revived UMass program entered the conference.

Right now, however, there is reason to see tonight's matchup as a look back in time for the Minutemen. The No. 15 River Hawks, who enter the game with a 1-1 record, and are coming off a 3-2 loss to Boston College on Tuesday, are pretty reminiscent of the Minutemen around this time last year — lots of young talent, some key returnees, and a veritable lock for the "dark horse" candidacy in Hockey East this year.

Lowell returns its explosive all-junior line of Elias Godoy, Andrew Martin and Ben Walter. Those three comprise a top line that spent all of last year together, combining for 108 points. With another year of experience, it could be the best line in Hockey East.

In goal, Lowell also returns Chris Davidson, the surprise standout who finished 2003-04 with a 2.87 goals against average and a .896 save percentage.

"ULowell is a very experienced team," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "It's a team that has everyone returning from last year's squad. They're physically strong, good playmakers and good special teams. Their confidence is high. They're going to give us all we can handle, and that will be a serious test for us."

The last time the River Hawks came to town, the Minutemen swept them out of the Hockey East quarterfinals, winning the first-ever playoff series at the Mullins Center 6-3 and 3-1. While the River Hawks return 22 players and have gotten stronger through stability, quite a few things have changed within the Minuteman program, notably the departure of high-scoring defenseman Thomas Pöck and top defensive blue liner Nick Kuiper (graduation), as well as star forward Greg Mauldin, who opted to begin his professional career.

"I just think we're a work in progress," Cahoon said. "It's a real transition with this team to get to know oneself and how to play to succeed, and we're going through those struggles. There have been some positives, and there have been some negatives. We're trying to tweak it so we can limit the negatives."

Among the positives, a genuine two-headed goaltender rotation has developed, with senior Tim Warner splitting time with junior Gabe Winer. Winer held the job for almost the entire 2003-04 season, but Warner's impressive work in the playoffs to spell the injured Winer has given Cahoon another option. Winer is slated to get the start tonight, with Warner taking on Connecticut on Sunday.

On the other side of the ledger, the Minutemen have struggled to produce the kind of high-scoring game they had in the season opener against Clarkson. UMass scored two goals in two games at last weekend's Nye Frontier Classic in Anchorage, Alaska, and both came in the third-place-game victory over Canisius.

Against Clarkson, the top line of Matt Anderson, Stephen Werner and Kevin Jarman accounted for four of the six Minuteman goals and nine of the total points. Since then, however, the first line hasn't produced a single point — defenseman Mark Matheson and freshman P.J. Fenton scored the goals Saturday night against Canisius.

In one of the classic vagaries of the Hockey East schedule, the Minutemen start their conference slate early in the season but follow up with a non-conference game against UConn on Sunday at 3 p.m.

The Huskies come to Amherst with a 0-2-1 record after dropping a 4-1 decision to Rensselaer on Saturday, tying the Engineers a week earlier on Oct. 10 and falling 4-1 to Nebraska-Omaha on Oct. 9.

MATTHEW BRIDWELL/COLLEGIAN

John Toffey and the Minutemen have returned from Alaska to open up their Hockey East portion of the schedule against Lowell tonight. The Maroon and White will also host Connecticut on Sunday.

Red Sox Nation rejoices

Jeff Howe

New York – Yeah, we did it.

That is "we" as in the Red Sox and myself, who both successfully brought the American League pennant back to Massachusetts.

I was in Yankee Stadium on Wednesday night to witness the greatest moment in this franchise's history. Forget the debut of Fenway Park, or any of the five World Series, or the greatest game, played in 1975, which was capped off by Carlton Fisk's walk-off homerun.

We beat the Yankees; and I lived to write about it.

Three friends and I paid an outrageous amount of money (although, every cent was more than well spent) and took the trip down to the house that Ortiz built early Wednesday afternoon.

We survived some of the most humbling verbal abuse from the scariest looking creatures that ever crawled out of the Yankee Stadium woodwork. We survived thrown objects, death threats and cops who were more concerned with making us feel hated than protecting our personal safety.

But, more importantly, the Red Sox survived one of the most draining weeklong series possible against the best team money can buy. The Sox fought back with the same passion that drives everyone in Red Sox Nation to keep coming back for more year after year.

Their love for the game matched our unbridled love for them, and our reward is the chance to catch this team in the World Series for the first time in 18 years. For most of us at UMass, it will be the first time in our lives that we will see this team play for a championship, and being three years old doesn't count as seeing the Sox play in the World Series in 1986.

Only for some of us, though, does this next week truly mean anything.

If you are a true Sox fan, you are probably sick of the commercialization of Red Sox Nation. I certainly am.

I am sick of people asking me if I am excited for a playoff game two hours before it is about to begin mainly because I am excited for a game against the Royals in May.

I am sick of looking at people's away messages after a Sox

UMass must step it up down stretch

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

It's do or die time.

For the Massachusetts women's soccer team, this weekend comes down to either buckling down or getting buckled as they set out for the final two home games of the 2004 season with one goal in mind: win three of their remaining four games.

Should they accomplish this feat, the chances of the Minutewomen (5-8-0, 3-4-0 Atlantic 10) making postseason play would be high. And considering where the A-10 Tournament is held this year, at UMass' own Rudd Field, it would be nice for the home team to not have to watch other teams duke it out on their grass while they sit and watch.

"The playoffs start this weekend," coach Jim Rudy said. "Every game is going to be critical for us. Every game."

Needless to say, it's crunch time for these women.

The road to the A-10 tournament may have come home, but it's still going to go through the very large bodies of the Fordham Rams (8-3-2, 3-3-1 A-10).

And they are large, literally, with a roster sporting not only a load of upperclassmen but also an average height of five feet eight inches.

Led by seniors Beth Purcell (midfield/forward), Corey Dunfrey (defense) and Lena Daragjiati (midfield), the Rams like to use their size to their advantage and push their bodies around on the opposition.

The result is usually a physical game, a style of gameplay that the Minutewomen haven't played very well against.

Take the Oct. 1 contest against St. Joseph's at home. A very physical battle, there were a lot of penalties called, and several key UMass players succumbed to injuries on the field that ultimately were not serious.

But they looked hurt, and in the end, could not muster a goal, falling 1-0 to the Hawks.

"They bring a certain confidence that everyone's been talking about," Rudy said of the Rams. "They've got a certain arrogance. They're cocky, they're big and strong and, after last year, they're feeling somewhat invincible."

Déja vu, anyone?

The last two teams to face off against UMass with a certain cockiness and an arrogant swagger, (Central Connecticut State and George Washington) were abruptly handed huge upsets by the Minutewomen.

Speed might determine the outcome of this one, and the Minutewomen bring a lot of it to the table in the form of freshman sensation Britt Canfield.

The two-time A-10 Rookie of the Week leads all freshman in the A-10 with a team-high eight goals for 16 points on the season. Most of it, surprisingly enough, has come from the bench, a spot she feels she performs better off of.

"She's sort of the go-to-girl," Rudy said.

Coupled with the awe-inspiring skills of senior captain Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather (three goals and three assists for nine points), the Minutewomen are beginning to create a very formidable one-two punch late in the A-10 season.

But the Rams have a knockout combo of their own in Purcell (six goals and four assists for 16 points) and sophomore Leah Jerome (four and two for 10).

While Jerome is three or four inches shorter than the rest of the team (she's 5'5"), she makes up for it with her big play.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen will see some more big play from a more diverse offensive attack as the LaSalle Explorers (7-6-2, 3-4-0 A-10) will be firing on all cylinders on UMass's final home game of the 2004 regular season.

Having lost forward Krista Lee to graduation last year, the Explorers no longer rely on one or two players to get the job done.

Rather, it's been a score of players contributing, with 15 of the 22 members of the roster registering at least one point.

"They knock it around, they play with skill, they've got some good young freshmen and they're sharing the scoring load," Rudy said. "They also outplayed Richmond at Richmond. That's a scary thought."

Like the Maroon and White, the Explorers are led in scoring by some youth, and have some juniors coming around. Sophomore Heather Barclay has racked up five goals and six assists on the season for 16 points while junior Alexis Petrucci has six goals and three assists for 15 points.

The Explorers think they have a match for Canfield as well, with a freshman sensation of their own. Five foot eight inch midfielder Kristin Hextall is only a freshman but has been playing big all season long—literally and figuratively—most recently netting two goals in a 3-0 win over the Temple Owls last Friday.

Hundreds of students volunteer for the 16th annual 'Shelter Sunday Drive'

By Adrienne Bossi
Collegian Correspondent

This past Sunday, 366 registered volunteers hit the streets of Amherst, Hadley, and Pelham for the sixteenth annual Shelter Sunday drive sponsored by the Amherst Friends for the Homeless, Inc. The drive is a door-to-door campaign established to collect funds for the area's hungry and homeless.

"Potentially, this door-to-door campaign can raise over $20,000 in three hours," said Penny Kim, a board member of Amherst Friends for the Homeless, Inc.

Five local humanitarian organizations will benefit from this drive. Among them are, the Amherst Survival Center, Not Bread Alone, The Grove Street Inn of Northampton, First Call for Help, and The Hampshire County Interfaith Shelter also in Northampton.

Budget cuts and an increasingly declining economy over the past few years have dramatically affected these organizations. Cutbacks in human services funding on both the state and national levels have put organizations like these in greater demand while their resources continue to dwindle.

The volunteers are organized into groups of five and given instruction packets, with maps highlighting their assigned routes. Some routes are within walking distance to the common while others require transportation. When residents are not home to answer the volunteers' knocks, donation envelopes are left in their doorways.

"Last year, envelope donations accounted for $7,000 of the $26,000 collected in total," said Kim.

The Shelter Sunday volunteers are mostly students from the University of Massachusetts.

"Most of these student volunteers are from fraternities and sororities and also from the Boltwood Project," said Aaron Bousel president of the Amherst Friends of the Homeless, Inc.

"We can't thank UMass enough. The whole basis of our door-to-door canvassers are almost entirely UMass students," said Kim. "We could not do this without the very broad shoulders of these students."

Many of the local residents answering their doors today seemed to be prepared for the canvassers with checks already made out. Others were interested to learn about Shelter Sunday and eager to donate the contents of their wallets. At one front door that amassed to $1.56.

"Every little bit helps, though," said Robyn Avellino volunteering with some of her sisters from Iota Gamma Upsilon.

"I think it was a great way to raise money for the community," said Lea Sheehan who also volunteered from IGU. "I would definitely do it again."

"This is a great time to be doing this," said another volunteer, "the weather is changing and we are entering the season of Thanksgiving."

Since federal guidelines about poverty and homeless change each year, it is difficult to find accurate statistics.

However, "to give you an idea of the demand in this area," said Arnie Alper another board member for the Amherst Friends of the Homeless, Inc., "the Hampshire County Interfaith is only open for the six coldest months of year and last year they provided 210 people with a place to stay overnight and provided over 7000 meals."

"The Grove Street Inn," continued Alper, "allows people to stay there for no longer than three months at a time. They provided services to 250 people through the course of last year. People go there while they are trying to get their life back together."

The Amherst Survival Center and Not Bread Alone provide the homeless and poor with meals throughout the week. The Survival Center provides meals and services on weekdays while Not Bread Alone provides meals on weekends at the First Congregational Church in Amherst.

The Survival Center also provides the homeless with food, clothing, tents, and blankets.

Law professor set to give final lecture in distinguished series

By Hillary Teed
Collegian Correspondent

Tuesday night the history department is presenting the third and final speaker in its Feinberg Family Distinguished Lecture Series, a semester-long celebration honoring the fiftieth anniversary of Roe vs. Wade.

Columbia law professor and Nation columnist Patricia J. Williams will speak about race in America since Brown, the Supreme Court's landmark 1954 decision to integrate public schools.

"People coming to the talk are guaranteed to get a fresh view of America," said Carl Nightingale, associate professor of history at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and coordinator of the series.

"In her academic work and in her column, Williams makes a specialty out of debunking the myth that racial inequality has disappeared or that blacks and other people of color have somehow taken the upper hand and are getting all sorts of privileges not accorded to whites."

Williams, a well-known lawyer, author, law professor, and interdisciplinary legal scholar will speak on Oct. 26 at 7:30 p.m. in Mahar Auditorium. Her most recent accomplishments include being named one of 25 recipients of the 2004 "MacArthur Fellowship," a genius award given to outstanding intellectuals.

"Professor Williams is one of the leading voices writing about race in America today. Not only is she a distinguished scholar who has written some of the most important and widely read books on race and the law in contemporary America, she has also reached a wider audience through her column in The Nation," said Nightingale.

Williams is also the author of three books. In her acclaimed 1991 biography, The Alchemy of Race and Rights: A Diary of a Law Professor, Williams wrote: "I would like to write in a way that fills the inter-subjectivity of legal constructions, that forces the reader to both participate in the construction of meaning and be aware of that process."

Praised for creating a new form of legal writing and scholarship incorporating personal narrative, critical and literary theory, traditional legal doctrine, and empirical and sociological research, Williams' presentation will examine the Brown decision and its effects in a diverse manner.

In her speech, titled "Diary of a Mad Law Professor: Recent Entries," Williams will aim to set the record straight regarding racial myths, showing how aspects of American culture and politics like Star Wars movies and political campaigns obscure the persistence of racial injustice.

"Her speech on the eve of an election in which race is not being addressed widely by the candidates and voters of color are both registering in large numbers and are also facing harassment in their get-out the vote efforts in numerous states promises to be revealing," said Nightingale.

The Feinberg Family Distinguished Lecture Series was coordinated by the Department of History and funded by contributions from the family and friends of UMass alumnus Kenneth Feinberg, 1967.

The series previously included speeches from two nationally prominent lecturers and will feature artistic displays, panels, and public discussions during the remainder of the fall semester

Emerson College student dies in Red Sox celebration

Boston Police Department claims responsibility for woman's death

By Martin Finucane
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The death of a young woman who was shot by a police pepper ball early Thursday during post-Red Sox game celebrations is an unusual case that shouldn't stop research into similar weapons, experts said.

Melvin L. Tucker, a security consultant who specializes in the use of deadly and non-deadly force by police, said he didn't know of another case of a pepper ball causing a death. He said he hoped the death wouldn't curtail the growing trend of police using such weapons.

"This is a tragedy. There's no question about it, but it should not stop the research on less than lethal weapons and the use of less than lethal weapons," said Tucker, the former police chief of Tallahassee, Fla., and Asheville, N.C.

Boston police have said that Victoria Snelgrove, 21, of East Bridgewater, a journalism student, was killed outside Fenway Park when she was hit in the eye by a capsule full of pepper powder fired by an FN303, a compressed-air gun that is essentially a more powerful version of a paintball rifle.

A spokesman for the gun's maker, FN Herstal, didn't immediately return a message seeking comment on Saturday.

But the small arms maker's Web site describes the FN303 as a "less lethal launcher" that features "low risk of permanent injuries even at very short range."

The Web site offers a diagram that indicates the FN303 projectiles, which are filled with pepper powder, hit people with less force than rubber bullets or the "bean bags" also used by some police forces, but with more energy than paintballs.

The Web site also warns, however, "For safety reasons, never aim towards face, throat or neck."

Tucker said that, while he's not aware of any other fatalities with the pepper ball guns, there are real risks associated with firing objects at people - and there have been fatalities after police fired rubber bullets or bean bags. Typically, with the pepper balls the injuries are minor and, he argued.

"The benefits outweigh the risks."

Steven Aftergood, a senior research analyst at the Federation of American Scientists who has studied non-lethal military weaponry, said he too couldn't remember any previous deaths from the use of the pepper ball-firing guns.

But he said it wasn't surprising because "people have different levels of vulnerability and an impact that might barely stun an adult male can cripple or kill a child. So it's really to be expected and it means that great discernment has to be used in their application."

Jack Levin, a criminologist who is director of the Brudnick Center on Violence at Northeastern University, said, "There's absolutely no way to reduce these accidental deaths to zero. ... You can train people, but the police, just like other human beings, have to operate based on instinct. Training can do just so much under duress."

New non-lethal weapons have been spreading among police forces nationwide, experts said, and include devices such as Tazers, which fire an electric dart; stun guns; guns that fire bean bags or pepper balls; pepper spray cans and shotguns that fire capture nets.

At the same time, the military is experimenting with new devices and it's hoped that some of those new tools can be used by police.

The military, for example, has experimented with a heat ray that is designed to break up crowds by giving people a burning sensation.

Aftergood said there was a danger that, with non-lethal weapons available, police might be more willing to use force, but proper training on when to use force could avert problems.

"It's better to have more options than fewer options in applying force. One should not be forced to make a choice between doing nothing and killing someone. To the extent that a spectrum of options can be created, that's a plus," Aftergood said. "We should not assume that these devices are worse than they are."

Herald apologizes for printing graphic photos

BOSTON — The Boston Herald on Friday apologized for publishing two graphic photos of a woman who died after being struck in the face with a pepper spray-filled projectile fired by police into a crowd of Red Sox fans.

The Herald was inundated with complaints, by phone and on its Web site, about the photographs of Victoria Snelgrove, 21, of East Bridgewater, who died after police fired plastic pepper spray balls into the crowd as they celebrated the Red Sox win in the American League championship against the New York Yankees.

The Herald ran a color photo on its front page, and a smaller black-and-white photo inside its Friday editions, showing Snelgrove lying on the ground, bleeding from her nose and left eye.

"The Herald today published two graphic photos that angered and upset many in our community. For that, I apologize," Herald Media Inc. Editorial Director Kenneth A. Chandler said in the statement. "Our aim was to demonstrate this terrible tragedy as comprehensively as possible. In retrospect, the images of this unusually ugly incident were too graphic."

The newspaper planned to publish the apology in its Saturday editions.

The Boston Globe ran a smaller, black-and-white photograph inside its Friday edition. The Associated Press also transmitted a color photo showing Snelgrove lying on the sidewalk.

Today is the last day to withdraw from a course to receive a 'W' grade

University of Massachusetts undergraduates and Continuing Education students have until today, Monday, October 25 to drop a fall semester course and receive only a "W" on their transcripts.

Dropping the class will have no impact on one's cumulative average. A "W" is almost always preferable to an "F" on a transcript.

Students are encouraged to consult their academic dean for advice and appropriate procedures in order to drop a course.

However, students should be aware that they must carry at least 12 credits for financial aid and most health insurance purposes.

Students can pick up slips that must be signed and turned into the Dean in the Whitmore Administration Building. Signed slips must be in by 5 p.m. today.

Candidate Update: only eight days until election

Bush and Kerry rally voter support

By JEREMY DIRAC
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the Presidential Election coming up next Tuesday, candidates George W. Bush and John F. Kerry are working to get their message out to the small number of undecided voters.

According to Newsweek, starting today Former President Bill Clinton is scheduled to start campaigning for Kerry in Florida, the first campaigning he's done since his quadruple-bypass surgery.

Meanwhile, the Bush campaign hopes to sway voters in Ohio by bringing in Governor of California, Arnold Schwarzenegger. According to ABC News, conventional wisdom says that this extremely close election will come down to Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Florida. In an interview with Charles Gibson however, Bush said that he expects it to come down to more.

"I wouldn't discount Michigan...I wouldn't discount the influence of Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota and New Mexico. I think this race is a non-predictable race...there's a lot of interesting states ... not considered to be in play." Bush told Gibson.

Yesterday Bush had one campaign event at a late-afternoon rally at a high school in Alamogordo, N.M. He also gave an interview on Fox News where he said that it was "up in the air" if the nation could ever be totally safe from terrorism because the terrorists have to be right only once and "we have to be right 100 percent of the time."

According to MSNBC, on Saturday Bush attended a flurry of rallies in Republican-friendly areas of Florida, hopscotching with a Marine helicopter into baseball fields. He continued to deliver the message that Kerry had changed positions on the war in Iraq, saying that, "Senator Kerry seems to have forgotten all that, as his position has evolved during the course of the campaign. You might call it election amnesia."

According to ABC, Kerry spoke yesterday at a predominantly black church in Fort Lauderdale Florida, in a heavily Democratic county, where he accused the President of using scare tactics.

"I believe our future belongs to freedom, not to fear." Kerry told the churchgoers that he would make sure their votes are counted this time. He also addressed church bishops who criticized his support for embryonic stem cell research and abortion rights. "I love my church, I respect the bishops, but I respectfully disagree," Bush said.

According to MSNBC, both campaigns have come out with new ads aimed at criticizing the opposition. The Bush campaign's ad depicts prowling wolves in a forest. A voice says, "(Kerry's) weakness attracts those who are waiting to do America harm." The Kerry team responded with an ad depicting an ostrich with its head in the sand and then a soaring eagle. A voice says, "Given the choice, in these challenging times, shouldn't we be the eagle again?"

According to the NewsObserver, this past Friday Bush met with Cardinal Justin Rigali, Catholic archbishop of Philadelphia at St. John's Church Rectory in Downingtown, Pennsylvania. Reporters were not allowed in the meeting, however were permitted to take photographs of the two. Bush is trying to appeal to Pennsylvania's 23 percent Catholic population with the photo-op, says the NewsObserver.

According to the Denver Post, on the same day Kerry had his own photo-op in Boardman, Ohio where he was returning from a two-hour hunting trip, wearing camouflage and carrying a 12-gauge shotgun under his arm. Kerry hit a goose, which his companion carried. The Denver Post said Kerry is trying to use this photo to appeal to gun owners and hunters.

Later in the day he was back in suit and tie receiving the endorsement of Dana Reeve, widow to Christopher Reeve, an advocate of embryonic stem cell research.

"Although our family feels Chris's loss so keenly right now, today is the right moment to transform our grief into hope," said Reeve according to the New York Times.

According to the Denver Post, Vice President Dick Cheney criticized Kerry for the hunting photo-op. Cheney pointed towards the F-rating given Kerry by the National Rifle Association and said that it was, "an effort he's making to hide the fact that the votes against gun-owner rights any chance he gets." Cheney called the photo-op Kerry's "October disguise."

Meanwhile, says the NewsObserver, Senator John Edwards accused the Bush administration of ignoring problems from the lack of flu vaccine to the war in Iraq.

"Who's minding the store?" asked Edwards, referring to the heavy speaking schedules of National Security Advisor Condoleeza Rice, Health Secretary Tommy Thompson, and Commerce Secretary Don Evans.

According to a CNN poll of polls (11 polls of likely voters) for this past Friday, Bush is doing a bit better than Kerry, leading him, 49 percent to 46 percent.

Alcohol will not be banned during World Series games

By MARTIN FINUCANE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) — The mayor backed off his threat of banning alcohol from around Fenway Park during the upcoming World Series but more police will be inside neighborhood bars to make sure fans don't get too drunk or rowdy.

Police said they would be prepared to make mass arrests if necessary.

"If we have to execute mass arrests, they'll have buses and vans and tactical officers available," police commissioner Kathleen O'Toole told The Boston Globe. "We need to send a very strong message to the potential troublemakers that we're there in force."

The Globe also reported that 70 additional officers will be on hand for World Series games Saturday and Sunday, citing to a police operational plan it had obtained.

After meeting for an hour Friday with about two dozen bar and restaurant owners, Mayor Thomas Menino backed down from a threat to invoke a rarely used state law to ban liquor "in cases of riot or great public excitement."

He had considered the ban after thousands of raucous fans took to the streets after the hometown Red Sox won the American League championship. One college student died after being hit in the eye by police firing pepper spray into the crowd, and more than a dozen others were injured.

Instead, bar owners agreed to a series of restrictions, including not allowing patrons to line up outside to wait to get in, not allowing bars to become overcrowded or patrons to drink too much, and not allowing television crews to do live shots from inside bars. Authorities were worried that live television coverage of bar patrons encourages people to act out as they play to the cameras.

In addition, police will step up their presence inside bars near the ballpark and around the tourist hot spots of Faneuil Hall and the city's waterfront to enforce the agreed-upon restrictions.

The bar owners, who agreed to the measures, are "part of what we're trying to do to make sure the world sees Boston in a positive manner," Menino said.

Bar and restaurant owners had expressed outrage when Menino first floated the idea of banning alcohol sales around Fenway Park, where the Red Sox will go up against the St. Louis Cardinals in a best-of-seven World Series that begins Saturday.

After the meeting with the mayor, Patrick Lyons, who owns several nightclubs on Landsdowne Street across from the ballpark, said, "We're intent on having a good safe environment within the licensed premises" during the games.

"It was a great meeting. It was a very cooperative meeting. ... I think the outcome was a positive outcome and we're working together to do everything to keep the public safe," said Dana Van Fleet, owner of the Cask 'n' Flagon, a bar just outside the ballpark.

Both Lyons and Van Fleet blamed the disturbances in the streets on crowds who flock to the area, which is near a number of colleges, to celebrate after games, rather than patrons coming out of the nearby bars.

A number of local television stations contacted Friday afternoon said they had no plans to battle Menino on the issue of live shots from inside bars, with some saying they didn't intend to do them for the World Series or never did them at all.

Lou D'Ermilio, senior VP of media relations for the national Fox network, said the network did do live shots during Game 7 of the ALCS, but would abide by Menino's request.

"We have no problem complying with that request. What the mayor would like, the mayor will get," he said.

The meeting followed the death of an Emerson College student who was hit in the eye by a pepper spray-filled ball fired by a police officer. Victoria Snelgrove, 21, was fatally wounded in the post-game rowdiness outside Fenway Park following the Red Sox's series-clinching win over the Yankees.

Student volunteers aid many local homeless shelters

"They serve about 100 people a day for one thing or another," explained Alper, "They provide grocery packages, clothing, and household goods. There's a shower there and lockers for people to keep stuff if they don't have a residence."

First Call for help operates a little differently providing monetary aid to help people who are homeless or in danger of becoming homeless.

"Say a person found a place to live but needs first and last months rent and security deposit," explained Alper, "First Call helps them pay that. Or if they are going to be evicted and only need a couple hundred dollars to pay rent while looking for job. First Call will help them pay it."

Although the money First Call provides is not a loan and not expected to be paid back, often people who have received support from the organization come back to support it by volunteering or donating funds.

"While we are raising money for the homeless, we are also raising awareness," said Kim.

Dozens massacred by insurgents in one of the deadliest battles in Iraq Sunday

By Robert Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — In their boldest and deadliest ambush yet, insurgents waylaid three minibuses carrying U.S.-trained Iraqi soldiers heading home on leave and massacred about 50 of them - forcing many to lie down on the ground and shooting them in the head, officials said Sunday.

Some accounts by police said the rebels were dressed in Iraqi military uniforms.

The killing of so many Iraqi soldiers - unarmed and in civilian clothes - in such an apparently sure-footed operation reinforced American and Iraqi suspicions that the country's security services have been infiltrated by insurgents.

A claim of responsibility posted on an Islamist Web site attributed the attack to followers of Jordanian-born terror mastermind Abu Musab al-Zarqawi.

Elsewhere, a U.S. diplomat was killed Sunday morning when a rebel-fired rocket or mortar shell crashed into the trailer where he was sleeping at an American base near the Baghdad airport, the U.S. Embassy announced.

Edward Seitz, 41, an agent with the State Department's Bureau of Diplomatic Security, was believed to be the first U.S. diplomat killed in Iraq since the war began in March 2003. Al-Jazeera television reported Sunday that the militant Islamic Army of Iraq claimed responsibility for the attack.

A Bulgarian soldier was killed and two others were injured in a car-bombing near Karbala, the Bulgarian Defense Ministry said. Karbala, a Shiite holy city south of Baghdad, has been quiet for months after U.S. troops routed Shiite militia there last spring.

The Iraqi soldiers were killed on their way home after completing a training course at the Kirkuk military camp northeast of Baghdad when their buses were stopped Saturday evening by rebels near the Iranian border about 95 miles east of Baghdad, Interior Ministry spokesman Adnan Abdul-Rahman said.

There was confusion over precise figures, although the Iraqi National Guard said 48 troops and three drivers were killed.

Abdul-Rahinan said 37 bodies were found Sunday on the ground with their hands behind their backs, shot execution-style. Twelve others were found in a burned bus, he said. Some officials quoted witnesses as saying insurgents fired rocket-propelled grenades at one bus.

"After inspection, we found out that they were shot after being ordered to lay down on the earth," Gen. Walid al-Azzawi, commander of the Diyala provincial police, said, adding that the bodies were laid out in four rows, with 12 bodies in each row.

In a Web site posting, the al-Qaida in Iraq, formerly known as Tawhid and Jihad, claimed responsibility for the ambush, saying "God enabled the Mujahedeen to kill all" the soldiers and "seize two cars and money."

The claim could not be verified but appeared on a Web site used in the past by Islamic extremists.

Al-Zarqawi and his movement are believed to be behind dozens of attacks on Iraqi and U.S.-led forces and kidnappings of foreigners. Many of those hostages, including three Americans, have been beheaded - some purportedly by al-Zarqawi himself.

The United States has put a $25 million bounty on al-Zarqawi - the same amount as for Osama bin Laden.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Soldiers in Iraq help clean up wreckage of deadly car bomb. Nearly 50 Iraqi soldiers were killed Sunday in a deadly attack by insurgents.

U.S. officials believe al-Zarqawi's group is headquartered in Fallujah, an insurgent bastion 40 miles west of Baghdad. On Sunday, a U.S. Marine F-18 Hornet jet struck an insurgent position there, the U.S. military said. Witnesses said six people were killed.

Fallujah fell under rebel control after the Bush administration ordered Marines to lift their three-week siege of the city in April. U.S. commanders have spoken of a new offensive to clear rebel strongholds ahead of Iraq's crucial elections in January.

Scattered explosions rumbled through central Baghdad late Sunday but the cause could not be determined.

Iraqi police and soldiers have been increasingly targeted by insurgents, mostly with car bombs and mortar shells. However, the fact that the insurgents were able to strike at so many unarmed soldiers in such a remote region suggested the guerrillas may have had advance word on the soldiers' travel.

"There was probably collusion among the soldiers or other groups," Diyala's deputy Gov. Aqil Hamid al-Adili told Al-Arabiya television. "Otherwise, the gunmen would not have gotten the information about the soldiers' departure from their training camp and that they were unarmed."

Last week, a U.S. defense official told reporters in Washington that some members of the Iraqi security services have developed sympathies and contacts with the guerrillas. In other instances, infiltrators were sent to join the security services, the official said on condition of anonymity.

He cited a mortar attack Tuesday on an Iraqi National Guard compound north of Baghdad as a possible inside job. The attackers apparently knew when and where the soldiers were gathering and dropped mortar rounds in the middle of their formation. At least four Iraqis were killed and 80 wounded.

The extent of rebel infiltration is unknown. However, it raises concern about the American strategy of handing over more and more responsibility to Iraqi security forces so U.S. forces could be drawn down.

One American soldier also was wounded in the pre-dawn attack that killed Seitz, the State Department official. The attack occurred at Camp Victory, the headquarters of the U.S.-led coalition's ground forces command.

Seitz was believed to be the first full-time State Department officer killed in Iraq. Last October, a female U.S. Foreign Service officer was severely wounded in the arm in a rocket barrage on the Rasheed Hotel.

Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz, one of the architects of the Iraq war, was in the hotel at the time but escaped injury.

Associated Press reporters Rawya Rageh in Baghdad, Hanna Daghestani in Baqouba and Abdul Razzak Jabr in Kut contributed to this report.

The army agreed to investigation on Halliburton

By William Mann
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Army has agreed to a Pentagon investigation into claims by a top contracting official that a Halliburton subsidiary unfairly won no-bid contracts worth billions of dollars for work in Iraq and the Balkans, according to Army documents obtained Sunday.

The complaint alleges that the award of contracts without competition to restore Iraq's oil industry and to supply and feed U.S. troops in the Balkans puts at risk "the integrity of the federal contracting program as it relates to a major defense contractor."

It also asks protection from retaliation for the whistle-blower, Bunnantine Green-house, chief contracting officer of the Army Corps of Engineers.

In a letter to Greenhouse's lawyer, an Army attorney said that the matter is being referred to the Defense Department's inspector general for "review and action, as appropriate." It also said the Corps had been ordered to "suspend any adverse personnel action" against Greenhouse "until a sufficient record is available to address the specific matters" in her complaint.

Copies of the letter and complaints, documents which were provided to some members of Congress, were obtained Sunday by The Associated Press.

Halliburton spokeswoman Wendy Hall said from Houston, where the company is headquartered, "KBR doesn't have any information on what Bunny Greenhouse may or may not have said to other Pentagon officials in early 2003. Certainly we can't address any threatened legal action she may be considering against her employer."

"On the larger issues, the old allegations have once again been recycled, this time one week before the election," Hall said. She said that Halliburton is proud to serve the troops just as we have for the past 60 years for both Democrat and Republican administrations."

The contract has been a focus of the presidential campaign because of Vice President Dick Cheney past tries to the company. Cheney was chief executive officers of Halliburton and continues to receive deferred compensation from the company.

Michael D. Kohn, who is Greenhouse's lawyer , in a letter to acting Army Secretary Les Brownlee, charged that in the Balkan contract a deputy assistant secretary of the Army had ordered changes in documents to legitimate the contract "for political reasons."

Kohn's complaint said contracts were approved over Greenhouse's reservations, handwritten on the original contracts, and extensions were awarded because underlings signed them without her knowledge and in collusion with senior officials.

After her superiors signed off on the Iraq contract and returned it for her necessary approval, the complaint said, Greenhouse wrote beside her signature: "I caution that extending this sole-source effort beyond a one year period could convey an invalid perception that there is not strong intent for a limited competition."

The contracts under investigation grew out of a $7 billion multiple-year award to Halliburton's KBR subsidiary to rehabilitate Iraq's oil industry after the U.S.-led invasion last year; and an 11-month extension, which cost $165 million, of a $2 billion services contract the Army awarded in May 1999.

The Iraq contract was awarded in February 2003, less than a month before the invasion, under a clause specifying no-bid contracts in cases of "compelling emergency." The complaint said Greenhouse objected to the five-year term, asking why the certainty that the emergency would continue for five years.

Kohn said Sunday that he still wants an independent investigation and will ask Attorney General John Ashcroft to appoint investigators to conduct their own probe to ensure the investigation is complete, independent and fair to his client.

"This needs to be done by an outside agency," Kohn said. "From past experience, we are uncomfortable with the DOD-IG handling this investigation by themselves."

According to the complaint, in January 2002 Greenhouse sent an investigative team to examine the Balkan operation. Afterward, she reported: "The general feeling in the theater is that the contractor (KBR) is 'out of control'" and was able to manipulate Corps of Engineer officials.

The Balkan contract was to have expired no later than May 27 of this year but was extended, without Greenhouse's knowledge, after a hunt for other contractors was stopped. Whereas it originally was awarded as a compelling emergency, the extension was awarded under the exception that KBR was the "one and only source."

Targeting the wealthy is the wrong message

Allison Edles

Within the world of higher education, there will always undoubtedly be competition—whether it is in sports, academics or just overall reputation.

Wealth of a school also comes into play and, unfortunately, has some say in determining the amount of prestige a school will be afforded. University College London (UCL) in the U.K. has recently started a fundraiser aimed at all its wealthiest alumni in an effort to raise 300 million pounds. The reason behind this fundraiser is to be able to hold some kind of competitive ground against its American university counterparts. While competition is always a factor among colleges and universities, holding a fundraiser that's sole purpose is to try to raise as much money as American universities in order to gain the same amount of prestige is petty and should not be a priority for a university to hold a fundraiser.

It's not the wealth of the school that determines the success of its students, but the work each individual student puts in during their time; here.

According to www.telegraph.co.uk, the online version of the British newspaper The Daily Telegraph, raising 300 million pounds was vital to the university's competitiveness because the institution has recently dropped its world ranking by five places. In addition, soon to follow in UCLs footsteps is Cambridge University, which will be launching a similar kind of fundraiser in 2009 when the university plans to celebrate its 800th anniversary.

The director of the fundraiser, Hamish Stewart, stated "... the better respected UCL is internationally, the more [alumni] degrees will be worth." There is such a wide range of universities in this world, all with their own special expertise and their own individual programs. For someone to have graduated with a degree from a four-year college or university speaks very highly of that person, considering the amount of people in the country who aren't fortunate enough to have a college education afforded to them. Students who have graduated with Harvard degrees and UMass degrees both get well-paying jobs in the same field. It's not the wealth of the school that determines the success of its students, but the work each individual student puts in during their time there.

Donations that are made to colleges and universities by alumni are generally made because of their pride in that particular school and as a way to give back to the school. It is not a mandatory offering and degrees will not be revoked if one does not contribute. However, for UCL to threaten its alumni by saying that if they do not give to their alma mater, their degrees will be worth less is disgraceful. The university's alumni that they are particularly targeting are the more wealthy former students. Given that information, it would be apparent that they all managed to land well-paying jobs that would account for their financial success. Their degree from UCL was what helped them get those jobs.

The fact that UCL is spreading this message to the international community speaks for itself that the university doesn't want to gain prestige on merit and academics alone, but rather through having the largest endowment from its former graduates. The purpose of the university seems undermined if educational achievement has taken a backseat to this fundraiser. If a university can't be proud of its graduates and can only focus on how it sizes up to American universities fin-ancially, then it should not call itself a university and embody all the prestige that comes with that term.

As for Cambridge University to follow in UCLs steps, it makes one wonder when and where they lost their prestige. Cambridge University and Oxford University are the two oldest universities still functioning. The majority of the American universities were modeled off of their English predecessors. With all that history and pride, not to mention the famous alumni throughout history, it's hard to believe that finances would be a major concern in competition with American higher education.

The variety that is offered among colleges and universities is what gives it its charm and why there is such an involved process that each college-bound high school student must indulge themselves in. A large portion of students choose their respective schools based on location, cost, size, diversity etc. And while prestige is oftentimes found on that list, for a large portion of people in the world who have restrictions and limitations it is not a key deciding factor. Students will still choose to attend schools regardless of how much money the school has and how wealthy their alumni are. To insinuate that interest among prospective students will decline and graduates' degrees will be worth less because there are more competitive schools overseas is not demonstrating the mentality of a respected university.

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

The meaning of Halloween

Matthew Reid

For the first time since the year 1999, Halloween falls on a Sunday this year. For people across the country, especially those found in Bible Belt states, holding Halloween celebrations on a Sunday is unacceptable. Some feel that holding a day of "devil worship" on a day that is supposed to be reserved for the Lord is sacrilegious. It has even been suggested that a national campaign be started to celebrate the holiday on Saturday instead.

Before one can decide on this issue, it's important to understand where Halloween really comes from. Some people think it originated as a day for witches to worship Satan and burn crosses. It actually dates back to the ancient Celtic festival of Samhain (pronounced "sow-in"). Nov. 1 marked the beginning of the Celtic New Year, and it was believed that on the night before, the ghosts of the deceased would return to the world of the living.

The presence of the ghosts allowed Celtic priests to make predictions about the future, and give comfort and direction for the upcoming winter. Bonfires were built to commemorate the New Year, and people would dress in costumes of animal skins and dance around the fire.

Over the years, Roman and Christian influences would seep into Celtic lands and traditions, and Halloween as we know it today would eventually be born. But even today, many of the elements from the ancient Celtic holiday remain.

This holiday is not, and never has been, about worshiping the devil. Samhain began as a way to commemorate the end of the year, and the word even means, literally, "summer's end."

Moving Halloween to a Saturday this year would anger some, and it would anger others to just keep the day as-is, so obviously there is no solution for everyone. But keeping things as-is would seem like the most logical course of action. For one thing, just because some people have a problem with it, doesn't mean a change needs to be made that will affect everyone involved. If an individual doesn't want to send their child out trick-or-treating, that is there choice. However, they should not decide for everyone.

When I was an 8-year-old all I cared about on Halloween was filling up my pillowcase with as many Snickers and Butterfingers as I could, regardless of what day of the week it was.

If someone truly has a problem with the concept of Halloween, it would seem that the specific day of the week it is celebrated on would be inconsequential. A woman quoted in an Oct. 24 Philadelphia Inquirer article was quoted as saying, "[Sunday] is a day for the good Lord, not for the devil." The woman went on to say that she would allow her 4-year-old daughter to go trick-or-treating on Saturday instead, dressed as a princess. Apparently, worshiping the devil is perfectly acceptable on a Saturday, just not a Sunday.

Some people are saying that celebrating Halloween on a Sunday will confuse little children, warping their minds as to the true meaning of the Sabbath. I have a hard time swallowing this statement. I doubt that any 8-year-old who puts on his SpongeBob SquarePants costume will get to the first doorstep, ring the door bell, and think to himself, "gee, I find it odd that mummy and daddy are letting me take part in this extremely Pagan festival of devil worshiping on a Sunday, when they always used to tell me that Sundays were reserved for prayers to the Lord for all that he gives us. I wish I did this yesterday, so the Lord wouldn't think any worse of me."

Maybe some kids do think this way nowadays, and maybe I was just uncultured and ignorant as a child. When I was an 8-year-old all I cared about on Halloween was filling up my pillowcase with as many Snickers and Butterfingers as I could, regardless of what day of the week it was.

It's no doubt that Halloween has changed in meaning over the years. As is the case for most things in our society, the day has become commercialized, which is perhaps the bigger tragedy here. People are going to profit off of Halloween any way they can. It is estimated, according to a CNN report, that the country will spend a total of $3 billion on costumes and candy this year. And other negative occurrences associated with Halloween, such as pumpkin smashing, egging of cars and houses and toilet-papering of trees have nothing to do with the devil. These things have to do with pre-existing problems with society that plague this country all 365 days of the year, not just on Halloween.

Is Halloween the most wholesome of holidays? No. Has it come to be associated with the Devil and evil practices? Yes. But when you consider that Christmas has come to be associated with getting the most expensive toys on the market, Valentine's Day has come to be a cash-cow for Hallmark, and Thanksgiving is centered on watching football games and parades, it becomes obvious that all holidays are tarnished in today's world. The bottom line, Halloween has come to symbolize a worshiping of chocolate, not Satan (and some would argue that that is an even bigger problem).

Going nowhere on immigration: Policies raise questions

"As a nation that values immigration, and depends on immigration, we should have immigration laws that work and make us proud."
- George W. Bush, January 7th, 2004, announcing his immigration proposal.

In January of this year, Bush proposed a comprehensive plan of immigration reform, including a temporary worker program, stronger border enforcement, and granting temporary worker status to undocumented (i.e. illegal) working immigrants, in effect legitimizing their presence. The plan was greeted with intense criticism from many Republicans, including 23 congressmen who, in a January 27th letter to Bush, warned that it would risk a backlash from the Republican base.

The Washington Times reported on January 16th that some Republicans refused to contribute to Bush's campaign on account of the immigration plan. Despite Bush's potential to lead his party on the issue, he decided rather than reviewing or revising it to let the proposal die.

But immigration reform is a subject that will not go away. Approximately 300,000 people immigrated illegally into the US during each year of the '90's, either overstaying student or work visas or slipping across the border, while 1 million legal immigrants came into the US. Diverse groups line up for or against immigration, including businesses that import workers or employ recent immigrants, unions that fear immigrants will cost them jobs, and various communities that are composed of immigrants. At the third presidential debate, moderator Bob Schieffer prefaced the only question on immigration by declaring he received more emails on it than any other. Bush's answer to that question recycled his temporary worker plan, and then went on to accuse John Kerry of calling for amnesty for all illegal immigrants, while claiming his own plan did not contain amnesty.

John Kerry's plan for immigration reform differs conceptually from his opponent's. He lists specific policies he would support, including the Agbobs Bill and Dream Act. The Agbobs Bill also creates a guest worker program, but with the potential of permanent resident immigrant status, while Bush's plan promises temporary status and financial incentives for workers to return home.

The Dream Act offers undocumented high school graduates the opportunity to gain citizenship if they pursue and complete a college education. Kerry's broader immigration proposal would offer effective amnesty to illegal immigrants, but only those who have lived in the US for 5 years, paid taxes, and pass a security screening. He also emphasizes border security, and that temporary workers have the same workplace protections as Americans; in addition he seeks to crack down on hiring of illegal immigrants, which is a crime. Finally, Kerry plans to offer an immigration reform bill within his first hundred days as president.

Both plans are worrisome, since they advocate a guest worker program that is effectively state-sponsored indentured servitude - immigrant workers would be dependent on their employers. However, this is already the case, since illegal immigrants employed in the US cannot protest to the authorities without fear of deportation and businesses can take advantage of this; in fact, by legitimizing these relationships, there is the potential to control them and reign in employer abuses. The lesser of two evils is a guest worker program that provides immigrant workers with a legal status, and potentially the same working conditions as Americans. Kerry's proposal offers these temporary workers the possibility of residency, while Bush grants them only a temporary status, and encourages them to leave.

Furthermore, Bush has already shown his unwillingness to lead his party on the issue of immigration, meaning that the status quo would persist. Bush claims to want immigration reform, but won't fight for it; Kerry will.

When celebrations go bad

What a glorious moment for Red Sox Nation Wednesday night when we beat the Yankees to go to the World Series. What a tragic ending early Thursday morning when a young woman lost her life. It could have been prevented. When I went to UMass in the early 80s my friends all lived by a simple credo -party hearty, but be cool. If one of us got out of hand, it was the responsibility of the others to reign him back in or to stop him. The cities and towns including Boston and Amherst, the Universities and the police are doing their part to try to keep the celebrations peaceful.

We must all do our part too. The most effective deterrent to bad behavior is the word of a friend or peer reminding you your behavior is wrong. So if you friend has too much to drink, take her home and put her to bed, if a friend gets violent or tries to start a fight, make him stop, if you see someone committing vandalism, tell them it is wrong. There is nothing worse than waking up with a bad hangover regretting something you or one of your friends did that was out of line and out of character the night before. Sadly, one young woman did not wake up Thursday morning. Let's all make sure it doesn't happen again. Have fun, enjoy the moment, but be cool.

Doug Storey
UMASS Alumnus

On the heels of the biggest win in Red Sox history Wednesday night, a horrible tragedy befell the city of Boston. Victoria Snelgrove was struck in the eye by a police-fired projectile and killed following the brilliant comeback of the Sox. The behavior surrounding the aftermath of Red Sox victories must be handled with force, however, people cannot be getting killed by police officers. These projectiles are the same ones being shot at students on the UMass Campus. The funny part is, this was the first time police in Boston were armed with these weapons. However, they have been shot on this campus since last October.

I realize the riotous behavior must be handled, and of course handled by force. Kids are going to take some beatings and some pain...that's too bad for them; they are bringing it upon themselves. However, if the police fire a projectile and it accidentally hits a student in the eye and kills him or her...there is going to be a serious problem. Just look at Kent State during Vietnam - - the country went into an uproar. The police must find another way to deal with crowd dispersal. Tear Gas, Fire Hoses - - whatever. These projectiles are a major problem that has already begun to happen. I hope the police choose to replace these weapons and do it fast. If police officers are killing college students and nothing is done about it, the students will do something about it...and it will not be pretty. Gargano, the police commissioner and everyone else responsible for maintaining peace on this campus should discontinue the use of these weapons. What happened to Victoria must never be allowed to take place again. My fellow students I realize the Red Sox success is a blast. I realize a lot of people want to run outside and just go nuts, but try to keep things in perspective. We don't want this turning into something ugly, because if it does...not only college students will be hurt...police officers will be hurt too.

Home last weekend, my friends and I had decided to go out to a sports bar/arcade in Somerville to watch the Sox battle out their first World Series game Saturday night. As the Cardinals finally struck out for the last time in the bottom ninth, the close game was over and we had won. Filled with a sense of victory and satisfaction, we walked to our cars yelling and cheering for the Red Sox as the car alarms around us filled the crisp-October night air.

But this feeling left us quickly as we arrived at my friend Sam's battered Chevy Malibu. Shards of azure glass covered the gravel in front of her rear left passenger door. Some callous idiot had come by after we had gone into the place and smashed it, taking many of her personal belongings. All of us were shocked and saddened, thinking how a night so promising could suddenly mutate so fast into a nightmare.

Apparently, this thief had seen Sam hide her wallet and purse underneath her jacket before walking with us into the bar. Despite the Malibu's tinted-windows, they had reached in; filching not only her cell phone and wallet; but her checkbook and credit card as well. We stood by her with empathy, offering her our support. Irritated and morose, Sam called her credit card company and bank to cancel everything, struggling to fight back the inevitable tears.

This vehicle had been given to her as a gift by her grandfather who recently passed away this summer. A symbol of pride to her, Sam drives her car to and from the University of Vermont where she is studying to be a veterinarian. A person she had never even met had tried to take this all away from her this night. Fortunately, Sam will be reimbursed by her credit card company and bank. But her sense of security will never be the same and neither will ours. Can we only trust our family, friends, colleagues, and fellow employees? Must we always be in a state of distrust and anxiety to strangers? Perhaps we may have to, but it shouldn't have to be this way.

This was not the first time someone I knew experienced this kind of disillusioning experience. My friend Mike, who lives down the hall from me at Umass, just recently had his Honda plundered from in a Southwest parking lot. Similar to Sam's case, there was not much Mike could do. He told me he reported the event to the Amherst police, but they offered little assistance. The same answer was given to us by Somerville's law enforcement Saturday night. They asked us if the call we made was an emergency and we said no, not really. But it was a pretty serious thing, having a friend's car and heart ravaged; something should be done about it.

Now, I understand many people have little or no money, but so do us college students! After all, we are broke from textbook buying, car insurance, groceries, etc. Many of us who have jobs live from paycheck to paycheck, balancing busy schedules. So what would make a person do such a thing as this? Maybe they can't find jobs in today's market to feed their children.

The thing which upset me most about Saturday night was the fact that this could happen again to other innocent people. What if next time, this thief just holds up a car while its driver and passengers are still inside and threatens their lives? My friends and I are thankful no harm was done to us, but we still feel used. What had we done to this person in whom they felt they needed to take from us?

'I'll Never Know You Now' pays tribute to a fallen hero

'I'll Never Know You Now: A Tribute to Elliott Smith'

Smith's last album, "From a Basement on the Hill," was released posthumously earlier this week.

For generations past, it was the deaths of Buddy Holly, the Big Bopper and Ritchie Valens. It was the overdoses of Janis Joplin and Jimi Hendrix. For us it is the passing of Elliott Smith.

Smith, who committed suicide just over a year ago on October 21, 2004, was and continues to be one of contemporary music's most affecting and haunting artists. Though he did not achieve the kind of fame that found him playing TRL or schmoozing with Jay Leno on "The Tonight Show" in his 34 years of living, death has not silence Smith. In fact, since his passing it seems that he has become increasingly well-known. A posthumously released record, "From a Basement on the Hill," has countless of the industries best singing Smith's praises.

For their part, musicians of the Pioneer Valley, where Smith attended Hampshire College, have set out to pay homage to one of the area's most talented representitives. "I'm Never Gonna Know You Now: A Tribute to Elliott Smith" will take place tonight at 9 p.m. at Northampton's The Elevens. A collection of the Valley's most prominent up and comers will perform a collection of Smith's work not only in honor of the life of a musical genius, but to commemorate the release of "From a Basement on the Hill," which hit shelves on Tuesday.

Though much of his career was spent under the mainstream radar, Elliott Smith's effect on the music industry has been tremndous. Although he was never a household name, most will recognize his haunting vocals and ethereal compositions from the 1997 Oscar-winning flim "Good Will Hunting," to which Smith comprised a significant amount of the soundtrack. While that contribution gained Smith mainstream attention, he had been making music since the age of 14, and relesed his first solo album in 1994. The indie scene immediately embraced everything Elliott and in the 10 years that passed, Smith remained a favorite. An Academy Award nomination for "Miss Misery," a track off his 1997 album "Either/Or," may have brought Smith to the attention of millions, but it was his music that granted him credibility and fame.

As tribute shows go, "I'll Never Know You Now" hopes to be one of the better ones. All the musicians scheduled to perform have worked in the Valley, perfecting their craft, drawing inspiration from Smith's canon of work. On the roster will be Mark Mulcahy, Philip Price, Frank Padellero and Kevin O'Rourke. Jose Ayerve will also appear, along with Abeja, Dennis Crommett and The Bunwinkies. Rounding out the bill are Scott Alden, Bursting Splats, Winterpills, Flora Reed, Lesa Bezo, Scott Brodeur, Thane Thompson. Others may appear.

Admission for the event is a mere $4. All proceeds from "I'll Never Know You Now" will benefit the Elliott Smith Memorial Smith Fund, which serves to provide support for children who are victims of abuse.

A look at 'Don't Look Back'

By Peter Blandino
Collegian Correspondent

This past Friday night, Northampton's Academy of Music kicked off a week of "rock-umentaries" (dubbed "Rocktober") with a screening of D.A Pennebaker's historic film, "Don't Look Back." The groundbreaking documentary chronicles Bob Dylan's last solo acoustic tour in 1965. Later in that same year, Dylan would release "Bringing It All Back Home," predominantly an electric album featuring only three solo acoustic performances — "Gates of Eden," "It's Alright Ma" and "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue." It is an interesting point in the career of perhaps the most influential performer of alltime. He is immensely popular, but is about to "go electric" and surpass any of the success he had up to that point.

Pennebaker's camera shadows Dylan, and his entourage, including famed folk singer Joan Baez, Allen Price (briefly the pianist for The Animals), manager Allen Grossman, Bob Neuwirth and others, as they shuttle from the airport to hotel rooms, to interviews, to performance halls and back. The fly-on-the-wall perspective allows viewers to catch a glimpse of these notables' personalities, their sense of humor for example, which would be lost in a more conventional documentary.

Pennebaker's succeeds brilliantly in unifying all the footage into a cohesive whole without the use of an intrusive voice over. For example, in an interview for the BBC, Dylan is asked to comment on his sensitivity to racial oppression in America, and also how his career began.

Pennebaker then cuts to a clip of a very young Dylan performing his 1964 release, "Only A Pawn In There Game," c o n - cerning the murder of Civil Rights Activist, Medgar Evers, to small and mostly black audience on a Mississippi farm. As the handful of spectators applauds at the conclusion of his performance, Pennebaker flashes forward to London, 1965. Applause thunders through a grand performance hall as Dylan takes center stage.

The performances themselves make up only a small fraction of the film. This only adds to the value of the concert footage. Dylan's rendition of "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carroll" is truly moving. Pennebaker is lying on the floor as he shoots. The vantage point is looking up at Dylan, shrouded in darkness, with the spotlight framing only his face. Only Dylan could have written this song. But Pennebaker's presentation of this performance gives you an appreciation not only of his originality and poetic acumen, but his stage presence as well.

Aside from the concert performances, the viewer is treated to behind the scenes jam sessions at the hotel room. The film includes Joan Baez beautifully singing Dylan compositions, "Love Is Just A Four Letter Word," and "Percy's Song." Also at the hotel, we see Dylan paying tribute to one of his boy-

A new face for Boston Symphony Orchestra

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP)— James Levine's installation as the music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra resembled a coronation.

Red carpet covered the sidewalk outside Symphony Hall on Friday night and much of the audience sparkled in evening gowns, jewels and dinner jackets.

A grand piece was chosen for the occasion. Mahler's Eighth, the "Symphony of a Thousand," showcasing the orchestra, its restored organ, two choruses and many of the top singers who appear with Levine at the Metropolitan Opera, where he has reigned since 1973. A champagne reception preceded the event and dinner, filled with praise and a toast, followed in a hotel ballroom nearby.

Even before the first note, the 61-year-old maestro was greeted with a 30-second standing ovation, touching his right hand to his heart in appreciation.

"What can I say to this?" Levine told the crowd during the dinner. "I love the tradition of this city."

He is the 14th music director in the orchestra's history and the first born in the United States. And he is the first new music director for the BSO since Seiji Ozawa arrived in 1973 for a run that lasted 29 years. The BSO wanted Levine so badly that it when it hired him in 2001, the orchestra agreed to wait three years for him to take over, until his contract as chief conductor of the Munich Philharmonic expired.

So now that the fanfare is over, what is the BSO getting?

A new vantage point, both for the audience and the players.

Levine immediately rearranged the orchestra's seating to the same arrangement he uses at the Met, moving the second violins from the left side to the right. Bothered by sciatica, he conducts on a chair, as he does in New York, and he cues primarily with his right hand, saving his left, which occasionally has been hampered by tremors, for big moments.

His attention to nuance was clear, right from the opening note played by James David Christie on the Aeolian-Skinner organ, built in 1947 and rebuilt over the past two years.

Performance

Smith College's John M. Greene Hall is the place to be tonight if you're in the mood for a little poetry. And this is no "open mic," mind you: celebrated author Seamus Heaney will be on hand, and you won't want to miss it.

When Heaney won the Nobel Prize in literature in 1995, the Swedish Academy was quick to point out his penchant for exposing "everyday miracles and the living past"; the New York Times has referred to Heaney as a "poet of the everyday." And, for one night only, you can call him "the Nobel Prize-winning poet standing in front of me."

Heaney goes on at 7:30 p.m.; the event is free, open to the public, and wheelchair accessible. For more information, you can contact Cindy Furtek at (413) 585-4891 or Ellen Dore Watson at (413) 585-3368.

Music

Bezanson Recital Hall will host "All Brahms" tonight, at 8 p.m. Tonight's performance, set to include pieces like "Clarinet Quintet Op. 115", "Horn Trio Op. 40" and "Viola Songs op. 91," will feature faculty members. Tickets are $3 for UMass students, $5 for other students, children and seniors, and $10 for the general public.

ThursdayOctober28

Music

Father/son jazz cooperative Joe (alto saxophone, tenor saxophone and clarinet) and Mat Maneri (violin) will bring their eclectic brand of "improvised chamber music" to Bezanson Recital Hall, tonight at 8 p.m. Their music draws on jazz, blues, classical and world music. Tickets are $5 for UMass students, $10 for the general public.

FridayOctober29

Music

Come check out the pep rally (and bonfire) tonight, at 10 p.m., alongside the campus pond (it's homecoming weekend, and the Minutemen need your support!). DJ Hypnotiq, West Entrance, and hometown heroes Cold Duck Complex will supply the tunes, so be ready to dance.

Events

"The Power of Learning" takes hold of UMass today at 9 a.m. Festivties, which will go until 12 p.m. will feature an array of exhibits in the Campus Center, including science presentations and arts performances. Students, faculty, and community members, including at least 150 school children, as well as alums back for Homecoming will get the chance to see "The Captivation of Eunice Williams" written by Professor Harley Erdman.

Also on display will be paintings, pottery, computer animation, architectural models, and other artwork by UMass Amherst students. In the Campus Center basement there will be a health fair offering mini-check-up, free hearing screenings, blood-pressure readings, and Body Mass Index tests. Also available will be free massages.

For more information see umass.edu.

Music

Don't be that guy: don't miss The Slip when they shake down Pearl Street's ballroom tonight, at 8:30 p.m. And don't be that guy who forgets to check out the opening band, either: Brooklyn's finest, a.k.a. the Benevento/Russo Duo, will rock Northampton's coolest night club just as hard (if not harder).

And the combination of both acts on one bill should be priceless (although, for $12.50 in advance and $15 at the door, you can't go wrong.)

WHAT IS IT GOOD FOR?

"The Pain of War" is an exhibition of over 60 prints, photographs, videos, and other media images. The Mead Art Museum at Amherst College will host the exhibit starting Thursday, with a reception at 4:30 p.m.

hood heroes, Hank Williams, as he sings "The Lost Highway," and "I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry."

Another of the film's many highlights occurs at the hotel room. Contemporary folk artist Donovan performs a sentimental, and embarrassingly bad song for folk legend Derroll Adams, banjoist and backup vocalist on many Jack Elliot albums. Dylan watches on restlessly, and at the song's dreadful conclusion says, with palpable sarcasm, "That's a good song man!" He then takes Donovan's guitar and plays the yet to be released classic, "It's All Over Now, Baby Blue."

The exquisite moments included in this film are too numerous to list. The interviews too show Dylan as his best, or worst, depending on your perspective. His way of speaking, his amazing use of abstract notions, is something very different than what you expect from popular musicians, or anybody for that matter.

The venue at which "Don't Look Back" was shown also adds to the film's effect. If you haven't yet attended the Academy of Music in Northampton, it is a beautiful place to watch a film. They have preserved the old theatre look, while maximizing comfort and viewing pleasure.

There are plenty of films left in the Rocktober series, so be sure to check out the listings at academyofmusicitheatre.com.

Internet may not be as safe as users think

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP)— Internet users at home are not nearly as safe online as they believe, according to a nationwide inspection by researchers. They found most consumers have no firewall protection, outdated antivirus software and dozens of spyware programs secretly running on their computers.

One beleaguered home user in the government-backed study had more than 1,000 spyware programs running on his sluggish computer when researchers examined it.

Bill Mines, a personal trainer in South Riding, Va., did not fare much better. His family's 3-year-old Dell computer was found infected with viruses and more than 600 pieces of spyware surreptitiously monitoring his online activities.

"I was blown away," Mines said. "I had a lot of viruses and other things I didn't know about. I had no idea things like this could happen."

The Internet always has had its share of risky neighborhoods and dark alleys. But with increasingly sophisticated threats from hackers, viruses, spam e-mails and spyware, trouble is finding computer users no matter how cautiously they roam online.

The technology industry is feeling the pain, too.

Spurred by the high costs of support calls from irritated customers and fearful that frustrated consumers will stop buying new products, Internet providers, software companies and computer-makers are making efforts to increase awareness of threats and provide customers with new tools to protect themselves.

Still, many computer users appear remarkably unprepared for the dangers they face.

The study being released Monday by America Online and the National Cyber Security Alliance found that 77 percent of 326 adults in 12 states assured researchers in a telephone poll they were safe from online threats. Nearly as many people felt confident they were already protected specifically from viruses and hackers.

When experts visited those same homes to examine computers, they found two-thirds of adults using antivirus software that was not updated in at least seven days.

Two-thirds of the computer users also were not using any type of protective firewall program, and spyware was found on the computers of 80 percent of those in the study.

The survey participants all were AOL subscribers selected in 22 cities and towns by an independent market analysis organization.

The alliance, a nonprofit group, is backed by the Homeland Security Department and the Federal Trade Commission, plus leading technology companies, including Cisco Systems, Microsoft, eBay and Dell.

practice." Koldahl said.

Warner thought the puck was deflected on its way to the net.

"The shot wasn't a hard shot," Warner said. "It was coming right at my chest. At the last second, they made a play in front and deflected it low, glove-side right off the post and in."

The scoring began early as Kevin Jarman was able to find some space in front of the Connecticut net and scored a power play goal on UMass' first shot of the game 51 seconds into the contest.

UConn tied that game three minutes later when J.R. Corkery set up Tim Olsen in front of the crease, and Corkery slid the puck past Warner.

The two teams struggled to get anything going offensively for the remainder of the first period and into the beginning of the second until UMass freshman David Teaderer turned the puck over in transition in the Minuteman zone. Olsen retrieved the puck off a high bounce and was able to get enough on the puck to make it roll awkwardly past Warner to give the Huskies a 2-1 lead.

"(Olsen) just chipped it right over me," Warner said. "I'm not even sure if he meant to do it."

UMass battled back with under five minutes to go in the second period when Sunnmerfield took the puck from behind the UConn net and set up an open Matt Burto at the left face off circle. Burto skated in unabated, deked UConn goalie Brad Smith and scored with a clean shot through Smith's legs to tie the score at two.

The Minutemen had a great opportunity to establish their dominant talent and take over the game in the third period when UConn defenseman James Martin was called for interference with about 14 minutes to play in regulation.

UMass had their offense set up in the Huskies' zone through a large portion of the power play, but Smith kept making save after save to keep the score tied.

With time winding down in the third period, UConn had a flurry of shots on Warner with a group of players blocking the net. The puck was then kicked out to Adam Rhein who fired a shot through the crowd, but Warner dove and sprawled out to his left to make a glove save to kill the Connecticut rally.

"It never should have even happened," Warner said. "I lost sight of the puck and thought it was under me. I looked up and saw (Rhein) winding up at the left point, and I was lucky he [shot] it there because that was the only place I could have put my glove on it."

One of the bright spots for the Minutemen was the play of Warner, who is used in rotation with goalie Gabe Winer. Warner had 33 saves in the game.

"There were a few kids who showed up and a bunch of kids who didn't," Cahoon said. "One of the kids who really showed up was our goaltender."

carries, and Ham rushed 16 times for 52 yards.

Jeff West and Jerell Jones rounded out the URI rushing attack with three and five carries for 24 and 19 yards, respectively.

After Gray's interception return staked URI to a 19-10 lead it carried into halftime, UMass pulled within two at the end of the third quarter. Using 12 rushing plays to fuel a 13-play, 71-yard drive, including eight carries by Baylark, Demers eventually found the end zone on the ground from a yard out to cut the URI lead to 19-17 just prior to the start of the fourth quarter.

Just under five minutes later, the Minutemen took their first lead of the afternoon when they capped a seven-play drive with a 39-yard touchdown pass from Day to Peebler that made the score 24-19 in favor of UMass at the 10:13 mark of the fourth quarter.

The UMass defense could not hold the lead, however, as the Rams marched 76 yards in six plays to take the 27-24 lead they would not relinquish.

"This is my fifth year here and one motto that coach Stowers has that hasn't changed is overcoming adversity," Ham said. "If you are prepared for it, when it comes your way it will still shock you a little bit, but it won't be that much of a surprise."

URI caught UMass by surprise to get on the board in the first quarter, as Davis opted to pass and found Jones alone behind the defense for a 43-yard touchdown pass just under two minutes into the game. Bryan Giannecchini's extra point failed, and URI was staked to a 6-0 lead.

The Minutemen got on the board with 2:32 remaining in the first quarter when Matt Goldstein, kicking in place of the suspended Michael Torres, connected on a 32-yard field goal to make the score 6-3.

The Rams then answered right back, as Jones capped an 11-play, 79-yard drive with a seven yard touchdown run to make the score 13-3 one minute into the second quarter.

half. The scoring chance came about when Anthony Akande took a shot from the top of the box that was blocked and controlled by Pace. In an attempt to clear, Pace tried to boot the ball out of defensive zone but ended up kicking it over the head of UMass keeper Colin Burns and into the net for an own goal at 43:51.

No Fordham player was awarded a goal for creating the score, and it was the first own goal Massachusetts has allowed thus far.

Meyer got a chance to take a lead into the break, but sailed a penalty kick wide left of the Massachusetts goal as time wound down, preserving the 1-1 tie at the half.

The Maroon and White turned up its offense after the half, out-shooting the Rams 7-2 and picking up the game winner in the 80th minute.

Freshman defender Kenneth Cook picked up his first collegiate point when he found Bullen in the 80th minute. The goal was Bullen's third point of the game and team-leading eighth goal of the season.

The UMass defense was suffocating in the second half, preventing a single shot on goal.

The Minutemen will return to action on Friday and Sunday to take on St. Bonaventure and Duquesne, respectively.

Minutewomen have mixed results at wrong time of year

After Fairweather's approaching shot from the right side was tipped away by Wynns, Roehrig seized an opportunity on the left side of the net and booted in the rebound for a 1-0 lead.

Goalie Kristin Walker was able to do the rest, thwarting away Fordham shots – even at one point making a one-handed save – to secure her third shutout of the season.

"It would have felt a lot better had we gotten those seven goals we should have," coach Jim Rudy said of the win. "It should have been 7-0 before [Roehrig] scored. I'm very pleased with the win, though. I'm glad to come away from this with some points."

Points were something the Minutewomen let slip out of their grasp on Sunday, surrendering the shutout and the lead in the last 20 minutes to the Explorers.

That isn't to say they didn't look brilliant through the first 45 minutes of play. The first half belonged to the Maroon and White, who continued to take shots at goalie Kerry Schamberger – particularly headers from cross passes – before netting one with 12 minutes left in the half.

Roehrig and Fairweather connected again, this time both contributing an assist to a beauty of a goal by Canfield. Taking a feed from Roehrig, Fairweather tipped one up to the freshman forward, who booted a roller by Schamberger across the box and into the right corner.

Shannon Plunkett's game-winner came with just 74 seconds to go.

Battering Rams

UM comeback falls short as URI scores in final minutes

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

KINGSTON, RI — The Massachusetts football team knew to expect a heavy dose of it, spent a week in preparation for it, and after a poor first half, did a solid job defending it. But at a time when they could least afford to break down against it, Rhode Island's triple option offense finally got the best of the Minutemen.

URI	24

Trailing by five with under two minutes remaining in the game, Rams' wingback Calvin Poole took advantage of blown assignments by UMass defenders to rip off runs of 24 and 34 yards that moved the ball deep into UMass territory. From there, halfback Jason Ham scampered into the end zone from 11 yards out with 1:22 remaining, and the subsequent two-point conversion gave Rhody a 27-24 win before a homecoming crowd of 4,376 at Meade Stadium.

The Maroon and White (3-5 1-4 Atlantic 10) return to action next Saturday, when they will take the field at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the first time in more than a month to host A-10 East Division rival Maine.

"I guess from the fans' perspective it would be a great game," Brown said. "We just weren't able to finish. That's the difficult thing because there are so many things you can point to in the game and say, 'Well, if this didn't happen.'"

"We came out and had 14 unanswered points in the third and fourth quarter, but we weren't able to finish. It's disappointing to battle hard for that long and come up empty in the end."

A week after playing well in leading his team to 38 points in a win over No. 7 New Hampshire, quarterback Tim Day returned to the shaky form that he often showed during UMass' four game losing streak.

The junior signal caller was 18-of-33 for 230 yards and two touchdowns, but was victimized by four interceptions, including one that was returned 30 yards for a touchdown by URI's (4-3 2-2 A-10) Virgil Gray in the first half, and took a critical sack on UMass' final drive.

"It's a growing experience for him," Brown said of Day. "Obviously you'd like him to throw it away and not take the damn sack, that's for sure."

Gray, meanwhile, raised the issue of what has become a disturbing habit for UMass' first-year quarterback.

"From watching tape, we knew [Day] always looks at who he is going to throw the ball to," Gray said. "I saw him looking right at his receiver the whole time, and I just broke on the ball."

Junior tailback Steve Baylark had his second consecutive outstanding effort for UMass, carrying 26 times for 138 yards. Senior fullback Rich Demers also chipped in with nine carries for 42 yards and a touchdown, while catching his first touchdown pass of the season as well.

Another bright spot for the Minutemen was the play of senior captain Jason Peebler, who overcame a pair of early drops to snag six passes for 96 yards and a 39-yard touchdown catch that gave UMass the lead in the fourth quarter.

"I thought it was a great A-10 football game," Rhode Island coach Tim Stowers said. "They took the lead on the road, then our football team found a way to come back and win the game. There were a lot of big plays in that game."

As advertised, Stowers' Rams relied on their ground game to grind away at a young and banged up UMass defense. After torching the Maroon and White for 125 rushing yards in the first quarter, UMass buckled down on defense and held the Rams to under 100 yards in the second half and 294 yards on the game.

Quarterback Jayson Davis completed only four passes for 81 yards and a touchdown and carried 11 times for 63 yards. Wingback Chad Campbell led URI with 69 yards on 12 carries while Poole chipped in with 68 yards on eight

Minutemen shocked at home by previously winless UConn

By Jeff Howe

In a game that never should have been close after the first period, the Connecticut hockey team (1-2-1) came into the Mullins Center yesterday and shocked Massachusetts 3-2 in the closing seconds of overtime in front of a crowd of 2,038 people.

UConn	3
UMass	2

The Minutemen (3-2-0, 1-0-0 Hockey East) may have come into the game with a little too much confidence since they are from the superior Hockey East while UConn plays in the lesser-known Atlantic Hockey League.

"If you keep showing up at these games against opponents that are non-league opponents thinking that just because you're in Hockey East and the game is just going to swing your way, sooner or later, you're going to get what you deserve," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

Regardless of the two teams' origins, UMass let the Huskies stick around for far too long, and they suffered the upset as a consequence. It was also the first time that UConn has ever defeated UMass at the Mullins Center.

"We would have been satisfied with a tie in the sense that we really did have a tough week at practice," UConn coach Bruce Marshall conceded.

With 4.7 seconds to play in overtime, UConn center Chris Uber won the face off in the UMass zone to Tim Olsen who gave it to Cole Koidahl as he skated around behind the circle. Koidahl fired a shot to the net that made it through several players, hit the post and bounced in past goalie Tim Warner.

"It's a play that we work on a few times everyday in

Rough weekend may hurt playoff chances

By Bob McGovern and Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team came out of the past weekend with a win, a loss and surmounting questions on where it will be when the postseason arrives.

The Minutemen (7-7-2, 4-4-2 Atlantic 10), who were slated at third in the Atlantic 10 before this weekend, defeated Fordham (3-10-2, 1-5-2 A-10) on Friday, 1-0 in the Bronx. UMass couldn't follow suit yesterday and fell 2-0 at LaSalle (8-6-1, 4-4-0 A-10), dropping the Minutemen to fifth in the A-10.

UMass and the Explorers played an even first half on both sides of the ball, however, neither was able to capitalize on offensive opportunities. Combined, the teams had nine shots on goal, but both keepers were able to thwart these opportunities, sending the game scoreless into the half.

The outcome of the game was, however, influenced in the waning minutes of the half.

With 8:19 remaining in the period, sophomore Ralph Pace received a red card and was ejected from the game. With this, the Minutemen were forced to play the rest of the game a man down, hence opening opportunities for LaSalle for the rest of the game.

The Explorers were first able to capitalize on Pace's absence 15 minutes into the second half. LaSalle's Dusan Vujovic blasted a shot at UMass keeper Nick Billman, who was able to deflect the shot. Ryan Mosely rebounded the ball and knocked the game's first goal home. The goal was Mosely's fifth of the season.

The score stayed at 1-0 until the 84th minute when, once again, Mosely was able to find a seam in the Minutemen defense. Mosely passed the ball up to Ryan Dogherty who plowed a shot past Billman, solidifying LaSalle's victory.

Despite giving up two goals, Nick Billman had one of his best performances of the season. With the added pressure of being a man down, the Explorers shot count skyrocketed in the second half. Billman was able to respond and had a career-high 10 saves in the contest.

With the loss, UMass continues to have troubles on the road, falling to 2-4-2 overall on the season.

After 13 minutes of defensive play, Kevin Meyer of Fordham rang the game's first shot off the crossbar. The Rams out-shot Massachusetts 8-4 in the first half and forced Minuteman goalie Colin Burns to make his only two saves of the game.

UMass started the scoring when sophomore Ralph Pace took an outside shot that found its way past Fordham goalie Stephen Faber to the top left corner of the net at 14:19. Captain Oral Bullen was credited with an assist for dropping the pass back to Pace.

Fordham responded with less than two minutes to play in the first

Mixed results put UMass in a tough position late in season

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's soccer team came home for their final two home games of the season with a sense of urgency never felt before. There was a fire in their eyes that glistened with great brightness. But when they walked off Rudd Field yesterday, their faces were much like the weather– cold and heartbroken.

LaSalle	2

Yesterday's 2-1 loss to the LaSalle Explorers (9-6-2, 5-4-0 Atlantic 10) capped off a wild weekend for the Minutewomen (6-9-0, 4-5-0 A-10), who started off Friday with a 1-0 upset of the Fordham Rams (8-4-2, 3-4-1 A-10).

With under 20 minutes to go in Sunday's contest and the Minutewomen leading 1-0 in a crucial contest that may very well decide the A-10 Tournament brackets, the Maroon and White collapsed under the pressure of a rallying LaSalle squad and now are staring elimination straight in the face.

With the loss, UMass is in a must-win situation. That is, if they are to play on their home field again in 2004 (they host the A-10 Tournament November 4-7), they must win their final two games on the road.

Things sure didn't seem that way on Friday when the Minutewomen knocked off the physically dominant Rams. Having tallied upsets against similar teams in Central Connecticut State and George Washington, the Maroon and White arrived at its field confident they could take on a team that in itself was cocky and very large.

"We had the heart," freshman Jenny Roehrig said. "We came in here, and we wanted to win, and it happened."

Despite being greatly outsized, UMass was able to make troubles for goalie Julie Wynns for most of the game. The Minutewomen came close to reaching the back of the net on multiple occasions in the first, the nearest miss coming from senior Lindsey "Stormy" Fairweather's dart off the left post with ten minutes left.

The second half began with more of the same hitting and missing, this time coming from Fordham, who took the first five shots of the half. But with 20 minutes remaining, the Minutewomen finally broke through on the feet of Roehrig.

Health officials receive more queries on flu vaccine issue than on anthrax

By Karen Testa
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Questions from the public about the flu vaccine shortage have outnumbered any other public health concern in recent years, including the anthrax scares that followed the Sept. 11 terror attacks, the state's public health commissioner said Monday.

The Department of Public Health has installed 75 new telephone lines with recorded information about the flu vaccine and hired 18 telephone operators to field questions, Commissioner Christine Ferguson said during a legislative hearing of the Joint Committee on Health Care.

"We probably have more concern and interest expressed in this than any other single issue that we've faced in quite a few years, including the anthrax," Ferguson said.

This year, the nation is only getting about half the 100 million flu shots it had expected for the current flu season because one of two primary vaccine suppliers, Chiron Corp., had contamination problems at a British factory.

The United States has no stockpile of vaccine, which have a shelf-life of less than a year. Also, they cannot be mass-produced quickly since they are made from hen eggs and require six months to make.

Massachusetts had ordered 655,000 doses of the vaccine, but will have to make do instead with 429,000 doses. In a normal year, about 1 million people — high risk and healthy — seek flu vaccines.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Tech Heather Kent works at the Aventis Pasteur facility that manufactures the flu vaccine. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has 429,000 doses this year.

Earlier this month, Ferguson issued an order limiting vaccination to people in high-risk categories and requiring all health care providers, hospitals, pharmacies and others authorized to prescribe, dispense and administer the flu vaccine to report the number of flu vaccine doses they have in stock.

Ferguson said the state would be issuing plans for distributing the public supply in the next two weeks, to complement the plans for private distribution.

Sen. Richard Moore, D-Uxbridge, co-chairman of the health care committee, said a country as wealthy and advanced as the United States should not be causing this level of concern among its citizens, and that federal officials must change the way they plan for and purchase vaccines.

Kerry slams Bush as a poor commander-in-chief

By David Espo
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Sen. John Kerry cited the war in Iraq Monday as proof President Bush has "failed the test of being commander in chief." The Republican slammed his rival as "consistently and dangerously wrong" on national security matters.

In a race of ever-escalating rhetoric, the president also accused the Democratic challenger of "the worst kind of Monday-morning quarterbacking" on the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. But he fell silent on the disappearance of 377 tons of high explosives in Iraq, leaving it to aides to explain.

Polls in the major battleground states were so close that both camps had cause for optimism — and room for doubt. And with only eight days to go, there were signs that the field of competition might be widening.

Democrats fretted about Hawaii and made plans to advertise to voters in the state that has never backed a Republican for president.

Polls showed a tightening race in Arkansas, a state the president won four years ago and the Democrats had virtually given up for lost this time. The president's high command was concerned, as well, about New Hampshire, in Bush's column four years ago, trending Kerry's way in the race's final days.

Long-planned events blended with the unexpected in a campaign already marked by unpredictability.

Former President Clinton joined Kerry at a noontime rally in Philadelphia that drew tens of thousands. "If this isn't good for my heart, I don't know what is," Clinton said, looking thinner seven weeks after bypass surgery.

Supreme Court officials announced that Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, 80, is undergoing treatment for thyroid cancer and is expected to return to work next week. The statement served as a reminder that the next president is likely to have more than one appointment to an aging court that is divided on abortion, gay rights and more.

Word of the disappearance of explosives from a military installation in Iraq was like a campaign gift to Kerry, and he quickly put it to use.

Failure to secure the material was "one of the great blunders of Iraq, one of the great blunders of this administration," the four-term Massachusetts senator said in New Hampshire, his first campaign stop of the day.

"Terrorists could use this material to kill our troops, our people, blow up our airplanes and level buildings."

"... The unbelievable blindness, stubbornness, arrogance of this administration to do the basics has now allowed this president to once again fail the test of being the commander in chief," Kerry said.

Bush gave as good as he got. "On Iraq, my opponent has a strategy of pessimism and retreat," he said in Greeley, Colo. That was mere warmup, though.

He accused Kerry of "throwing out the wild claim that he knows where Osama bin Laden was in the fall of 2001 — and that our military had a chance to get him in Tora Bora."

That was a reference to Kerry's frequent assertion that the administration "outsourced" the job of hunting down bin Laden to Afghan warlords.

"This is an unjustified and harsh criticism of our military commanders in the field," Bush said. "This is the worst kind of Monday-morning quarterbacking."

Beyond Iraq, Bush cited Kerry's opposi-

Chief Justice Rehnquist hospitalized with cancer

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist has thyroid cancer that has temporararily sidelined the conservative anchor of the Supreme Court and injected into the presidential campaign the issue of appointments to the most important legal panel in America.

Rehnquist's diagnosis was announced Monday in a terse statement by the Supreme Court. It said the 80-year-old widower underwent a tracheotomy over the weekend and was hospitalized but expected to be back at work next week when the court resumes hearing cases.

Left unsaid was Rehnquist's condition at the National Naval Medical Center in suburban Bethesda, Md., and which type of thyroid cancer he has. About 23,600 people develop various types of thyroid cancer each year in the United States. Most types are considered treatable, but many variables exist including age and how quickly the cancer is found.

Rehnquist's hospitalization gave new prominence to a campaign issue that has been overshadowed by the war on terror. The next president probably will name one or more justices to a court that has been deeply divided in recent years on issues as varied as abortion and the 2000 election itself. President Bush won that after the Supreme Court issued a key 5-4 decision in his favor, with Rehnquist as part of the majority.

The last court vacancy was in 1994, the longest stretch of continuity in modern history. Only one of the court's nine members, — Clarence Thomas, appointed by former President Bush — is under 65.

"The Supreme Court has always been in play. This will just increase the salience," said Nelson Polsby, a political science professor at the University of California, Berkeley, and coauthor of "Presidential Elections."

Rehnquist, a conservative named to the court in 1972 by President Nixon and elevated to chief justice by President Reagan in 1986, has had a series of health problems, including chronic back pain and a 2002 torn leg tendon that required surgery.

He was admitted to the hospital Friday and doctors performed the tracheotomy on Saturday. During that procedure, a tube is inserted into the patient's throat, either to relieve a breathing obstruction or as preparation for surgery. The court did not explain why the procedure was done on Rehnquist.

Edward Lazarus, a Los Angeles attorney and former Supreme Court clerk, said the secrecy was not surprising.

"The court doesn't appreciate being at the center of the political storm. It's an uncomfortable situation," he said.

Rehnquist is among the fiercest questioners during oral arguments. Dr. Herman Kattlove of the American Cancer Society said Rehnquist should be able to speak normally after the breathing tube is removed from his throat.

Three other members of the high court have had bouts with cancer. Justice John Paul Stevens, the oldest at 84, was treated for prostate cancer. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor had breast cancer and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg colon cancer.

Rehnquist turned 80 this month. The only older chief justice was Roger Taney, who presided over the high court in the mid-1800s until his death at 87.

White House press secretary Scott McClellan said President Bush and first lady Laura Bush "wish Chief Justice Rehnquist a speedy recovery." Democratic challenger John Kerry did not comment.

Rehnquist is a smoker known as a stern and efficient taskmaster at the court and a fierce competitor on the tennis court and at the poker table. In recent months his tennis is said to have been replaced with walks.

He has defied retirement rumors, even as some observers of the court have wondered aloud whether his conservative legacy — empowering states, limiting abortion and preserving the death penalty — might have run its course.

Rebel infiltrators may be cause of 50 soldier deaths say officials

By Robert H. Reid
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Iraqi officials suspect that about 50 U.S.-trained Iraqi soldiers slain by insurgents may have been set up by rebel infiltrators in their ranks.

Jordanian terrorist Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's group claimed responsibility for the weekend attack, the deadliest ambush of the 18-month insurgency. The claim was posted Sunday on an Islamist Web site but its authenticity could not be confirmed.

On Monday, a suicide car bomber attacked a U.S. convoy in Khaldiyah, a town about 50 miles west of the capital, destroying at least two Humvees. Police said there were American casualties, but the number was not immediately known. The U.S. military had no immediate comment.

In Baghdad, a car bomb targeting an Australian military convoy exploded near the Australian Embassy, killing three Iraqis and wounding eight others, including three Australian soldiers, according to Iraqi and Australian officials.

Al-Zarqawi's group also claimed responsibility for that attack in a statement posted on an Islamic Web site Monday. It was impossible to verify the claim's authenticity.

"The mission will still be able to carry out its task," Australian Defense Force spokesman Brig. Mike Hannan told reporters in the capital of Canberra.

A separate roadside bomb killed one American soldier and wounded five others in western Baghdad.

An Estonian soldier was killed during an ambush Monday while patrolling outside the Iraqi capital, according to Marko Mihkelson, chairman of the Estonian parliament's Foreign Affairs committee. Several other Estonians were believed to have been wounded, but the nature of their injuries was unknown.

The soldier was the second to die this year from Estonia, which has 45 soldiers in Iraq.

The 50 unarmed Iraqi soldiers were killed on their way home after completing a training course at the Kirkush military camp northeast of Baghdad when their buses were stopped Saturday evening by rebels about 95 miles east of Baghdad, Interior Ministry spokesman Adnan Abdul-Rahman said.

Vatican denies trying to influence election with book

By Frances D'Emilio
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY (AP) — A Vatican handbook released Monday laid out Roman Church teaching questioning preventive war and denouncing the "horrendous crime" of abortion. But Vatican officials sidestepped questions on whether the war in Iraq was illegal or if Catholics can vote for candidates who back laws permitting abortion.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls quickly intervened at a news conference when a top Vatican cardinal was asked if the faithful can cast ballots for a candidate who supports legalized abortion. "The Holy See never gets involved in electoral or political questions directly," he said.

Sen. John Kerry, the Democratic presidential candidate, is a Catholic who has said that while personally opposed to abortion, he upholds the right of women to have one.

Pope John Paul II has vigorously championed the Vatican's long-standing opposition to abortion, which was denounced as a "horrendous crime" in the Vatican document released Monday.

"Far from being a right, it is a sad phenomenon," it said.

Red Sox nation sets no boundaries for fans

BOSTON (AP) — It's 5 a.m. in Tashkent, Uzbekistan. Most people are either sleeping or groggily rubbing their eyes as they get ready for work, but Ric Gliub and his friends have their game faces on.

Red Sox fans celebrate earlier this month in a bar in downtown Boston.

It's October, and the Boston Red Sox are in the playoffs, looking for the team's first World Series championship since 1918. The five members of the Tashkent Red Sox Fan Club, clutching their tea or coffee — or if it's a weekend game, a bottle of Russian beer — don't want to miss a pitch.

"We have seen the sun come up in Tashkent many times over the past couple of weeks," Glaub, an Idaho native who developed an affection for the Red Sox while working in Boston during the 1980s, said in an e-mail interview. "Except on weekends, and even sometimes on weekends, most of us have to begin work as soon as the games end. Most Americans working here tend to put in long hours and watching these games takes away from already limited sleep time. We can have it no other way.

"As Red Sox fans everywhere are saying, we can sleep in November," he said.

Across the United States and across the world, Red Sox fans are pushing decades of heartache into the deepest recesses of their minds and praying that this is the year they finally get to celebrate winning it all.

Some U.S. churchmen, such as St. Louis Archbishop Raymond Burke, have said Kerry should be denied the sacrament of Communion.

Navarro-Valls said bishops could, if they desired, weigh in on campaign issues to "illuminate the consciences of the faithful with ethical elements so they can make a judgment" in elections.

Officials at the news conference described the 524-page compilation of doctrine as a kind of handbook, which could help business, political and cultural leaders.

Appearing to break no new ground, the volume quoted extensively from, and offered reflections on, writings and speeches by Pope John Paul II and previous pontiffs on matters including preventive war, terrorism, the death penalty, immigration, workers' rights, poverty, globalization, free markets and human rights.

Under the heading "legitimate defense," the compendium stated, "engaging in a preventive war without clear proof that an attack is imminent cannot fail to raise serious moral and juridical questions."

Arguing that the war in Iraq was necessary, the Bush administration said in the run-up to the conflict that Iraq harbored weapons of mass destruction. No such weapons have turned up.

In apparent reference to the United Nations, the document said "international legitimacy for the use of armed forces, on the basis of rigorous assessment and with well-founded motivations, can only be given by the decision of a competent body that identifies specific situations as threats to peace and authorizes an intrusion into the sphere of autonomy usually reserved for a state."

The former Vatican envoy to the United Nations, Cardinal Renato Martino, was asked if "in hindsight," the U.S.-led war against Iraq would be "illegal" in the eyes of the church.

The cardinal replied: "Did you read the address of the pope to President Bush? Read it again."

Martino was referring to the pontiff's words to Bush when the American leader paid a call at the Vatican last June. In that address, John Paul expressed "grave concern" about events in Iraq and his desire for achievement of "normalization as quickly as possible."

tion to the first Persian Gulf War, his proposal for cuts in the intelligence budget in 1994 and his position on former President Reagan's defense buildup in the 1980s.

Together, they show that "on the largest national security issues of our time, he has been consistently and dangerously wrong."

White House spokesman Scott McClellan sought to allay concern over the threat posed by 377 tons of explosives missing from the Al Qaqaa military installation.

He told reporters no nuclear material was involved, and gave reporters an accounting of weapons found, not those lost.

"We have destroyed more than 243,000 munitions," he said. "We've secured another nearly 163,000 that will be destroyed."

At the Pentagon, an official who monitors developments in Iraq said U.S.-led coalition troops had searched Al Qaqaa in the immediate aftermath of the March 2003 invasion and confirmed that the explosives were intact. Thereafter the site was not secured by U.S. forces, the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

With the race in its final full week, the pace of the campaigning picked up — as did the involvement of the courts.

Kerry campaigned from New Hampshire to Wisconsin during the day by way of Pennsylvania and Michigan. Aides mapped a plan for a 72-hour marathon leading to Election Day.

Bush went from his ranch in Texas to Colorado, Iowa and Wisconsin as he sought the 270 electoral votes needed for a second term.

The pace of legal maneuvering was picking up, as well, as both parties anticipated a close finish.

In Florida, U.S. District Judge James I. Cohn ruled the state is not required to create a paper record of ballots to be available in case of a recount. In somewhat of an understatement, Cohn said the case "is of great public importance," and promised to issue a written order quickly to permit an appeal.

Cingular cleared to create largest wireless company

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Justice Department antitrust regulators cleared the way Monday for Cingular Wireless LLC's $41 billion acquisition of AT&T Wireless Services Inc., a crucial step toward creating the nation's largest wireless telephone company.

The merger still must be approved by the Federal Communications Commission. That approval could come as early as Tuesday.

Under an agreement with the Justice Department filed in federal court in Washington, Cingular must divest itself of assets in 11 states.

"Without these divestitures, wireless customers in these markets would have had fewer choices for their wireless telephone service and faced the risk of higher prices, lower quality service and fewer choices for the newest high-speech mobile wireless data services," said R. Hewitt Pate, assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Cingular Wireless LLC is working to acquire AT&T Wireless services.

Cingular is an Atlanta-based joint venture of BellSouth Corp. and SBC Communications Inc. of San Antonio. Its acquisition of Redmond, Wash.-based AT&T Wireless would create a cellular phone colossus with 46 million customers, topping the 37.5 million customers of Verizon Wireless and pairing the number of national wireless phone players to five.

Riots hamper times of celebration

It was bound to happen.

The last few weeks have been a turbulent sea of emotions for fans of the Boston Red Sox. The highs of the American League Divisional Series, the lows of the first three games of the AL Championship Series, and finally the great joys of the last four games of that series, in which the Red Sox pulled off unprecedented feats in overcoming the New York Yankees for their first trip to the World Series since 1986. The passion of Red Sox fans, which manifests itself in many different ways, has been on full-tilt over the last two weeks, and with good reason.

But there is a line between joyous passion and reckless, fatal violence. That line became as clear as the October air on Thursday, when in the wee hours of the morning, a 21-year old Emerson College student suffered a fatal wound while participating in the raucous celebration in Boston following the Red Sox upset victory.

Victoria Snelgrove was a big Sox fan. According to The Boston Globe, friends say she "always worked hard to accomplish the goals she set for herself, and in doing so she inspired others to work hard as well. ... Her absence will cause a void which will never be filled." But that wonderful life, full of potential and inspiration, ended for all the wrong reasons, laid out on a cold sidewalk in the city.

The blame ended up squarely on the shoulders of the Boston Police, because one officer used what was supposed to be a less-than-lethal weapon to disperse the crowd, but ended up hitting Snelgrove in the head. She later died from her injuries, putting a pall over what should be the biggest, best celebration this region has ever seen. The Boston Police took a huge public relations hit, but the real damage was done to the people of New England, specifically those who call themselves Red Sox fans.

Some will blame the Boston Police for Snelgrove's death. Some may even be so callous as to suggest that it was all her fault for being in the wrong place at the wrong time. But the fault falls squarely on the shoulders of those who made it necessary for the police to be out in riot gear and use such dangerous crowd-control measures: the rampaging hooligans who turned the rally into a riot.

This would all be academic if not for the cold, hard fact that has not yet been realized; and if it continues to be ignored, the next tragedy might come right here to the University of Massachusetts. This was one person among many. One fan among many. One individual who went out into a situation where people were acting maliciously, violently, and destructively — so much so that the Boston cops had to quell the people of their own city — because of a game.

The lesson must be learned: the behavior exhibited by some people both in Boston and here at UMass, the behavior which falls under the category of "riotous," must end here and now. The riots that have become a staple of the UMass culture are nothing but a disgrace to our school and further, a disgrace to every student who currently attends or formerly attended it.

There is no argument from those who engage in riotous behavior that could come even close to defending the reprehensible actions of the past few weeks. Setting objects on fire, trying to tip over cars and trucks, and further destruction done to the environment around us has absolutely nothing to do with being a fan of a baseball team. For about 15-30 minutes after each game, it is a celebration, an expression of joy and unity. But once things are set ablaze, once someone attempts to destroy something, it is no longer about the Boston Red Sox. It is about an irresponsible, self-serving desire to show off, to take out frustrations on the least relevant targets, to be completely senseless without the fear of retribution.

The first few moments of celebration that take place after a big win are fun to see. A large group of people, some of whom may never have met each other, slapping hands and cheering for a common cause. It is pure, unchecked joy. And for the moment, it is innocent. But we have seen after both New England Patriots Super Bowl wins, one late-season win over the Yankees, and nearly every win over New York this postseason, that innocence doesn't last long, and the joyous exultation of pride soon becomes meaningless, destructive chaos.

In the end, this is all about a word that you just read: pride. Red Sox fans are some of the proudest in baseball. They are proud of their team, and proud of their allegiance. The Red Sox themselves are proud of their fans. Similarly, many of us here at UMass are proud of this school, its culture, its community, and its tremendous opportunities.

What has happened here after the ALCS games is the antithesis of pride. The destruction of property, the disrespect shown to police officers, and the general nonsense that took place lasted longer than any celebratory efforts, and it trumped them too. Despite what some may say, they are totally unconnected to the idea of being a fan. Those who run out into a crowd and start causing havoc are no longer fans, but criminals and a disgrace to those of us who simply enjoy the game.

We may be on the verge of history, of one of the biggest events to happen in New England in 100 years. Consider this a plea from the Massachusetts Daily Collegian — not as a newspaper, but as a group of your fellow proud UMass students — to change the trend, to make whatever comes out of the playoffs this week a joyful, good-hearted, and wholly prideful event. Nothing as positive as a Red Sox victory — anytime — should be marred by the caustic actions of a few. Please stay safe this week, and continue to uphold the proud traditions of Red Sox fans and UMass students.

Creating culture, erasing history

Yousef Munayyer

Driving down the road I noticed cacti in open fields lined up in such a manner that would make one question the intentions of God when he had put them there. The reality, though, is that these cacti were placed in a row not by God, but by the hands of Palestinian farmers and landowners.

Cactus lines were used as boarders between lands. Today, as you drive through what is called Israel, you will see many open fields with the occasional cactus row. Perhaps at first glance it will not mean a thing to you, but to me, and others who know why the cacti stand in a line, it means the last remnants of a society erased: Palestine before 1948.

Perhaps you will see some stones in an open field surrounded by the cacti and wonder, is this what is left of a house, a store, a farm? Maybe this was a meeting place, a church or a mosque. Perhaps you will wonder who lived in the village that was here, and you may even wonder what happened to those people. Where did they go, what homes replaced theirs that have been destroyed, how did they survive?

Though I know the answers to these questions, I still stare at cactus rows in awe at a society that existed only until it was erased from the map and from history. Even though the cactus rows may be the only things left from many of the villages in Palestine, there is one thing that the Palestinians have that the state of Israel and its supporters attempt to mimic and create: a cultural connection with the land rooted in the history of past millennia.

If you're wondering what this is about, it is simple; it is the phenomenon of "Israeli culture." This can lead us in many directions. Logically you may ask, what is culture? This is a question I cannot answer, because culture is a vague term that everyone understands but no one can precisely define. The next question, then, may be what constitutes Israeli culture. As a citizen of Israel, I have wondered this myself.

Israel is in some ways a melting pot of different backgrounds. Jews from many nations in Europe immigrated there within the past century, including a late, but significant, wave of Russian immigrants. Jews from Arab countries also came to Israel. However, if culture derives from a history within a certain location, how would that reflect on Israeli culture if there were relatively no Jews there before the 1880s?

I do not think hummus has a national identity; however it certainly was present in the area prior to waves of European Jewish immigration and the creation of the state of Israel. So why is it portrayed this way?

A nation, the Jewish nation, which has a very long history, moves to a state (a territorial entity) to which it has had nearly no connection for 2000 years. One would think that the culture, or the identity of the state, would revolve around that ancient connection (the flag does display the Star of David). This is not the case, though: modern Israeli culture is portrayed as something totally different. In fact, you may see signs around campus telling you to come enjoy Israeli hookah, or Israeli hummus, or Israeli falafel. The question then becomes, how are these things traditionally Israeli, and if they are not, why are they being portrayed as such?

I do not think hummus has a national identity; it certainly was present, however, in the area prior to waves of European, Jewish immigration and the creation of the state of Israel. So why is it portrayed this way?

This brings us back to the cacti. The effort to portray Israeli culture as "Middle Eastern" (which hints at being Arab) is not an effort at assimilation as some may assume. Assimilation is a process of moving and mixing into a community to which you are new.

Rather, this is an attempt to create the idea that Israel is not new at all, that it has had a culture rooted in the land, and that it is as "Middle Eastern" as Syria, Saudi Arabia, or Egypt.

At the same time, this effort to create a culture attempts to erase the reality of history. The Palestinians, who owned the land, farmed it and lived on it, are being erased from history and are not permitted to enter the Israeli psyche. The policies of "education" within Israel reflect this very selective memory. Perhaps the most striking evidence of a society erased is not the cacti, but rather the names on the graves, which fill Arab cemeteries. Arab family names appear on crypts, which became the final resting places for generations upon generations dating back hundreds of years.

If any of those who had passed away could be around today, they could tell you what eating hummus in Jerusalem tasted like long before the forefathers of Zionism were born.

What feminism really says

Moms these days just get no love.

Case in point is Teresa Heinz Kerry once again speaking before thinking when explaining how she was different from current First Lady Laura Bush.

"But I don't know that she's ever had a real job – I mean, since she's been grown up. So her experience and her validation comes from important things, but different things," said Heinz Kerry.

Zach Oelshlegel

Naturally Teresa apologized for her mistake when later informed that Mrs. Bush had been both a teacher and librarian back in her heyday. But to the joy of the Bush pundits, she looked even more foolish by not mentioning anything about Laura Bush being a mother of two.

Karen Hughes, a Bush advisor, later remarked that Heinz Kerry's apology "made it worse because she left out the very important real job of a mother. Clearly she knows Laura Bush was a mother who chose to stay home and rear her family. That's a noble choice that should be celebrated not denigrated."

Of course, no feminst will ever tell you this, but what feminism has caused in our society today is the embarrassment that comes with being a "homemaker."

Most would chalk up Teresa's latest slip-up to her outspoken demeanor, since it certainly isn't the first time she's gone overboard when dealing with questions from the media. On the other hand, I think it's a product of something bigger.

I'm going to blame it on feminism.

By being stuck on the idea of equal pay for the same job, feminism has destroyed the concept of somebody being a stay-at-home Mom because she actually wants to. Of course, no feminist will ever tell you this, but what feminism has caused in our society today is the embarrassment that comes with being a "homemaker." No matter what the context or situation brings, the woman who brings home the bacon beats the mother of four every time.

Feminism has done a great deal for our country, no doubt about it. But it has evolved from once attempting to release women from a completely male-dominated society to attempting to convince women that they are better than men. Feminists will deny this, too, but there's a subtle difference between what feminism says versus what feminism does.

Teresa Heinz Kerry forgetting that being a Mom is a real job, even though the pay isn't all that good, is the perfect example. Every honor that comes with bearing children or raising them has been stripped by feminism. The joy a person receives from raising one hell of a kid apparently pales in comparison to getting one hell of a raise.

Feminism has told women that in order to be truly equal with men, they have to do exactly as men have in the past. They have to try to work themselves to the top and take care of the kids, because women are not only as capable as men, they are better than men. What matters isn't bringing up a family, even if that was a primary goal in life, but closing that gap in wages between men and women. It sets the stage for unreasonable burdens that many women might not want to shoulder but feel they must.

It almost seems like a shock when a woman chooses to stay home. The idea of a woman finally being "liberated" from the rigors of working at home and then using that freedom to stay where they were is like a slap in the face.

Feminism goes wrong in how it looks at equality. It too often assumes that the people from Venus and Mars are duplicates, with any biological differences being negligible. It tries to make sure that men and women never play different roles, seemingly hating men for not having to ever bear children and regarding prospects of motherhood as a curse rather than a blessing. At the mere mention of playing a role, a feminist will shudder, ignoring biological differences and common sense.

This common sense, despite how politically incorrect it sounds, is the same reason for why I would prefer a man next to me in combat if I were in a war as it is for why the person I will go looking for when I want to have kids will be named Jane, not Chuck.

And it all seems to boil down to taking the same role as a man. Women need to fight wars, be the executive manager, and make sure that they don't put themselves into situations where they could be perceived as the weaker sex. It is not okay for women to return to that place from whence they were freed. Feminism has caused the women who choose to stay at home to feel like they are doing something anybody could do, when it truly is one of the more special things in this life that many people are not capable of. This wasn't Teresa Heinz Kerry not using her head, but the result of a society that doesn't give respect where it's due.

Bring on the draft

The campaign promise has become the campaign threat. Both candidates have honed their own rhetorical method of linking a vote for their opponent with fatal consequences: as the Bush/Cheney camp continues to imply an increased likelihood of a terrorist attack if John Kerry is elected, the Senator from Massachusetts has now stated outright that a vote for Bush is a vote for conscription.

Mike Sances

While political campaigns are never for the faint of heart, the current fear-mongering is sickening indeed.

Nevertheless, one could argue that Senator Kerry is only giving voice to a fear that has been on many young minds for some time. The military is, as we all know, currently stretched to its limits. Both candidates remain unrepentant toward their support for the Iraq war, while President Bush cheerfully assures us he will "stay on the offense" if he is reelected.

Indeed, despite Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's steadfast assurances of the sufficiency of an all-volunteer army, the President's repeated denials that he wants or needs a draft, and the recent House vote that tore to shreds Charlie Rangel's conscription bill, the D-word remains on the tip of the national tongue.

But I will argue that those in power fear a draft just as much as the American public, if not more so — and that if they don't, then they very well should.

I will argue that those in power fear a draft as much as the American public, if not more so- and that if they don't, then they very well should.

There is a saying for those who fail to learn from the mistakes of history, and one of the biggest mistakes in American history was, of course, the Vietnam War. While a draft today may or may not inspire the same level of cultural upheaval that occurred in the 1960s and '70s, it would undoubtedly fan the flames of dissent so as to make things very uncomfortable for those at the top. It doesn't take a genius to observe that the primary reason for why the Iraq war was so successfully sold to the public, why such a miserable job was done scrutinizing the Bush administration's flimsy justifications, was that most people simply did not have any real stake in it.

Asking people whether they wouldn't mind having their televisions and newspapers plastered with images from a war on the other side of the globe and asking them whether they wouldn't mind sacrificing themselves or their children for that war are two very different things. The equation is simple: a draft equals widespread political unrest.

It is also a sure cure for civic apathy, one of the most effective ways to ensure a more economically diverse military, and a probable death sentence for the children of many members of Congress. Those who oppose the war will resist, taking to the streets, while those who choose to go and fight (if they survive, God willing) will inevitably come back jaded and resentful. Sooner or later, the majority of the country will come to detest war and to hate those who led us into it.

For these commonsense reasons, I highly doubt that anyone in Washington wants a draft anytime soon. Still, events remain largely unpredictable. If something disastrous were to happen — say, if Israel were to launch a preventive strike against Iran — the President, whoever he may be, might have no choice.

Yet for similar reasons, I'm not too worried about that, either. I don't fear the draft, because I am secure enough in my opposition to the Iraq war and any possible wars with Iran or North Korea to know that I absolutely will not fight for them. And I have no qualms about this whatsoever, moral or otherwise. Trust me: I will find a way.

That's not to say that I'm hoping for war; the war, of course, is already here. Nor am I hoping to see young men and women kill and be killed; yet this, too, is already happening. I have opposed the war since before it began, and I truly hate it with every ounce of my being. Moreover, I am not the one who is going to draft you. And I am not the one in charge of your own personal decision as to whether you go and fight if drafted: despite what you may think, it's your choice.

Indeed, I find the current discourse on this issue depressingly fatalistic. Some professors seem to be having fun spooking students with the idea of a draft, winking as they recount their own deferments during Vietnam. Students, for their part, respond to the idea of conscription with a marked sense of powerlessness — fear and anger, yes, but an ultimate resignation toward their perceived fate. For these, I have more pity than sympathy.

I maintain it is highly unlikely a draft is coming. But if there are, in fact, some in Washington flirting with the political suicide that a draft would entail, then I say to them, without fear, "Bring it on!"

Stars pay tribute to music legend

By Lindsey Flynn
Collegian Correspondent

Friday night, a spectacular tribute to the late musician Ray Charles captured his brilliance and displayed [illegible] over so many.

CBS presented "Genius: A Night for Ray Charles," a [illegible] the entertainer hosted by actor Jamie Foxx. Foxx also plays Charles in an upcoming film entitled "Ray." The event was held at the Staple Center in Los Angeles and was aired on Friday at 9 p.m.

Throughout the night, scenes from "Ray" were displayed in between performances of Charles' songs, which were done in front of a celebrity-filled audience. The focus of the tribute was not only on the amazing music of Ray Charles, but also on his influence over segregation.

Ray Charles Robinson was born into poverty in Albany, Ga. on Sept. 23, 1930. He slowly became blind due to a bad case of glaucoma. By the age of seven he was completely blind. However he still, as Jamie Foxx put it, "saw things like the rest of us didn't." He found enjoyment at the piano and realized he had a gift.

In his autobiography Charles wrote, "I was born with music inside me. That's the only explanation I know of."

A huge influence over him, his mother Aretha, died when Ray was only 15 years old. He managed to use his musical gift to survive this tragedy and in 1949, Ray began recording songs. Three years later he signed a contract for a record deal with Atlantic records.

In 1959 he switched labels and signed with ABC records. During these years he recorded such hit songs as "Georgia on My Mind," "I Got a Woman," and "Hit the Road Jack." He received a star on Hollywood Boulevard's walk of fame and was awarded 12 Grammys.

Ray Charles not only made an impact on music, but he also made a difference in the battle for civil rights and against segregation. After realizing the severity of segregation in civil rights, he became a supporter of Martin Luther King, Jr. Also, at a concert in Augusta, Ga. in the 1950s, Charles refused to play if the black people in his audience were to be pushed to the back.

Charles was an inspiration for so many throughout his years as a musician and an activist. He died on June 10, 2004 in Los Angeles and left behind what many consider to be a substantial legacy.

Friday's tribute opened with a performance by Elton John and Mary J. Blige. David "Fat Head" Newman, a saxophonist that played with Charles for years, joined the two legends on stage for the performance.

Other performers, also lent a hand in paying tribute to the music hero. Singing hits by Ray Charles were Usher, who sang "Georgia on My Mind;" Stevie Wonder, who sang "I Got a Woman;" young superstar, Norah Jones, who performed "Drown in My Own Tears;" and Kenny Chesney, who performed "You Don't Know Me."

BB King performed with Billy Preston (of the Beatles' "Let it Be" album fame) and actor Bruce Willis.

Later in the night, both Elton John and Mary J. Blige performed for the second time. The performances included the R&B, soul and country that Charles' music captured.

Among the celebrity announcers of the night was actor Tom Cruise, who said Ray Charles "helped make America a more beautiful and just nation." Also announcing the performances were Morgan Freeman, Ellen DeGeneres, Al Green, and Quincy Jones.

The one-hour tribute to Ray Charles ended with his touching version of "America the Beautiful" and an audience sing-a-long.

The film "Ray" will be in theaters on Friday, Oct. 29. The film captures the life of the musical genius, from being born into poverty to becoming a musical and social icon.

"Ray Charles: Genius Loves Company," a CD filled with his songs as performed by several well-known artists, is now available.

With the many tributes, it seems Ray Charles has left a legacy that will not soon be forgotten.

Ashlee's lip sync boo-boo

First O.J., now Ashlee: Another Simpson bites the dust.

After making herself the newest of Saturday Night Live disasters with a lip sync mishap this past Saturday, Ashlee Simpson's father has now declared that his lying daughter was just trying to hide her acid reflux.

What? I may be odd, but I remember my parents telling me that one lie doesn't fix another. Maybe Ashlee's parents sat out at that PTA meeting.

After performing her first single, "Pieces of Me," in her early performance on this past weekend's episode of Saturday Night Live, it seemed as if maybe she wasn't all that bad.

Think again.

Simpson and her band took the stage for her second song. While Ashlee said that the band planned on playing the song "Autobiography," the band began to play, and Ashlee's voice could be heard once again singing "Pieces of me." Oddly enough, her voice was heard, but the microphone was at her hips ... Busted!

Simpson danced around like a monkey with her ass on fire for about 30 seconds before she dashed offstage. She seemed nervous, as if she got caught in a lie. It was almost as if she were a seven-year-old with a pocket full of quarters running after the ice cream truck. Maybe Simpson had a case of explosive diarrhea, not acid reflux, but who can know what the truth is anymore.

Her band stayed on stage playing like fools with nothing left but a spotlight and Simpson's broken spirit to fill her void. Finally, SNL did the appropriate thing and went to a commercial.

When the show ended, guest host Jude Law again tried to save face for "Ashlee Vanilli," but the effort seemed disingenuous.

"What can I say? Live TV," Law said.

What was Ashlee's contribution to Law's coverup?

"Exactly. I feel so bad. My band started playing the wrong song. I didn't know what to do, so I thought I'd do a hoedown."

Yup. I know acid reflux makes me get a mean case of the hoe-downs.

Early yesterday morning on Ryan Seacrest's morning radio show, Ashlee's father Joe performed a little damage control and said his daughter is "just like any artist in America; she has a backing track that she pushes so you don't have to hear her croak through a song on national television. No one wants to hear that," he said.

Joe Simpson continued, adamantly saying that his daughter would be singing without any assistance on Monday night's "Radio Music Awards." He insisted that it would be Ashlee's live voice alone during her appearance on the Awards, which aired on NBC last night.

Ashlee actually got the backbone to comment on the incident herself on MTV's TRL yesterday afternoon. Simpson said, "The whole situation was a bummer." Gee whiz Ashlee, maybe that is what happens when you perform on a live show when you don't have the ability to perform live.

Car troubles? Ask the attorney

Ask the Attorney

Michele L. Leaf

Q. I recently had some work done on my car, and it is not running right. I was having transmission problems and brought the car to a garage that was advertised as a transmission specialist. I was given an estimate for a rebuilt transmission and agreed to the repair, which was supposed to take two days. It ended up taking two weeks, and I had to pay in full before I could even test-drive the car. Now I am having trouble shifting the car. I have called several times, but the owner insists the repair was done properly and told me it will just take some time to "break in" the new transmission. What should I do?

A. Your mechanic may have violated the Massachusetts Consumer Protection Act because repair shops are required to perform repairs in a timely and workman-like manner and guarantee their work.

If you are dependent upon an automobile for transportation, it can be a real hardship to be without your car while it is in the repair shop. Many students believe they are at the mercy of the repair shop and do not realize that they have a right to prompt service when they bring a car in for repairs. Consumer regulations require that work be completed on the day the car is brought in unless the customer agrees to extra time or the delay is not the fault of the mechanic, such as when a needed part is out of stock. The written estimate should be as detailed as possible about the problems that you are experiencing. It should include an itemized list of the repairs to be performed, specifying the cost. If the repairs will take longer than one day, the estimate should specify when the car has been promised.

Generally, the consumer will not be given the opportunity to drive the car until after the repairs have been paid for, and the law allows the mechanic to hold the car until full payment for the services is received. If the car has not been repaired satisfactorily, it is recommended that you bring it back to the shop immediately so that the problem can be discussed and verified. Make sure that your complaints are documented on a work order or in a letter of complaint.

There are a number of steps you can take to protect yourself from unscrupulous or incompetent mechanics. Since most students have very limited knowledge about automobile mechanics, it is extremely important to locate a good and honest repair shop. The best referrals come from other consumers who have been satisfied with the services of a particular shop, so it is important to ask for recommendations from people you can trust. While you might be tempted to utilize a mechanic who offers such inducements as free towing or student discounts, it is important not to let advertising substitute for actual recommendations of previous customers.

Whenever you question the replacement of parts, you should ask for your old parts to assure that the work was really done. In order to determine whether the work was necessary, you can bring the parts to another mechanic for a second opinion. It is important to ask for the parts as soon as possible after the repair work has been completed. Otherwise the shop will dispose of them and you will be unable to exercise your rights. Know your rights and don't get taken at the repair shop!

Jacki-O releases awaited debut album 'Poe Little Rich Girl'

By Lindsey Mann
The Chronicle-Wire

Last summer, "Nookie," the graphic single by new rap artist Jacki-O commanded listeners to stop and take notice. Both outraged and enticed, audiences have been waiting since that release for the album debut of "Poe Little Rich Girl." On Oct. 26 the wait will be over, and people can find out for themselves just how low Jacki-O will go.

In spite of her sex-sells marketing strategy, the former hustler and phone-sex operator has created a diverse album that strikes a balance between sexy and over-sexed. Her voice doesn't get old, and she doesn't sound like she's trying too hard to project an image generated by her label. Heavily tattooed and fond of long wigs, Jacki-O looks looks like an over-exaggerated caricature of a woman with full lips and heavy eyelids.

Her music is all about control – the entire album attests to the fact she has been there, done that and is ready to move on.

COURTESY FOUND MAGAZINE

Jacki-O released her first single, "Nookie" last summer. The song recieved great success, prompting the anticipation for her new album..

In "Ghetto World," one of the CD's liner tracks, Jacki-O is open and vulnerable, rapping, "I ain't a little girl / I'm out here on my own / and the decisions I made / they turned me to a woman / The booze, the bars / jumpin' into dudes' cars / the lights with broads / livin' the life of a ghetto star." Sexuality is the vehicle used to drive each of the tracks. Jacki-O uses her sensuality as a weapon against men, but she doesn't sound jaded or like a gold digger. She's very much herself, penning each of the songs and most of the arrangements.

"Poe Little Rich Girl" won't be a run-away smash, but it may be enough to propel Jacki-O to star status. Cool and Dre of Terror Squad produced parts of the album and the Ying Yang Twins along with other noteworthy performers collaborated on selected tracks. The Ying Yang Twins, who have a knack for churning out hits, don't disappoint with "Fine," the album's best track.

The album falters at first. "Living it Up" and "Ms. Jacki" stall, discrediting all that follows, but after the third track there is steady improvement.

"Break You Off" draws energy from the combination of a thumping bass line and electronic sounds while Jacki-O and a smooth, male voice exchange banter about their illicit and irresistible relationship.

Tough enough to earn the black and white "Explicit Content" stamp of disapproval, "Poe Little Rich Girl" includes strings and '80s rock guitar on some of its tracks. Steady and occasionally melodious, Jacki-O lays herself bare before her audience sexually and emotionally.

With lines like, "I'm just a girl trying to stay afloat / Momma you had a born winner," Jacki-O mixes messages of empowerment over dance-friendly beats.

But if "Poe Little Rich Girl" is starting to conjure images of Christina Aguilera's "Fighter," reconsider. While Jacki-O has made a dance-worthy album, if you sit down and really listen to her lyrics, you will quickly realize she means business.

"Sleeping with the Enemy," which deals with the wanderings of her sleazy boyfriend, sounds like a soulful Mozart concerto flowing into a booming bass line. Jacki-O laments to her man: "you won't let me load your clip or hide your bricks anymore." Through the course of the song, she decides to get revenge by running up his credit card bills and moves on, saying, "I don't think I'm going back this time."

Trick Daddy joins her on "Champion," the album's raunchiest track. The verbal abuse, which is used almost affectionately, is sickening. While urging Jacki-O to "keep doin' whatcha doin'," (ahem ...) Trick Daddy refers to her only as "slut" and "b*." Worse still, she enjoys it.

Equally as frightening is "Pretty," a love song praising the boy who thinks she is beautiful even in her hoodie and sees her as more than "round thighs and cup size."

COURTESY TVT RECORDS

Aside from the name-calling and lyrics that made me blush, I like "Poe Little Rich Girl," and I'm a no-rhythm, can't-dance little white girl who likes James Taylor. Overall, the album is solid. If you like to dance, it would be a well-chosen addition to your collection that you wouldn't have to be embarrassed of.

Fans beg rapper, Xzibit in second season: 'Pimp My Ride'

By Rob Watson
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Teens were captivated by the first season of MTV's "Pimp My Ride." Kids who looked and lived just like them saw their busted-up cars transformed into chrome-laden chariots with enough gadgetry to make James Bond envious.

The show was a runaway hit, scoring top ratings with teenagers on Sunday nights and cruising easily past all of the many other car-makeover shows among viewers ages 12 to 34.

"It's not the typical 'reality' show for MTV's target audience," says Marc Berman, a columnist for the trade publication Mediaweek.

"It puts cars and more importantly the kids in a positive light."

Sunday at 9 p.m. EDT, the second season will begin, and another slew of ragtag vehicles will be put on the stroll.

Souping up cars on TV isn't an original concept, but "Pimp" wields a couple of heavy weapons. It focuses on young people who deserve something special in their lives, and they get to drive off with some of the wildest autos most of us have ever seen.

You just won't see in-car waterfalls, Internet access, or a yoga studio — yes, a complete, wood-lined yoga studio — on those other shows.

West Coast rapper Xzibit, the hilarious master of ceremonies, says: "We've got a brand-new, multimillion-dollar [auto body] facility, and it's just good to be involved in something so dope."

"Pimp My Ride" is the brainchild of Rick Hurvitz and Bruce Beresford-Redman, two high school chums who once had their own clunkers.

COURTESY FOUND MAGAZINE

Many have praised the first season of MTV's show 'Pimp My Ride,' hosted by Xzibit. They will now begin a second season this Sunday at 9 p.m.

Says Hurvitz: "In high school, [Beresford-Redman] had a '68 Cadillac hearse and I had a '72 lime-green [Oldsmobile] Delta 88 convertible. For a high school kid, it's your first car, it has new meaning in your life, so we thought: Wouldn't it be great to give kids a chance to pimp that as opposed to getting something new?"

The two were involved with "Married by America" and "For Love or Money," among other reality shows. But "Pimp" wasn't going to be about the lengths to which contestants will go. This time, it was the creators who needed to push the limits, and they needed help.

Hurvitz and Beresford-Redman found that help at West Coast Customs, one of the premier shops in Los Angeles.

"We could do the work, but [the show] needed a celebrity," says owner Ryan Friedlinghaus. "I knew Xzibit from working on his cars and was sure he would do it for me."

With a go-ahead from MTV, taping began. But the first car almost stalled everyone's efforts.

It was a Daihatsu minivan, which was in horrible shape.

"That was the worst [from Season 1] in my eyes. ... [T]he first car they bring me is that? I thought, whoa, what did I get myself into?"

However, Friedlinghaus and crew refused to put the brakes on. They turned that pile of rusted metal into a sweet cruiser with three TVs, a mini-fridge, and a built-in guitar amp for owner Wyatt, an 18-year-old musician who could barely get to auditions in far-flung L.A.

Wyatt and his transportation predicament were just what MTV was looking for, says Beth Greenwald, senior director of development for MTV. They were the right combination of a rust-bucket, a life struggle, and screen presence, or "pop," she says.

In addition to working their cosmetic and gadget magic, the customizers make sure the car's internal workings are up to snuff. The elaborate rebirths, which run $20,000 to $50,000 for cars worth a fraction of that, combined with feel-good endings have made "Pimp" a hit all across the bubble.

"We're on in over 40 countries," Hurvitz says. "Now every day, it seems, someone from Brazil, England, or some other unexpected place is coming over and stopping at West Coast Customs to see the facility."

That level of fame forced Friedlinghaus to move "to a bigger place just to be able to handle all of this. ... We needed an area to do the show and an area for our regular work. We had a crew of about 15 guys to handle all of our business, and now we are up to around 28, 30."

For him, with the added beef comes added gravy, too: The show has brought the customizer deals for clothing, toys and video games, and he has attracted car biz from hip-hop's Cash Money crew and professional sports figures.

Pimp's popularity put Xzibit, 30, through some changes as well. The well-versed rapper still doesn't know what to say to fans who approach him on the street trying to get on the show or, worse, seeking auto advice.

"It's a madhouse, man. ... like I have some tools in my pocket, or some rims around my neck that I can throw on their ride," says the man who owns a tricked-out Mercedes and Hummer.

There is at least one luxury that Xzibit hasn't retooled his wheels with. Greenwald learned that it might be possible to fit a 40-inch flat-screen TV inside a car.

Luckily for fans, she and her casting staff found just the right vehicle and the right driver for Season 2.

BAUBLES, BUBBLES AND YOGA

"Pimp My Ride's" guys at West Coast Customs merge imagination with technical wizardry. Some of the coolest from the first season:

One restored Mustang got even hotter when the crew added flame-shooting tailpipes. Too bad they were completely illegal.

One lucky driver will always be the belle of the ball now that her Trans Am dome light has been replaced by a chandilier.

A redone Maxima station wagon can't carry the groceries anymore, but it can carry a tune. Many tunes, in fact, as its cargo area now holds a complete DJ set, including two turntables and a mixer.

Passengers in another Mustang must come to grips with the rhinestone-encrusted gear shifter and the machine that blows bubbles out of the convertible.

The owner of a Toyota Land Cruiser can find inner peace amid L.A. traffic in the wood-lined yoga studio installed behind the front seats.

For Red Sox fans, the year may be here

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Columnist

I've been sitting here for a while trying to think of how to start this piece, but it's difficult to put into words an event that left me totally speechless.

If you're a diehard Red Sox fan like me, you've been waiting for this your entire life, and the feeling right now is hard to express. It's somewhere between complete elation and the strongest sense of relief imaginable.

Last Wednesday night is a moment that every Red Sox fan has dreamed about: going into Yankee Stadium in a Game 7, putting all the nonsense talk of ghosts and curses to rest, and beating the Yankees on the way to the World Series.

The ALCS was easily the greatest playoff series of my lifetime, and not just because I am a Red Sox fan, but because each of the last four games will be aired on ESPN Classic for years to come.

In coming back to win a series after being down 3-0, the Sox accomplished something that had never been done in 101 years of postseason play in Major League Baseball, and I was privileged to watch every minute of it.

Obviously winning this series will lose much of its meaning if the Sox do not go on to bring home the ultimate prize, but Red Sox Nation needs to take time to reflect on the greatest comeback in the history of sports.

The strange thing about the series is that the Sox were actually favored to win it, and most fans definitely felt this year was their best shot at knocking off the Yanks.

The outlook quickly changed after the Sox were dismantled in a variety of ways in the first three games of the series.

First it was Curt Schilling, the franchise savior, coming out and getting racked due to an ankle injury that was far worse than anyone outside of the Red Sox clubhouse knew.

Then, in Game 2, there were the endless "Who's your daddy?" chants and what looked like the last start Pedro Martinez would ever make in a Boston uniform.

And then, of course, there was the Game 3 debacle that surely did away with all of the fair-weather Sox fans.

The thing about this team is that it showed unbelievable resiliency all year. The Sox came out of the gates firing, taking six of seven from NY early in the year. But then they fell into a three month malaise that didn't end until the former face of the franchise was traded.

After Nomar was gone the attitude of the team changed. No longer was there a dark cloud hanging over the clubhouse or stewing at the end of the bench.

The brawl between Jason Varitek and A-Rod in late July seemed to charge up the team even more, and the subsequent come-from-behind win foreshadowed two things that proved to play a huge role in this series.

First off, it showed that the Sox were not afraid of the Yankees and that they would not back down to them. Second, and perhaps just as important, it showed that they were not afraid of Mariano Rivera and that he could be beaten.

So when the Sox were faced with a one-run deficit and three outs remaining in their season, they did not shy away from the moment.

Kevin Millar drew a huge walk off of Rivera, who until this year was considered the most dominant closer in postseason history. It's hard to say at this point which is fading faster, Rivera's reputation as automatic in big games or his hairline.

Dave Roberts came in to run for Millar and swiped the biggest stolen base of the season. Bill Mueller followed with the game-tying hit and restored the faith all over New England in the process.

Later that night, David Ortiz sent the fans home with even more hope with his second walk-off homerun of the playoffs.

That one hit by Ortiz changed everything, because then it didn't seem like the Sox needed to win three more games in a row. All they needed to do was go out and beat the Yankees one time and get to the next game. Then they would need to win that game, and then get to the next game, and so on.

The mountain seemed far easier to climb once the Sox went all out to win each game individually without worrying about the next game. If this approach seems familiar, it's because a fairly successful football team in Foxboro has been using this formula for its past 21 games.

The Sox went through another marathon in Game 5, and again Big Papi came through with the game on the line.

This was the point when I realized that the Sox could actually do the unthinkable and reel off four straight wins.

With Schilling getting another shot at New York, you knew he would leave it all on the field. The blood dripping through his sock only added to the gutsiest performance I have ever witnessed in sports.

It wasn't enough to go out and pitch through the pain, though. Schilling had to shut down one of the best lineups in baseball and pitch deep enough into the game to rest the bullpen which was absolutely taxed after the two extra-inning games in Boston.

Of course, Schill was dominant even though he didn't have anything close to his best stuff. He seemingly willed the Sox toward victory and got the game into the increasingly trustworthy hands of closer Keith Foulke.

Everyone knows how Wednesday night played out, with Johnny Damon erasing a brutal slump with two sweet swings of the bat and Derek Lowe turning in one of the most brilliant and improbable performances imaginable considering the way his season has gone.

The Sox have finally brought down the Empire and the feeling as a lifelong fan is incredible.

My grandfathers never saw the Sox win a World Series, and after last year's painful ALCS loss to the Yankees, my father was wondering if he'd ever see one in his lifetime. And while they haven't done it yet, it seems like there is no other way for this story to end.

The Sox now head to St. Louis holding a 2-0 advantage in the World Series. They are a mere two wins from bringing the first title to Boston since 1918.

While there still is some work to be done, teams like this don't get to the mountaintop and then let it slip away. As the signs all over Boston read "You Gotta Believe."

After winning a series like the one they just did, it's never been easier to believe that this truly is the year for the Sox.

UMass falls on Senior Day

The Spiders outshot the Minutewomen 28-4. UMass was unable to get a single shot on goal, while Richmond tallied 19. The Spiders also had the edge in penalty corners, 12-1.

"That was not a very good display of hockey on our part. When we were under pressure, we went back to all our old habits. We didn't trust in the process, and we didn't trust what had gotten us here," Shea said. "We have to be smarter on the field."

Tocco's save count was in the double-digits for the tenth time this season, and the Minutewomen totaled 12 saves during the game.

"Christine Tocco played great, she had some great saves," Shea said. "But she didn't get any help."

In addition to Tocco's saves, freshman Becky Letourneau made two crucial saves, including one particularly acrobatic diving stop against Cram.

The Maroon and White's final game of the season will be a conference match-up at Rhode Island at noon on Saturday. The A-10 Tournament will be held at Garber Field the following weekend. The semifinals are on November 5 at 5 p.m. and 7 p.m., and the championship game will be at 7 p.m. on November 6.

Men's cross country wins CCSU meet

By Martha Powers
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, the UMass men's cross-country team finished first out of nine teams at Central Connecticut's Blue Devil Mini-Meet. This is the second time the Minutemen have won a meet this season.

The team finished with a score of 41, blowing away second place Rhode Island by more than 40 points.

Finishing first for the Minutemen and second overall was freshman Nils Fischer (15:40). Closely following him were Captain Matt Clark (15:49), Captain Andy McCarron (15:57), freshman Matt Klypka (15:58), and junior Paul Noone (16:01). Rounding out the top seven was freshman Ryan Durkin (16:02), and sophomore Aaron Strellner (16:22).

The team ran with a pack mentality, as UMass took six out of the top 15 places in a field of eighty runners. "Everyone looked good," Coach Ken O'Brien said. "They reacted positively to the race and weren't waiting for things to happen to them."

Instead, the team took matters into their own hands and had "a quality race" in O'Brien's eyes.

"The first mile was fast; it was at the pace that the team usually runs during the five-mile races," O'Brien said. "The team responded to the quickness well."

According to O'Brien, "the team was determined to overcome challenges." He was referring to the disappointing New England Championship two weeks ago, but it looks as if the Minutemen have regained their previous momentum.

Saturday's race was the team's chance to work out before heading to Pittsburgh next weekend to compete in the Atlantic 10 Championship.

Up-and-down Minutewomen on the brink of elimination

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

A lot of things can happen in 20 minutes.

For the Massachusetts women's soccer team, an entire season changed in one 20-minute interval on Sunday. The end result? They are now staring elimination from postseason play coldly in the face, point blank, knowing that their next blink could be their last.

Everything was going great for the Minutewomen up until that point in time. Losing two players to season-ending injuries within the first week of the season (seniors Erica Wideburg and Carly Turman), the young but talented Minutewomen started off the season with a disappointing 0-5.

Things quickly turned for the better, starting with a stunning upset of the powerhouse Central Connecticut State Blue Devils, followed by a 4-1 pouncing of the Holy Cross Crusaders to embark on their first two-game winning streak since they opened the 2003 season at 2-0. The victory over HC also kicked off a five-game homestand over which they went 3-2 to boost their Atlantic 10 status up a few notches.

The Minutewomen next lost to Dayton, who will most likely go through the A-10 season without suffering a loss, but rebounded against Xavier nicely with a 2-0 thumping.

Shots were being converted. Players were staying injury-free. Great breaks along the flanks were being made. All seemed well in Amherst for the time being, especially following the 1-0 win over Fordham last Friday.

An arrogant team without doubt, the Rams took joy in making everybody wait. The beginning of the game was delayed because of their late arrival, then their warm-ups and stretches and whatnot. Halftime lasted longer than usual — almost 20 minutes — because the Rams opted to duck out of the cold rainstorm and head to the bus to keep warm.

Like a schoolyard bully taking pleasure in stealing the rich kid's lunch money, the Minutewomen took joy in shutting the Rams out, handing them a 1-0 upset, making for a very long ride back.

Three other teams in close contention for that final sixth spot in the A-10 tournament had won on that day, and were tailgating the Minutewomen. With both UMass and LaSalle sitting at 4-4-0 in conference play, Sunday's contest could have very well decided the fate of not just the two conference squads, but a score of teams under them vying for positioning. It was nonetheless critical.

The Maroon and White knew exactly what needed to be done, and it got done in the first half following freshman Jenny Rochrig's goal. Their spirits were at their highest, clutching a 1-0 lead over the Explorers.

So high, in fact, that a group of six or seven players at halftime gathered in a circle to kick a ball around, giggling in an almost carefree manner. It was a good feeling.

But 20 minutes was all it took.

20 minutes, and — BAM! — there went that sure-fire chance of playing sleeper in the post-season. There went that goal of getting at least four points out of the weekend. There went the season, should they lose or tie either of the two remaining games on the road.

It was twenty difficult minutes to swallow for Jim Rudy.

"I don't know what everyone else did, but shoot, we were...," he pauses, taking in a deep breath, letting reality sink in. "You know, it's really disappointing, because we played three really good halves out of four, and this fourth one is the one that did us in."

Around that 20-minute mark, a hawk was seen perched on the scoreboard, a sight that unnerved Rudy. It struck him as an omen in his mind, and with good reason. Because when that bird took off, the tables were figuratively flipped upside down.

With just under 20 to go, forward Kelly Lyons pulled off a shot with an amazing curl that snuck by goalie Kristin Walker to tie things up at one apiece. The sideline was stunned. Did that just happen?

It did. And so did the moment that did them in for good, a Shannon Plunkett goal that slipped though Walker in a scrum with 75 seconds to go, sealing the spectacular come-from-behind victory.

For the A-10, 20 minutes changed everything. LaSalle now stands uncontested at the No. 6 spot in the A-10 standings at 5-4-0, while the Minutewomen lay close behind at 4-5-0.

But there's still hope. Should the Explorers lose their final two games, a homestand against Dayton and Xavier, and the Minutewomen win their final two games on the road against St. Bonaventure and Duquesne, UMass is in and will get to play on their home field one last time for the A-10 Tournament.

Given Dayton's invincibility in conference all season long, and Xavier's tough style of play (they are a lock to take the No. 4 seed), there's reason to be optimistic.

But for now, it's back to the drawing board. Back to the playing field, where they will continue to practice in hopes that another 20-minute breakdown does not determine how 2004 ends for this Cinderella squad.

UMass hockey still overlooked even a few victories.

Here's the kicker: It probably won't happen.

The UMass Athletic Department, which admittedly has been in turmoil for the last three years, has never recognized the changing dimensions of the hockey team on this campus. The skaters have come within one overtime goal of winning the conference championship, sold out the Mullins Center, and hosted its first playoff series, all in the last year. But there's still an ingrained theory that the men's basketball team and the football team just have to be a bigger deal.

For what it's worth, this isn't about attacking either of those squads, even though football has struggled this year, and basketball has steadily declined over the last few seasons. This is more about the idea of a team that has provided the most excitement over the last two years getting its due. Rather than schedule "Operation 8K" for a game against Clarkson, a team only few outside of the realm of "hockey nut" know anything about, why not instead make it one of the lesser Hockey East games? Even the Nov. 23 clash against future conference foe Vermont? What better way to start Thanksgiving break and send the team off to Colorado than with a packed house full of rowdy, loud fans?

It goes beyond just an attendance promotion. It's about making a name for the program in the state. It's no secret that when it comes to marketing, UMass is burdened by its distance from Boston, yet Maine and New Hampshire are well-respected programs in Hockey East. Granted, those schools are longer on tradition than Massachusetts, but there's no reason not to start the process of making the Minutemen a stalwart now. It's the little things, like deciding not to hold formal press conferences or treat the game as more than the minor league sidekick to basketball.

There are no excuses for the hockey team's loss. The Minutemen were outskated, outworked, and finally outscored. But isn't there a chance that a roaring crowd might have changed the complexion — and result — of that overtime period?

Even further, would it be so crazy to suggest that the University of Massachusetts no longer consider itself solely a basketball school and finally recognize the possibilities that arise when the Mullins Center floor is a slick sheet of ice?

Halfway there

Two wins shy of a World Series title, Sox send Pedro to the hill

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Remember Pedro Martinez? He's the former ace of the Red Sox staff who won three Cy Young awards and called the Yankees his "daddy." But he's been overshadowed by the buzz about Curt Schilling's stitched-up ankle and lights-out pitching.

A year ago, Martinez made his own post-season history — pushing Don Zimmer to the ground when New York's 72-year-old bench coach charged him in Game 3 and blowing a lead in Game 7 of the AL championship series against the Yankees.

Now, he's just Boston's second best starter and doesn't get to pitch until the third game of the World Series against the Cardinals. He'll make his career World Series debut on Tuesday night in St. Louis and won't have to be a savior.

That's because Schilling pitched six exceptional innings Sunday night when the Red Sox won 6-2 and took a 2-0 lead.

Martinez's postseason numbers this year have been mediocre — a 1-1 record with a 5.40 ERA in four appearances, three of them starts. At least that's better than his last four regular-season starts in which he went 0-4 with a 7.71 ERA with two losses against the Yankees.

Boston manager Terry Francona isn't worried.

"I expect Pedro to pitch his fanny off," he said. "I think he's got rest. I think he feels good about himself. We'll have a day off, so we can rest our bullpen a little bit. Anytime we start Pedro, believe me, we're excited about it."

Martinez finished the season with a career-worst 3.90 ERA after winning four of the previous six AL ERA titles. He was 16-9, his most losses since he went 13-10 with Montreal in 1996.

Fortunately for the Red Sox, they had Schilling to lead them down the stretch and through the playoffs.

A dislocated tendon in his right ankle ruined his start in Game 1 of the AL championship series, won by the Yankees. But with stitches in the ankle he pitched seven strong innings in Boston's Game 6 victory then beat St. Louis on Sunday night.

Even Derek Lowe, who had been dropped from the rotation in the ALCS, outdid Martinez by getting the Game 7 start and allowing one run and one hit in six innings on just two days rest. Martinez replaced him and struggled, giving up two runs on three hits in one inning.

But the Red Sox won 10-3, completing the greatest comeback in baseball postseason history by overcoming a 3-0 deficit.

Five years earlier, it was Martinez who relieved a struggling Lowe in the decisive fifth game of the AL division series in Cleveland. Martinez had pulled a muscle in his upper back in the opener but returned to throw six perfect innings in Boston's 12-8 win that clinched the series.

Now Martinez can put his team one victory away from winning the World Series in what could be his last game with the Red Sox. He can become a free agent after the season.

"We're excited that he's on our side," Boston first baseman Kevin Millar said. "We're going to need a big start, because they're tough in their place."

The Cardinals are 6-0 at home this postseason while the Red Sox were just 43-38 on the road in the regular season.

But even a loss wouldn't approach some of the lowlights of Martinez's playoff career.

He was tiring in the eighth inning of last year's seventh game of the ALCS, but manager Grady Little left him in with a 5-2 lead. Martinez gave up three runs that inning and New York ended Boston's season when Aaron Boone homered off Tim Wakefield in the 11th.

In Game 3, Martinez pushed Zimmer to the ground during a bench-clearing fight.

The Yankees were the opponents again Sept. 24 when Martinez remained in the game in the eighth with a 4-3 lead and allowed two runs. The Yankees won 6-4.

"I just up my hat and call the Yankees my daddy," he said afterward. "I can't find a way to beat them at this point."

On Tuesday night he'll be rested when he pitches on seven days rest between starts and five days rest since his last relief appearance.

Despite his struggles, Martinez was on target back in spring training when he sized up Boston's rotation and championship chances.

"Anybody can carry the load that I might not on a certain day," he said then. "I hope ... we are the team to beat, but I don't want to say It. I want to do it."

Minutewomen see five-game winning streak come to an end against Richmond

By Paula Aiden

The Massachusetts field hockey team's five-game winning streak came to an end yesterday at Garber Field before an audience of 214. No. 11 Richmond (14-2 overall, 6-0 A-10) shut out the Minutewomen (7-12 overall, 3-2 A-10) with a final score of 7-0.

The victory for the Spiders clinched their conference title, as they completed A-10 play undefeated.

"We didn't move on the field today," Massachusetts head coach Patty Shea said. "We didn't do what we needed to do, we didn't take care of our skills. We just did not execute."

Seniors Christine Tocco, Adrianne Monaco, and Caitlin Beresin were honored before the game began, keeping with the Minutewomen's tradition of Senior Day. Beresin and Monaco are currently in a tie for second place for goals per game in the A-10 with 0.75. As of the beginning of the week, Tocco was nationally ranked second for most saves with 176. In yesterday's game, Tocco earned another ten saves.

The first goal was scored by Holly Cram less than five minutes into the game, assisted by Whitney Wells. Good things came in threes for Richmond, as they netted their first three goals in a span of under a minute and a half. Less than forty seconds after the first tally, the Spiders scored again when Heather Wrublesky took a shot while Tocco was out of the cage and unable to stop the ball in time. The goal was Wrublesky's first of the season.

Richmond's third goal came under a minute later, when Amanda Florio scrambled for the rebound after a penalty corner and managed to score unassisted for her sixth goal of the season.

The Minutewomen had their first chance to score halfway through the first half. Junior Jaime Bawden was given a free hit outside the circle, but Beresin's attempt to tip the ball into the Richmond cage went wide. With eight minutes left, freshman Rachael Mervine had another chance to score for the Maroon and White after intercepting the ball inside the circle from the Spiders, but her pass to Beresin was wide, leaving the circle.

Richmond scored again after a failed penalty corner attempt. Colleen Wevodau's shot was saved by Tocco, but Wells picked up the rebound and managed to sink the shot into Tocco's cage, bringing the halftime score to 4-0.

In the second half, the Spiders scored another trio of goals within a span of four minutes. The flurry of scoring action was kicked off by a penalty corner hit, when Cram netted her second goal of the game and 22nd of the season. Michelle La Force and Allie Howard both earned assists on the play.

A minute later, Shannon Taylor took an unassisted shot from the left side, beating Tocco to the goal. Taylor scored again a minute later, when she received a pass from Erin Arthur after a penalty corner attempt.

Richmond dominated every aspect of the game, while UMass scrambled to keep up.

"It's just unacceptable to not show up to play on your home field," Shea said.

UM hockey deserves more

Andrew Merritt

Sunday's hockey game at the Mullins Center was begging for a bad stand-up comedy setup.

"The crowd at the game was so small ..."

"How small was it?"

But what happened on Sunday was no laughing matter for the Massachusetts hockey team. First of all, it ended up being a historical event for all the wrong reasons for the Minutemen. The Connecticut Huskies had never beaten UMass in the Mullins Center prior to Sunday, and UMass had not lost to UConn at all since the program's reinstatement in 1993. Yet, all the history went out the window, because for the second year in a row, the Minutemen put up a stinker against the Huskies — last year's season opener on Oct. 9 was a skin-of-their-teeth 6-4 win.

A large part of the reason that the Minutemen lost was that they came out of the gates slowly, slower than game-winning-goal scorer said he and his teammates were expecting. UMass coach Don Cahoon called it a lack of "thoroughness" that the Minutemen didn't play a complete game. To some extent, that's very much the case. Other than the second period, the Minutemen didn't have many very good scoring chances, although they played a solid third period. What's worse, they nullified a near-spectacular performance by Tim Warner, who is rotating with junior Gabe Winer this year.

But there was another factor contributing to the stale, uninspiring feeling that a spectator at the game must have felt. It was the attendance: 2,038. More accurately, it was the 6,351 empty seats. Although the crowd number spiked in the second period, at the start and end of the game, it was the quintessential "friends and family" crowd. That they had enough people to give the "Chuck-a-puck" winner his $105 prize was one of the more impressive statistics of the game.

Now, there was a perfectly good reason for all this. The New England Patriots, who have managed to be the most underrated record-setting football team, played their game at 4 p.m. The hockey game started at 3 p.m. Short of free admission and a complimentary sundae from Harrell's, there wasn't much incentive that would bring more people in. Heck, even those goodies probably wouldn't have gotten more than another thousand people. Not much is going to tear folks away from the Patriots' games this year, so it might have been better to just adapt. It's all guessing at this point, though. There's no reason to just assume that moving Sunday's game to, say, Saturday afternoon would be feasible.

What can be done, though, is a change in the start time next weekend, should the World Series go to a sixth game. If the Red Sox are playing the Cardinals in Game 6 Saturday night, whether it's to fight for their lives or try to clinch their first title in 86 years, there's a good chance that the number that shows up to Saturday's hockey game will be less than half of the one that showed up on Sunday. It might even be tough to get enough players from UMass and Providence to suit up instead of finding a spot to watch the game.

So the solution is simple. Saturday is Homecoming, and the football team plays Maine at 1 p.m. That game should finish sometime before 4 p.m. Once the final whistle blows, the Mullins Center is just a few bus stops away, so the crowd can head over for UMass-Providence on the Ice. Once that's over, it's time for the Red Sox. It would be a fun-filled day of cheers and chants, maybe

Colleges Against Cancer chapter seeks to become next UMass RSO

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students are joining together to promote and recruit for Colleges Against Cancer, a nation-wide chapter that is currently seeking approval to become a Registered Student Organization on campus.

Sponsored by the American Cancer Society, CAC is a national alliance of student and faculty volunteers working together to raise money and awareness for cancer eliminating programs like the Relay for Life and Survivorship.

"We are excited to bring Colleges Against Cancer to the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus," said Diane Barstow, Director of Development for the American Cancer Society. "It is an opportunity for students to make a difference on campus and more importantly making a difference in the lives of others."

Last year, a group of several hundred local students walked the Relay for Life to raise awareness for cancer victims as well as honor those who lost their lives to the disease.

Teams of volunteers raised money from several area sponsors and took turns walking around the track at Amherst College last April.

"Our first year, we raised over $16,000 and last year we raised over $45,000," said Nicole Lohr, senior political science major and volunteer. "Seeing the increase from one year to the next we're hoping with the formation for the CAC, that it will being more memberships and more organization and most importantly a bigger and better relay."

CAC members hope to become the first college-group to be known as a RSO and expand through a diverse community within the area as well as in the country.

"The CAC is a great way to bring awareness to the campus and promote activity on campus," Lohr said. "We often forget that people our age are still affected by this disease and it might bring a diverse community together to those who are affected."

For more information or to get involved in the first meeting for Colleges Against Cancer, please contact chapter president AnnMarie Torres at 413-549-4834. For general information about the American Cancer Society please visit the website at www.cancer.org.

Students participated last year in the American Cancer Society's 'Relay for Life' at Amherst College to raise awareness and money for cancer survivors.

Specialists debate foreign policy today

By Yousef Munayyer
Collegian Staff

The Victor S. Johnson Lecture Fund and the Office of the President at Amherst College is sponsoring a lecture this evening focusing on foreign policy.

William Kristol, the editor of the Weekly Standard, and Joseph Nye of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, will speak tonight on "America in the World: Hard vs. Soft Power".

The event, scheduled for 8 p.m. will surely be a heated debate, as both speakers are known to be at opposite ends of the foreign policy spectrum.

Kristol, editor of the Weekly Standard, which is widely considered a conservative publication, frequently contributes to the Fox News Channel and is considered by many to be a leading analyst in his field. In most recent years, Kristol's name has gained fame, or perhaps infamy because of his involvement with the Project for a New American Century, a foreign policy think tank that strongly recommended American intervention in Iraq.

The PNAC is an organization closely tied into what many have called neo-Conservativism. Kristol is currently Chairman of the Project for a New American Century and was a co-founder of the think tank. He has published several books including "The Neoconservative Imagination" (1995) and most recent "The War over Iraq" (2002). Kristol has been known for his stance on foreign policy, which emphasizes the use of force over diplomacy in matters of interests in international relations.

Joseph Nye is also outspoken on foreign policy. He has served in several distinguished positions including chair of the National Security Council Group on Nonproliferation of Nuclear Weapons; chair of the National Intelligence Council, and Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs.

However, Nye takes a somewhat opposing view from Kristol's as he recommends that the United States cannot act unilaterally.

His idea of soft power, persuading other state actors in the international arena in non-military ways, will likely be his point of emphasis this evening and similarly a point of contention between himself and Kristol.

Nye's book, "The Paradox of American Power: Why the World's Only Superpower Can't Go It Alone" (2002) was an immediate response to the foreign policy that followed September 11, 2001, and made the case that the United States in the following century would make greater gains through cooperation rather than confrontation.

His latest book "Soft Power: The Means to Success in World Politics" (2004) further explores the idea of soft power and persuasiveness in diplomacy.

The event this evening, though listed as a lecture, may very well become a debate as both speakers view foreign policy and American interests quite differently. Tony Marx, president of Amherst College, will serve as the moderator. The lecture will be followed by an audience-engaging question and answer session.

Doors to the Cole Assembly Room at Converse Hall will be open by 7 p.m. and the lecture is open to the public.

Bush and Kerry try to break campaign polling deadlock

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

ONALASKA, Wis. (AP) — President Bush and Sen. John Kerry accused each other of lacking the hard-nosed resolve of Cold War presidents — from Democrat Truman to Republican Reagan — reaching across party lines a week before Election Day to try to break their campaign deadlock.

With tensions rising Tuesday in both camps, Kerry escalated his criticism of Bush over explosives missing in Iraq, asserting that the weapons could be used against American troops and citizens. He accused the president of keeping the cost of war in Iraq under wraps until after Election Day.

"What else are you keeping from the American people?" Kerry said in Green Bay.

Across the state, Bush said his rival favors "the position of weakness and inaction" contrary to "the great tradition of the Democratic Party."

A Los Angeles Times poll showed the popular vote tied, 48-48, with Bush-weary voters open to change on Iraq and the economy but harboring doubts about Kerry's ability to lead the nation against terror.

New state surveys showed the race also knotted in Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania, the three most important battlegrounds in the race for 270 Electoral College votes.

Behind the scenes, both campaigns tweaked their stump speeches, advertising strategies and get-out-the-vote drives. In addition to Wisconsin, Bush visited Iowa while Kerry traveled to Nevada and New Mexico — all tossup states.

After spending weeks casting Kerry as a flip-flopping liberal in TV ads, Bush planned to close the race with a 60-second commercial designed to portray himself as a trustworthy, steady leader.

The high point, according to advisers, is a clip of a choked-up Bush addressing the Republican National Convention about meeting the children of slain U.S. soldiers "who are told their dad or mom is a hero but would rather just have their dad or mom."

Kerry's latest ad accuses the Bush administration of failing to secure nearly 400 tons of explosives that are missing from a military installation south of Baghdad. "His Iraq misjudgments put our soldiers at risk, and make our country less secure," Kerry says of Bush in the ad.

He said in Green Bay the explosives "could be in the hands of terrorists, used to attack our troops or our people."

Vice President Dick Cheney responded for Bush from Florida, saying, "It is not at all clear that those explosives were even at the weapons facility when our troops arrived in the area of Baghdad."

In the battle of past presidents, Bush said Democrats Roosevelt, Truman and Kennedy showed "confidence and resolve in times of war and hours of crisis," asserting that Kerry lacks such mettle.

Kerry said Presidents Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Reagan all built strong alliances, a contrast to Bush who Kerry said, "has failed in his fundamental obligation as commander in chief to make America as safe and secure as we should be."

Later, in Nevada, the Democrat appealed in both Spanish and English to undecided voters. "We're in a bigger mess by the day and the president can't see it or can't admit it, but either way, America is less safe," he said.

Bush made a direct pitch to wavering Democrats, particularly moderates

Family members mourn the loss of college student Victoria Snelgrove

Emerson College student killed during Red Sox's celebration

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

EAST BRIDGEWATER (AP) — As hundreds of mourners paid their final respects Tuesday to Victoria Snelgrove, her pastor denounced the raucous fans who prompted police to fire the pepper-spray pellet that killed the college student.

"I don't know why some people feel it's their God-given right to riot, to destroy property and cause mayhem," the Rev. Wally Keymont said. "It is destructive and it is deadly."

Friends, family and dignitaries — including Gov. Mitt Romney, Boston Mayor Thomas Menino and Boston Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole — filled St. John's church in East Bridgewater for the funeral Mass.

Snelgrove was killed last week when she was hit in the eye by a pellet fired by police as they tried to control the crowd outside Fenway Park after the Red Sox won the pennant against the archrival New York Yankees.

In a eulogy marked by soft sobbing from among the roughly 500 mourners — many of them Snelgrove's young friends and classmates — Keyment criticized the rowdy behavior that led to her death.

"Why did this have to happen?" he asked. "We need to be able to articulate our anger about this horrible death, (but) we need not lose our faith because of it."

Across the street from the church, a message board in front of East Bridgewater High School read, "Torie, we will miss you. EBHS."

Snelgrove graduated from the school in the Boston suburb in 2001. She attended Fitchburg State College before transferring last year to Emerson College, where she was a junior studying broadcast journalism. Her funeral came three days before her 22nd birthday.

Snelgrove was among an estimated 80,000 revelers celebrating in the streets around the ballpark early Thursday morning. Police began firing the pepper spray-filled pellets out of compressed-air guns when some in the crowd began climbing the steel girders under Fenway's left-field wall, setting small fires and throwing bottles at police.

In what police said was a horrible fluke, Snelgrove — an innocent bystander to the unruliness — was hit in the eye socket by one of the pellets. She was pronounced dead hours later at Brigham & Women's Hospital.

Her death prompted questions about whether police overreacted to the mostly college crowd. The department was sharply criticized earlier this year for being underprepared when riots broke out following the New England Patriots' Super Bowl win. One person was killed and another critically injured when a vehicle plowed into revelers shortly after midnight on Feb. 2.

Beside Snelgrove, at least two other fans were struck by the pellets: 24-year-old Paul Gately of Cambridge was struck in the face, requiring stitches to patch a hole in his cheek, as well as several times in his torso, leaving bruises and welts. Also, Kapila Bhamidipati, of Bridgewater, N.J., was struck in the temple and said doctors had to remove small pieces of plastic from his forehead and found a large piece embedded under his skin.

Police are conducting an internal investigation into last week's shooting, examining, among other things, whether police used excessive force and whether they received proper training in the use of the FN303, a compressed-air gun made by FN Herstal.

The investigation is expected to take several months.

unsure about Kerry.

"If you believe America should lead with strength and purpose and confidence and resolve, I'd be honored to have your support and I'm asking for your vote," he said.

In a gesture of moderation aimed at the same voters, Bush told ABC-TV he supported civil unions for homosexual couples "if that's what a state chooses to do." The remark upset some conservatives who not only want to amend the Constitution to ban gay marriage, as does Bush, but also would bar state approval of gay civil unions.

Campaign pitches varied from deadly serious to almost silly. A radio ad reminded Wisconsin voters that Kerry got the name of their beloved Green Bay Packers' football stadium wrong. Kerry recruited rocker Bruce Springsteen to play at his rallies.

In Wisconsin and a dozen or so other competitive states, mailboxes were being flooded with campaign leaflets — most of them negative.

A Republican National Committee mailing features a picture of Jane Fonda and Michael Moore, two anti-war liberals supporting Kerry, and the headline, "John Kerry's heart and soul of America?"

In Ohio, voters received a mailing with a picture of a soldier in camouflage uniform with the caption, "Supporting him in Iraq shouldn't mean shortchanging working families in America."

Voters in New Mexico began getting recorded messages by telephone from an abortion-right

Popular Ford vehicles found worst in crash test ratings

By Dee-Ann Durbin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two 2005 Ford vehicles, the two-door Focus and the Ranger 4x4 pickup, were the worst performers in new government crash and rollover tests, according to results released Tuesday.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration said the rear passenger was at risk of serious head injury when the Focus was hit in the side in a 38.5 mph test. The Focus was tested without side air bags, which a Ford Motor Co. Web site lists as a $350 option on the vehicle.

NHTSA gave the Focus three out of five stars for driver's side protection and four out of five stars for rear passenger protection, the lowest ratings among cars tested. Those ratings didn't reflect the potential for head injury because NHTSA's side-impact ratings consider only chest injuries. A five-star rating means the likelihood of serious injury in a similar crash is 5 percent or less; three stars means the likelihood is 11 to 20 percent.

The Ranger 4x4 and its corporate twin, the Mazda B-Series 4x4, earned two stars in NHTSA's rollover ratings, the lowest of the 10 2005 pickups tested. NHTSA said the Ranger and the B-Series have a 30.6 percent chance of rolling over in a crash. The ratings consider the vehicle's height and weight and its performance in a 35 to 50 mph test with a sharp turn.

Ford spokeswoman Carolyn Brown said Ford plans to study the new data but believes the Focus and the Ranger are safe and perform similarly to comparable vehicles. Brown added that Ford thinks NHTSA is using faulty methods to predict chance of rollover.

"The calculation that NHTSA is using is based on a model that includes outdated information and is not capable of producing real-world results," she said.

NHTSA released crash test results for seven passenger cars, one pickup and one sport utility vehicle and rollover ratings for one crossover vehicle and 10 pickups. The agency chooses vehicles to test based on popularity and other factors.

The 2005 Subaru Outback, which NHTSA classifies as an SUV, was the only vehicle that earned five stars on all front and side-impact tests. The Outback was tested with its side air bags since they are standard.

The 2005 Chrysler 300 and its corporate twin, the Dodge Magnum, also were high performers, earning five stars on the 35 mph frontal crash test and the rear passenger side-impact test. Neither vehicle was tested with side air bags, which are a $590 option on the Chrysler 300 and a $390 option on the Dodge Magnum.

Two-wheel and four-wheel-drive versions of the Chevrolet Colorado, GMC Canyon and Dodge Ram pickups each earned four stars in the rollover tests. NHTSA said their percent chance of rollover was between 17.9 and 19.8 percent. The Ford Ranger 4x2 and Mazda B-Series 4x2 fared better than the four-wheel-drive version, earning three stars and a 21.9 percent chance of rolling over.

The Ford Freestar crossover earned four stars and has a 14.7 percent chance of rolling over.

Afghanistan elections show Interim leader Karzai won with overwhelming victory

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — More than two weeks after Afghanistan's first presidential election, vote counting wrapped up Tuesday and interim leader Hamid Karzai emerged with a resounding victory.

With his inauguration to a five-year term a month away, the U.S.-backed Karzai already is under pressure to ditch his coalition with powerful warlords and tackle a booming narcotics industry that has become a major economic force in one of the world's poorest nations.

Officials declared the vote count complete Tuesday afternoon, giving some 1,500 weary staff at eight counting centers a well-earned rest in the middle of the Islamic fasting month of Ramadan.

Investigators were still examining about 100 suspect ballot boxes, but the election's chief technical officer said the count was effectively "over and done."

"It's just these last dribs and drabs to be approved," David Avery told The Associated Press. "It's really nothing that can affect the outcome."

Showing 98.4 percent of the votes counted, the Web site of the U.N.-Afghan election commission said Karzai had 55.5 percent of the votes, 39 points ahead of his closest rival, former Education Minister Yunus Qanooni.

An estimated 8.2 million ballots were cast in the historic vote Oct. 9, a turnout that U.S. and Afghan officials hailed as a nail in the coffin of the former ruling Taliban, whose threats to disrupt the election proved hollow.

Karzai, 47, a member of the Pashtun community, the largest ethnic group in this diverse and often divided country, portrayed himself as the best candidate to weld a unified Afghanistan.

He also promised to double the income of Afghans and pursue a reformist agenda that can finally begin to deliver basic services such as health and education to people impoverished by a quarter-century of fighting.

So far, the country's re-emergence — cities such as Kabul and Kandahar are in the grip of a real estate boom — appears to be founded more on lucrative drug exports than the legal economy.

Under pressure from the United States, Karzai is expected to announce a crackdown on refiners and traffickers who use Afghan opium poppies to supply most of the world's heroin.

"His mind is made up to do something, finally," a Western official who advises the Afghan government on counternarcotics policy said on condition of anonymity. "They know that this government will not survive if they don't take action."

Karzai must deal with the opium traffickers at the same time he grapples with regional leaders who still control much of the country with the help of private militias that have so far escaped a U.N.-sponsored disarmament drive.

Francesc Vendrell, the European Union's special representative, said Karzai took an important step before the election by excluding Defense Minister Mohammed Fahim, a powerful warlord, from his presidential ticket and then sidelining the most influential warlord in western Afghanistan, Ismail Khan.

"He's now got a mandate to have a reformist government," Vendrell told British Broadcasting Corp. radio, adding that the United States and European nations would support his efforts.

Election officials said formal confirmation of Karzai's victory could come by the weekend, when investigations into irregularities were expected to be complete and the election ruled "free and fair."

Karzai would then have until his swearing-in in late November to think about how to reorganize his Cabinet, which now contains a string of former militia leaders who helped the United States drive out the Taliban in late 2001.

Before his victory becomes official, investigators must clear the last of several hundred ballot boxes held back because of allegations of foul play on election day.

Ray Kennedy, deputy chairman of the joint U.N.-Afghan electoral commission, said Tuesday that some ballot boxes were "obviously stuffed" and would probably be disqualified.

But he said the problems were not on a scale that could overturn Karzai's majority.

His remarks were an indication that the commission would officially acknowledge some irregularities in its final report — the key condition set by Karzai's closest rival for conceding defeat.

"If the fraud was not so serious, we would accept that Karzai has won," Qanooni's running mate, Taj Mohammed Wardak, told the AP.

"I hope there was not so much fraud so our democracy is safe. If it was serious, then we are sad and it will affect the election result. "We will accept the conclusion of the investigation."

Kerry and Bush neck-and-neck in final days

group, telling them Bush "has devoted four years to dismantling a woman's right to choose."

In Pennsylvania, the state released figures that show the Democratic Party registered 108,000 more new voters there than the GOP since the April primary, good news for Kerry if they actually cast ballots.

Both campaigns braced for a long Election Night — or longer — with many legal fights. A federal judge in Miami ruled against Democrats in saying Florida election officials will not be required to process incomplete voter registration forms.

First lady Laura Bush, who had planned to travel with her husband through Election Day, abruptly scheduled a solo trip to Florida, underscoring the hard-fought battle being waged in that state.

Former President Clinton, campaigning for Kerry a second straight day, told Jewish voters in Florida that Kerry's commitment to the security of Israel "would be unshakable."

Questions arise about Supreme Court's future

It was just last week that UMass' own Professor Sheldon Goldman of the Political Science Department gave his distinguished lecture on the process and importance of judicial appointments. Now, it seems his lecture may have been more relevant than any of us could have realized.

This past weekend, Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist was hospitalized to undergo a tracheotomy for thyroid cancer. Rehnquist is 80 years old.

Admittedly, thyroid cancer is one of the more treatable forms of the disease and the Chief Justice is fully expected to recover and return to work as early as next week.

However, this news raises serious questions about the future of the Supreme Court, especially in light of next week's presidential election. The reality of the situation is that the nine justices of the Rehnquist Court are getting old. Only its youngest member, Clarence Thomas, is under the age of 65 while its oldest member, Justice John Paul Stevens, is 84. Besides Rehnquist, three other justices have already survived battles against cancer.

While they all seem to deny rumors of approaching retirement, it is only a matter of time before at least one justice decides to step down; and that time is approaching quickly.

With only six days left until the election, it seems that the top campaign issues now have some competition. In the next four years, it is extremely likely that one or more positions will open up on the Supreme Court and the responsibility to nominate a successor will fall on the shoulders of whoever wins this election.

There is no denying that the Rehnquist court is a conservative one, and there is no denying that George W. Bush and John Kerry differ on many of the issues that could potentially be affected by Supreme Court decisions. Controversial issues like gay marriage, stem cell research and abortion have the potential to fall into the hands of the Court. The outcomes of those decisions, then, will depend on whoever is chosen to fill the potential upcoming vacancies. Since these judicial appointments are for life, the new justices will have the ability to decide the direction of our country for decades to come.

Of course it is mostly speculation, but the fact remains that the current justices will not live forever, nor will they necessarily remain in their positions until the end of their lives. The importance of this election should not be minimized because the winner has the potential to influence cases and decisions that will affect this country long after he, himself, has left office.

Disgracing the Nation

There's no better time on the UMass campus than after a Red Sox playoff victory. People sprint out of their dorms in ecstasy because Boston has moved one game closer to that elusive World Series title. Somehow, they end up at the quad, where the celebration intensifies. They hug friends and high-five random strangers, screaming and yelling like they're back in first grade. About 15 minutes later, the other shoe drops and one finds out why a Sox playoff victory is also the worst time on this campus.

Dave Quinn

The "gatherings" in the Southwest quad all have the same routine. First, there's a period of random celebration as people run around, not exactly sure what to do with themselves. Then it moves into the "Let's Go Red Sox" chant, a classic that can never be overdone. This progresses to the "Yankees' Suck" chant which isn't entirely accurate. They choke; they don't suck, but that's okay. Then the toilet paper starts flying in a harmless form of celebration.

Once the toilet paper starts flying, things start to get personal. Chants start up about Derek Jeter's sexual preference, and Jorge Posada being a "receiver" in more ways than one. Once things start getting personal, it's only a matter of time before the knuckleheads get restless and need to do something moronic. For example, after Game Five, someone thought it would be a good idea to set off firecrackers, which incidentally also sound like gunshots. Then, after Game Six, several fans lit toilet paper on fire in the middle of the quad. One would assume they must have been cold. Another fan thought the best way to express his joy over the Sox victory would be to throw a brick. Anybody got a Darwin Awards Application?

Shockingly, the police begin to move in on horseback and give the order to disperse. Most students comply, stampeding 200 feet only to return 30 seconds later to taunt the officers and continue the rally, which at this point is utterly mindless. All the newsworthy events happen next, tear gas, rubber bullets and arrests. Just the stuff you write home to mom about.

Who would envy the job of the police? It's hard to get a clear view of who's doing what in a mob of 2,000 people. Some are arrested for being in the wrong place at the wrong time; others wreak havoc and get away scott-free.

If you are a die-hard Sox fan, and you see one of these half-wits about to do something stupid, it's your obligation as a member of Red Sox Nation to tell them to knock it off for the good of the celebration and society.
